works, demanded of it by the strongest principles of duty, interest, and equality, an opportunity is offered to us, in common with others, of getting a return of something like the interest upon our taxes. And if no adequate return is made in this way, in what other way can it be made? There is no other. This, sir, is the only method by which any approach to equality and fairness in the disbursement of the revenue can be gained in practice. The principle of equal distribution is in its nature general. An exact application of it cannot always be made; but it has found in the system of internal improvement the best means of attaining the end, and under the prudent operations of that system it will be a powerful auxiliary in working out the salvation of this country.

I do not mean to say that every thing done upon the tide water is wrong: very far from it. I might confidently appeal to the recollection of those with whom I have acted for the last seven years, to bear me out in saying that I have generally voted for such appropriations. I would not now stop them if I could; I say to gentlemen go on; finish your fortifications and other national works with reasonable despatch, and, as heretofore, I will go with you. But while you are making all safe and convenient without, I beg of you to turn your eyes within, examine the region of the interior, and extend to it the benefits of your equal care. Allow even to the West a share of the surplus millions, for an annual surplus, with proper economy, there will be, which might likely be increased by some diminution safely made from objects which have received more than equal munificence.

The gentleman from Virginia says, he would take care that there should be no surplus revenue. That when the national debt shall be paid, which we are alike desirous of hastening, and which this bill cannot delay, he would reduce the revenue to the annual expenditure. But could we do it? Would it not baffle the skill and experience of even that gentleman, great as they are, to draught a revenue law that they should exactly meet the annual expenditure? On reflection he must admit that it would, for it is impossible to foresee either the amount of imposts or appropriations, and graduate the one with the other. They both depend on too many contingencies. And to avoid the danger of suffering your revenue to fall below the demands upon it, you must necessarily make it go above. In reducing and equalizing the tariff, I would go a great way with that gentleman; but I would stop considerably short of the point to which his theory would lead him, and which I must think he has pushed faster and further than practical convenience and real safety will warrant. If the public debt were now paid, the books balanced, and closed, and sealed with seven seals, I would not if I could to-day reduce the duties to the point of current expenditure. And why? To do that suddenly, to do it otherwise than by the gradual indications of time and experience, perhaps to do it at all, would convulse this nation through all its essential interests. I would not reduce the revenue to that point, because extraordinary occurrences in the world, and the exigencies of the Government, may often render it a matter of the first necessity to have a surplus at command. And I would not do it for another, and to my mind a better reason. I would have a surplus to expend in the gradual improvement of the country. For that improvement I would tax its commerce, because that tax is in a great measure voluntary; because it will relieve the property of the citizens of the State from a direct and indiscriminate levy of contribution for these purposes; and, above all, because it is the very interest which, acting in unison with the great farming interest of the community, is to reap the benefits of these works. It ought to bear the charge of making them, and it can do it without feeling the pressure. If we can look forward to the time when commerce shall again raise its languid head, freed from the shackles of high, disproportionate, and prohibitory duties, we will see the agricultural interest springing forward to meet it with redoubled animation and vigor, and these improvements will be the highways of their communications.

If any one branch of industry or enterprise can have more at stake in these improvements than another, it is the great farming interest of the interior. That is closely connected with, yet primary to all others. Who would toil through the summer's sun for more than a subsistence, without the means, either by land or water, of carrying his surplus to a market? Or who would tug the heavy produce of his land, through the mud and mire and rains of winter, to a distant market, without the prospect of bringing something back that should more than repay the cost and drudgery of taking it there? Let but the truth be told—the deplorable condition of this neglected part of the community be known, and I envy no man the heart that cannot feel for it, nor the hand that will not relieve it.

We have heard urged against this, as all other measures of the kind, the effects of expending the public resources in the improvement of the country. These effects are fancifully, and I think falsely, described as pernicious to morality, and dangerous to liberty. What, sir! is it immoral or unjust to lay out a portion of the money paid by the people in accomplishing something that shall be permanently useful to themselves and the nation? Is it wrong to encourage industry by removing the impediments that lie in its way to the comfortable enjoyment of life, and the education of rising generations? No, sir; morality is not to suffer in this cause, unless, indeed, the virtue of this people is only to be preserved in a state of wretchedness and ignorance. And how is liberty to be in danger from this system? Philosophers may admire liberty for its own sake; but that liberty which the mass of mankind understand, the free institutions which they love, and would die to defend, must, with its other blessings, afford the security of equal laws, and the full participations of equal benefits.

Again: It is said that any improvement at one place will produce dissatisfaction at others, because that or something else is not done there. I tell you, sir, the dissatisfaction will be much deeper, and more universal, if they are not done somewhere. It is no objection to this, or any other course of profitable legislation, that every thing cannot be done at once; nor is it any excuse for not doing all we can, and doing it as fast as we can. These, with the whole class of forced objections to which they belong, should rather stimulate to exertion and uniformity in our progress to ultimate success.

Let me say, in conclusion, that this is no new experiment. It commenced a few years after the adoption of the constitution, and has been gaining ground ever since. But its principles, as now maintained by a great majority of the nation, were not firmly settled till the eighteenth Congress. Then (without going farther from home) the Representatives of Kentucky and Tennessee were found acting together with equal unanimity in both Houses of Congress, in support of this great measure. And whatever Kentucky may have expected from it, a little help at the Louisville canal is all the immediate advantage she has yet achieved. As for Tennessee, these dispensing showers have all passed her by. The first dew has not yet refreshed her fields. But our time has now come, and it behooves us to be consistent with ourselves, true to our own principles, and alive to the prosperity of our country; and not ours only, but every other where the hand of improvement should be laid. That country and this cause deserve higher efforts than I can exert; yet, whatever on my part can be supplied by devotion and perseverance, shall be continued, regardless of intervening obstacles, as long as there is hope of success.

Pay of Members.

THURSDAY, MARCH 25, 1830.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. SWIFT on the 18th instant—the question being on the amendment offered by Mr. DRAYTON.

The said resolution, at the instance of Mr. WICKLIFFE, and by consent of Mr. SWIFT, was modified so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to cause the necessary survey to be made on or at the outlet of Lake Champlain, near the Canada line, in order to ascertain the expediency of erecting a fortification for the defence of that frontier of the United States, and report a plan and estimate at the next session of Congress.

Mr. DRAYTON withdrew his amendment, and the resolution as modified was agreed to.

PAY OF MEMBERS.

The following resolution, laid on the table some days since by Mr. McDUFFIE, was taken up:

Resolved, That the Committee on Retrenchment be instructed to report a bill providing that whenever the first session of Congress shall continue for a longer period than one hundred and twenty days, the pay of the members shall be reduced to two dollars per day from and after the termination of the said one hundred and twenty days; and that whenever the second session of Congress shall continue for a longer period than ninety days, the pay of the members shall be reduced to two dollars per day from and after the termination of said ninety days."

Mr. McDUFFIE said that the resolution spoke its own importance, and superseded the necessity of any arguments in its support. He would, however, say one or two words on the subject. The adoption of the resolution, while it would not impair the legislative efficiency of the House, would save at least one month of the time now consumed by Congress at every long session. He had made an estimate of the saving which this would produce, and had ascertained that it would save the sum of seventy-five thousand dollars each year of its operation; and at the same time the public business would be well done. He had made another estimate—that if Congress sat five months, the average pay of the members would be seven dollars a day; this was an adequate compensation; but, if the members chose to attend assiduously to the public business, and complete it within the time prescribed, they would still receive eight dollars. The effect of this resolution, he was confident, would be to increase attention to the discharge of public business, without diminishing the pay while here. It was universally agreed [said Mr. McD.] that the "compensation law" contained at least one wise principle—that of a salary compensation instead of a per diem one. The only objection urged against it, and the cause of its unpopularity, was, that it was enacted by those who were to receive its benefit. He, however, differed from the general opinion on the advantage of the salary principle. He thought it would operate as too powerful a stimulus on members to get through the public business, and that it would be done too hastily. His proposition combined both principles, and the advantages of both without their defects. In every view of the subject, therefore, he conceived it would be one of the most effective measures of economy ever proposed by Congress, in regard to itself.

Mr. DWIGHT concurred most cordially in the principle and expediency of the proposition. The business of Congress could be as well done by the first of April as the first of June; and when once the limit was fixed for the earlier day, there would be no difficulty in completing all the business which it was proper to perform. He hoped the resolution would pass.

Mr. WHITTLESEY said, the object of the gentleman from South Carolina was to hasten the business before the House, and that he would most cheerfully unite with him in accomplishing it, in this or any other mode. But he would suggest to the gentleman whether his object would not be more certainly attained by accepting a modification that he would mention. The gentleman from South Carolina has given it as his opinion that the business of Congress may be done in four months, take one session with another. Mr. W. said, he thought if members would faithfully discharge the trust reposed in them, that it might be done in three months. We have heard much said of organizing a business party in this House, and gentlemen have patriotically tendered their services as privates; but there appears to exist a great reluctance against officering the corps. He said he was one who was disposed to put the party under complete organization. And he would propose that forty-five members enter into a solemn stipulation that they will sustain a call for the yeas and nays whenever a motion shall be made to adjourn before four o'clock. He would have this corps persevere in keeping the House in session; and if one should prove treacherous and desert, he would have him tried and shot. Notwithstanding what we have heard said about a business party, it was no longer than last Saturday that a motion was made to adjourn at about two o'clock, and, on a motion to call the yeas and nays, only thirteen were found to sustain the call, when it was known to gentlemen that there was public business of great importance to be acted on, and it was also known that there are claimants here, who will be inevitably ruined unless bills for their relief pass. We have been in session one hundred and nine days, during which time the House has met only seventy-nine days. We have enacted thirty-four laws, where the bills originated in the House, and five where they originated in the Senate; sixty-one bills are before the Senate that have passed the House, and fifty-four are before the House that have passed the Senate. The whole number of bills reported to the House is three hundred and seventy-nine, and the number of resolutions adopted is four hundred and eighty; and this mass of business is to be left unacted on, or so hastened through, that very few members will know what provisions the bills contain. The correct mode of legislating is to commence the session with a determination to attend to business—to prolong the daily session of the House, and not adjourn from Friday to Monday. The excuse offered by gentlemen for adjourning has been that they have business at the departments. Mr. W. said he came from a section of the country where some claims remained unsettled, and that he found he could generally transact the business confided to him better by writing than by a personal attendance. The business of the departments was interrupted by the calling of the members, and the officers, he did not believe, had any desire to see them. It was very rare that an answer could be given at once, and it was generally transmitted through the post office. He said he considered the excuse for adjourning over as groundless, and that the time was spent in amusement. The proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina will punish the industrious with the negligent and inattentive. He was one who believed, with the flourishing condition of the treasury, that eight dollars a day was not too much for a member to receive for his services, if his time was faithfully bestowed on the business of the House. He knew there were members who devoted day and night to mature business, and to attend to it in its progress through the House. He was unwilling that these should be curtailed in their daily allowance because others were remiss in their duties. The modification he would suggest to the gentleman is this: that no member who is not in attendance on the House when it is called to order in the morning, or who shall not be absent during the calling of the yeas and nays, without rendering a satisfactory excuse for his absence, shall be entitled to per diem pay for that day. Gentlemen need not apprehend that there is any thing humiliating in rendering an excuse to the Speaker, if they are detained from the House by business that could not be dispensed with; much less is there any thing objectionable to the most delicate sensibility in making such excuse, if the detention arises from sickness. He would go further: he would have a list of the absentees published in the papers that published the laws, so that the constituents of any member might know how he spent his time here. If the people were apprised of our neglect of duty, they would correct the evil. The object of having the House composed of two hundred and thirteen members, is to unite the intelligence of that number on every proposition that is acted on; but whoever will take the pains to examine the list of yeas and nays, will find that in most cases, unless it be on a political or on some great national question, we rarely have more than a bare majority for doing business. He would throw the responsibility on every member, and ensure his constant attendance. He said he was willing to unite in any measure that would despatch the business; but he feared the present resolution would not accomplish that object—that we should waste the time of the session until we came to the allowance of two dollars a day, and then that we should leave the business undone; and for that reason he expressed a hope that the modification suggested would be accepted by the mover of the resolution.

Mr. TUCKER said, it had been his object to fix the day of adjournment. He was gratified with the resolution offered by his colleague. The gentleman from Ohio said he believed the business of the House could be done in three months. Why, then, did not the gentleman vote for the proposition, and introduce his own plan afterwards?

Mr. GOODENOW made some remarks, which he concluded by moving the previous question—yeas, 42. So the bill was not seconded.

Mr. ALEXANDER said, that, from his experience here, and after much reflection upon the subject, his mind had been brought to the conclusion that some such principle as the one proposed in the resolution was necessary to be adopted by Congress to enable us to do justice to the interests of the nation with which we are charged. When [said Mr. A.] I first had the honor of a seat here, I was of an opinion that the compensation allowed was but a reasonable pay, considering the extravagance at that day, and the depreciation of money. But the case is now different; the value of money has appreciated, and every thing become proportionably cheaper; and I believe the only corrective against the abuse of the time of Congress and mischievous legislation of which the people have so much right to complain, will be found in the remedy proposed, which carries along its own limitation as to the period of our sessions. What [said Mr. A.] has been the fact of late years in regard to the history of our proceedings, and of which there seems to be no prospect of a discontinuance? Why, the first three or four months of the first session of Congress, sufficient for all the necessary purposes of legislation, have been usually consumed in idle and unprofitable debate, connected with one's own personal aggrandizement, or in projecting schemes for party or political purposes, little calculated to promote the public interest. We find, during the late war, when the interest of the country was concerned in conducting it to a successful conclusion, amidst the most violent opposition, Congress rarely ever sat the first session beyond what is now the usual period of the termination of our labors. We are necessarily led to inquire into the causes, and see if there exists a necessity for it or no. I can perceive but two, and two only, neither of which, in my judgment, will longer justify a continuance of the practice.

The attention of Congress having been withdrawn from the theatre of war, it was thrown upon the domestic concerns and relations of the country, with many of which it had nothing to do; and hence have sprung up all the unhappy differences, local divisions, and calamities, with which we are surrounded, that have goaded on the people to a state of desperation. This Government, from having been confined to our external relations chiefly, and a few internal regulations, has undertaken to regulate the whole labor and industry of the country, and thereby drawn within its vortex a sum of legislative powers properly belonging to State jurisdiction.

The great evil of this Government, as of every other, and of which the people are convinced more and more every day, having experienced it in a greater degree, probably, than any nation under the sun, is the immense mass of legislation with which they are afflicted. Besides four and twenty State Governments, acting directly upon them once a year, they have an annual Federal Legislature, with all its ramifications and corruptions, preying upon them with a cormorant's appetite, to a degree beyond human endurance. While I admit in theory it is perhaps the most beautiful in the world, when confined within its proper limits, in practice, I am not sure, without reform, it will prove the most tyrannical and oppressive that the ingenuity of man could have devised. What does it matter, whether the people are taxed in a republic or a despotism? It is all the same to them; and it seems that injustice, violence, and rapine can be as well exercised in the one as the other. Nay, more securely, because it works by stealth under a false denomination. Now, sir, as I have no well grounded hope of an amendment in their condition—as I perceive the same legislative course which has been pursued for several years past, is likely to be continued—the same system of taxation and unequal distribution of the funds of the nation to be kept up as heretofore, I must look out for the best protection for them that I can, against what I conceive to be their own worst enemy—too much legislation. And this, I think, will be found in the reduction of the pay of the members. I know it to be a delicate subject, which touches the nervous sensibility of every one. But if we are in earnest in the professions that were given to the people at the coming day of a reform in the abuses and extravagance of the administration of affairs, and which they have so much right to expect at our hands, let us go into the good work, and show a devotion worthy the cause in which we are engaged. After the example set us by the Executive head of this nation, who has gone forward with a firmness and decision that bespeak his character, holding this language on his elevation, that “the recent demonstration of public sentiment inscribes on the list of Executive duties, in characters too legible to be overlooked, the task of reform;” relying upon our co-operation, we should be unfaithful to the trust reposed in us, were we to halt and hesitate in so eventful a crisis. What has been done in this respect after the laborious and faithful investigation of the Committee on Retrenchment the last session, and the parting voice of the able chairman who committed to his successors the charge, with the hope that it might be prosecuted to a successful issue for the benefit of the people? Nothing but the discontinuance of the draughtsman of this House, while the other measures rest silently on your table, or sleep the sleep of death within the bosom of the committee itself. This is one of the measures they recommended to our attention.

I take it, sir, there are two principles connected with this subject, which must always enter into the character of every legislative body. The one of interest, the other of honor. If it were possible wholly to attain the latter, it would, no doubt, be the best and safest for the country. But as it is considered with us that the “laborer is worthy of his hire,” and it is not expected that any person can serve here without a reasonable compensation, the great object, it seems to me, should be to produce the happy combination of the two, in such manner, that while the one offers a sufficient inducement for talents and virtue, the other destroys the temptation. This, I think, will be accomplished by the proposition now before us.

Moderate salaries are consistent with the spirit and principles of our institutions; and in proportion as the value of our own pay is enhanced, does it regulate every thing else connected with the operations of Government. I confess that I have no faith in any improvement being made in other respects, until we direct our attention here. I do not say that it will be proper to follow up this example in regard to all the other officers of Government, as proposed by a resolution now on your table, because these, in some respects, depend upon entirely distinct principles. If they are faithful and vigilant in their respective places, it is but right that they should receive a just and adequate compensation for their services.

But the nation expects, and has a right to demand, something at our hands, in relation to those great and important expenditures which have been so wastefully and extravagantly lavished away; and there seems no likelihood, at present, of any change for the better in this respect.

As the hope is a vain one which I entertain of any thing like a recurrence to the original principles of the Government, the only safety and security for the people, that I can see, will be in the economical administration of affairs in every department thereof. And I rather think this will at last be found the only distinction between a republican and monarchical form of Government. Whether even this shall be accomplished, we have yet to learn. From the disposition that has been manifested, the progress of measures before this House, and the character of some that have passed from before us, we are met with despair even here; in what, then, I ask, have the times differed from those that have gone by? and how can we stand justified before the people, who were led to expect important and radical changes? I say nothing of the head of this administration, from whom we have the assurance that, as far as depends upon him, he will not be behind us in the great work of reform. The defect is here, and he can do but little without our aid. It is, I conscientiously believe, sir, in the pay of the members, offering an inducement to continue here longer than is necessary for the transaction of the real business of the nation, doing, as they always must, mischief, when good is unattainable. I am, therefore, for striking at the root of the evil, and making a seat become here what it ought to be, rather the post of honor than of profit. I, therefore, shall give my cordial support to the proposition now before the House, with a hope that it may be referred and acted upon.

Mr. COULTER then rose, but the SPEAKER having announced that the hour had elapsed, the discussion was arrested.

BUFFALO AND NEW ORLEANS ROAD.

On the motion of Mr. HEMPHILL, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HAYNES in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill "to construct a national road from Buffalo, by Washington city, to New Orleans."

Mr. CARSON said, the supporters of this bill urged the importance of its passage upon four general considerations, to wit: Commercial, Political, Military, and the Transportation of the Mail.

The constitutional powers of Congress to act upon this and similar subjects, have been assumed and maintained by the supporters of the bill. Upon all subjects of this kind, [said Mr. C.] involving constitutional questions, which have been discussed since I occupied a seat in this House, I have studiously avoided entering into the debates upon them. I have done so, for the very plain reason that my vocation is that of a farmer; and well knowing that it required professional science and deep research to elucidate and give satisfaction upon those critical points upon which men of eminence, patriotism, and distinction differ. Under these circumstances, I may well be permitted to be, if not without hope, at least too dif-fident of my own opinion upon constitutional questions, to trouble the House with the reasons upon which they are founded. Yet, as I am the representative of an intelligent and most excellent community, and as I have to act under the obligations of an oath "to support the constitution of the United States"—that charter under the guaranties of which we can alone act here—it is incumbent upon me to look into that charter, and well examine the powers which it extends to us, and to act in accordance with my own views, however crude; for, sir, on all questions in which conscience is involved, the decision must be made by that tribunal, from which there is no appeal; and however great our respect and deference for the opinions of others, in cases of this kind, we are thrown back upon ourselves, and must alone depend upon our own views of right or wrong.

But, whatever my views may be of the constitutional powers of Congress, or however adverse to bills of this kind, I feel that it would be wholly useless to urge them here; and if I should not be suspected of an attempt at rhetorical flourish, I would say, that you might as well attempt to dissolve those marble columns which support the canopy of this hall, by blowing upon them the breath of your nostrils, as to convince, by force of argument or powers of eloquence, those who have made up their opinions, or who, from the force of circumstances, will not be convinced.

Yes, it would be worse than idle; for all the experience which I have had upon this floor but strengthens me in the conviction, that if ever constitutional arguments are argued with effect, it will be in other halls—not this. But do not infer any thing like a spirit of disunion in me, from this remark—far from it. I look upon that as the last resort, resulting from insufferable oppression, which a minority may be forced or driven to, when it would cease to be patriotism to submit. But, should that ever arrive, (which may God of his infinite mercy avert!) may we not justly fear that the world may then bid a long farewell to all republics, and to the rights of man?

But, whilst I disclaim any thing like a disposition to disunion in the remark, it may be proper here to say that it partakes something of the nullifying doctrines, which, while they are more pacific in their nature, will be found to be, in my opinion, as effectual in their results. Upon a more proper occasion, I may give my views fully upon this subject of "nullification," as it has been denominated in the other branch of this Legislature. But, as I am somewhat the creature of impulses, I shall be governed, in this particular, by subsequent feeling and reflection.

My design is to speak of the expediency, or rather inexpediency, of this measure; not that I can add any thing to the powerful argument of the justly distinguished gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. P. P. BARBOUR] for the grounds which he took were so fully and ably occupied, that he has left little to be said by others. I shall, however, take the same side of the question; not that I shall be able to shed a new ray of light upon the subject, but for the reason that the bird of more humble flight may sometimes see what the eagle overlooks.

The supporters of this bill do not claim the power under which they act, as expressly delegated by the constitution, but as an incidental power; or, in other words, as a mean necessary to carry into effect some of the expressed powers.

Admitting this position to be correct, and which I do to a certain but limited extent, the question then naturally arises, does the exigency of the country demand at our hands the exercise of those incidental powers, or the use of those means, to effect any of the objects contemplated by those powers expressly delegated? And if so, another question will also arise: Will this road meet those exigencies, and effect the object? To both of these propositions, I answer in the negative most positively. There, is no necessity which demands at our hands the application of the public funds for purposes of this kind. Neither the "common defence," nor the "general welfare," demands it. And if the security of either of the points, to which this road is contemplated to be constructed, did demand the exercise of those powers, and the application of our treasure, I ask in the name of common sense, sir, if this road, a mere paltry earthen way, would afford the security desired?

But, four general considerations have been urged in support of the bill, and they may truly be said to be most pliant considerations; for they are brought to bear upon all subjects of internal improvement, requiring the public lands or the public money.

It shall be my object to show that not one of those considerations requires that this road should be made. I shall take them up in the order in which I find them in the report of the engineers made to this House at the first session of the nineteenth Congress. And the first in order is its commercial advantage.

It has been gravely maintained that this road is all important as a line of intercommunication between distant points for the facilities of commercial intercourse, and the transportation of produce and merchandise. Now, sir, admitting the constitutionality and the propriety of making roads for commercial purposes, is there any one who seriously believes that this, or any other road, can possibly be brought to compete, successfully, with the mighty father of rivers, and its tributary streams? What, sir! change the channel of produce from the finest rivers in the world, with the powerful agency of steam, propelling boats hundreds of miles in the twenty-four hours, with a mere "earthen" road! When the mighty Missouri shall turn her current back upon her source, and force a passage through the Rocky Mountains, and empty her vast tribute of waters into the Pacific, and the beautiful Ohio shall be brought through the tunnel proposed to be cut by the gentleman from Virginia, [MR. MERCER] and pour her waters into the Chesapeake, then, and not till then, let the gentleman propose the construction of roads through that region of country for commercial purposes.

But what kind of road have we proposed to us by this bill? "An earthen road," sir. Yes, sir, a miserable, paltry, earthen road. The honorable chairman and his committee have not only fallen far in the rear of the march of science and the arts in road making, but they have gone entirely back to olden times. Earthen roads were the first system of intercommunication known to man. They were superseded by turnpikes, as they are called, which consisted in the application of stone, gravel, and other materials, which improved the foundation, and made it capable of bearing greater weight. Mr. McAdam has improved upon those roads, by a peculiar and regular method of preparing and applying the stone; and from his celebrity in his improvements, has arisen the name of McAdamized roads.

But, above all, is that highest effort of the human intellect, in perfecting a system of road intercommunication, which, for ease, safety, and expedition, challenges the astonishment and admiration of the world.

That system which has outstripped canals, and ruined their stocks in England; and that system which will supersede canals here, as well as all other systems of the kind, which have been devised by human ingenuity—yes, sir, the honorable gentleman from Virginia [MR. MERCER] must hear the appalling, the heart-rending fact, that this mighty monument, (Chesapeake and Ohio Canal,) which, for years, he has been laboring with a zeal and exertion to erect to his memory, and which, no doubt, he had fondly hoped would transmit his name down to the latest posterity, must fall, and must give place to the superior improvement of railroads. I could sympathise with that gentleman, if I did not believe that a remedy is within his reach; that is, to give up his exploded canal system, and embrace the railroad plan; and a most happy opportunity now awaits him. Let him unite the interest of the company over which he now presides, with that of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, and, by a unity of action and community of feeling, they will find their interests mutually advanced, and the most happy results growing out of the arrangement. I hope I shall be pardoned for this digression. But let me ask the honorable chairman who introduced this bill, [MR. HEMPHILL] how he can reconcile it to his vast notions of grand and magnificent internal improvements, and the resources and capacity of this Government to prosecute them, to an indefinite extent, as he set forth in his speech? But what is more, how can he reconcile it to himself, to fall so far behind the advance of the age in improvements, as to propose an "earthen" road as a means to facilitate commerce, and promote the "common defence and the general welfare?" Now, if the gentleman had proposed a plan for the construction of a railroad, on some plan commensurate with the greatness and resources of this nation, there would have been some plausibility in his arguments. But, upon what have we heard his beautiful theories and high wrought figures exhausted? Why, upon an earthen road—a road of mud, liable to be washed by every shower, and subject to the vicissitudes and casualties incident to every season.

Before I take leave of this branch of the subject, I ask leave to read a brief passage from the report of the engineers; we shall then be able to judge of their views as to the commercial importance of this road.

I read from the report of the engineers, which may be found in the 9th volume of Executive papers, session of 1825-1826, document 156, page 22. "In relation to external commerce," say the engineers, "it appears to us that a road from Washington city to New Orleans will not afford, as to transportation, advantages of national importance; for the road will cross generally all the main water-courses perpendicular to the coast; and in the directions and by means of which all the transportations are effective which relate to operations of external commerce."

"However, we have remarked in the foregoing part of this report, that the main watercourses were crossed by the eastern route at the head of sloop navigation, and by the middle route at the head of boat navigation, therefore a road in the direction of either will accommodate the districts through which it passes, for the transportation of their products to the navigable streams. Under this local (mark the words, gentlemen, local, not general) point of view, the external commerce will become benefited to a certain extent," &c.

Thus we see that, in the view of the engineers, this road would not ensure benefits general in their character, but such as are merely local; and even that, no further than to afford districts through which it may pass the advantage of transporting their produce to the navigable streams.

This being the case, is there any one who will press the application of the national treasure (which should never be disbursed only with a view to national objects, wherein all the parts are equally benefited) to purposes local in their character, and that to a limited extent? It would be merging the "general welfare" into local welfare, and, against all principle, the greater into the lesser.

Next in order are "political considerations." I shall be brief upon this branch of the subject, as there is only one prominent consideration, in a political point of view, which can be urged, which is, that roads and canals will operate as bonds of union, and more strongly cement us together, and prevent a falling off of the parts. Without stopping to controvert the correctness of the position, it certainly presupposes one of two things: either that there is a disposition in the States to fly off from the centre, or a repulsive action at the centre to throw them off, and hence the necessity of these additional bonds of union.

Nothing, in my opinion, is to be apprehended from the former; would to God I could say so much for the latter? If ever the calamities of disunion should be experienced by this nation, the causes, proximate and remote, will be traced to the action of the Federal Government.

The mismanagement of this central machinery, so beautiful in its conception, and so perfect in its structure, and which worked so harmoniously whilst kept within the legitimate sphere prescribed by those rules expressly laid down for the government of its action, will alone produce those fatal consequences. By overleaping here the constitutional boundaries so clearly defined, by throwing the whole machinery out of gear, and giving a looseness to our operations, propelled on by the force of combined interests, composing a majority, against a minority, the latter will be compelled to take refuge under the old relation in which the States stood to each other; that of separate, distinct, and independent sovereignty. The States themselves will cling to the Union whilst there is a hope left to rest on; the oppressions of this Federal Government can alone drive them off.

Perhaps if there were ever a crisis in the affairs of our Government which required additional bonds to hold us together, that crisis is now at hand. But if this road is to be the remedy, the committee have certainly mistaken its proper location. Western Virginia and Eastern Tennessee are not about to fly off from the Union, and therefore do not require this work; if danger is to be apprehended, it is from another quarter. The South is the point to which we should direct our attention. Certainly every political consideration would direct us to the metropolitan route. We must encircle South Carolina with some band, or she, from report, will be off at a "tangent," and that suddenly. But let me seriously ask of every member of this committee, what stronger bonds of union do freemen need, or the States require, than those forged out, wrought, and put in order by the master workmen of the revolution? Link connecting link, forming a chain of Government more beautiful in its principles, and beneficial in its results, (whilst acting within the limits of the original design,) than any ever devised by the wisdom of man. What was this design? It was, that all the parts should share in equal proportion the benefits or injuries resulting from the compact; a perfect reciprocity was to be observed and preserved. Under a strict observance of those sacred principles, sir, what have we to fear? I answer nothing, either from external or internal causes. If fears are to be entertained, they are upon the other side of the question; and let me here admonish gentlemen who are seeking to provide additional bonds of union, by cutting canals and constructing roads, to beware lest they by their operations cut the ligaments of the constitution which now binds us together, and which forms the only sure and certain ties by which we can remain united. No political consideration, therefore, in my opinion, does require the construction of this road; but, on the contrary, eminently demands the rejection of the bill.

"Military considerations" are the next in order, and to which I shall ask the attention of the committee.

The honorable chairman [Mr. HEMPHILL] set out by telling us that the two points to which this road is contemplated to be run, are dangerously situated, and eminently exposed in case of invasion, &c., and that this is important as a military road for the transportation of troops and munitions of war. With regard to the exposed situation of New Orleans, I beg leave to differ entirely with the honorable chairman. As to Buffalo, I know but very little about it; nor have I sought to know, because I looked upon that end of the road as having been tacked on by the committee, nearly as a means of buying up votes, and not that the necessity of the nation required the work. I shall leave that end, therefore, in the hands of others.

So far from New Orleans being in an exposed situation, I do say, and I say it without the fear of contradiction, that it is the most strongly fortified place in the nation. Every pass leading from the Gulf of Mexico to the city, is well secured by the best and most costly fortifications. There are no less than five forts (I believe I am not mistaken in the number; if I am, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WHITE] will correct me) erected for the security of that city against maritime or other invasion from the Gulf. These forts are capable of mounting some hundred pieces of ordnance, at least enough to sink any fleet that would ever attempt a passage up the Mississippi to the city. We have already expended near two millions of dollars in defending the territory of Louisiana by permanent fortifications, and estimates are now before us for a continuation of those works.

The following is a statement of those expenditures, politely furnished at my request by a gentleman of the Engineer Department. (Mr. C. then read the following letter:)

"To the Hon. S. P. CARSON,
House of Representatives:

DEAR SIR: The following statement will show you pretty nearly the cost of defending the territory of Louisiana by permanent fortifications, viz.

Fort Wood, at the Chef Menteur Pass,	$ 411,673 11
Fort Pike, at the Rigolets Pass,	359,393 14
Fort Jackson, Plaquemine Bend,	624,064 53
Battery at Bayou Bienvenue,	96,447 80
Tower at Bayou Dupre,	16,677 41
Amount appropriated,	1,508,255 99
Add for a fort on Grand Terre, Barataria, estimated at	264,517 52
For a fort, in place of Fort St. Philip, at Plaquemine Bend, estimated at	77,810 79

The estimate for one of those works, (Fort Jackson,) for the present year, is eighty-five thousand dollars. Thus we see, sir, that the attention of the Government has been directed to the defence and protection of that point, and that the fact, as stated by the honorable chairman who introduced this bill, with regard to the "exposed situation" of that city, does not exist. Now, as regards the necessity of this road for the transportation of troops and munitions of war, I here take upon myself the responsibility of pronouncing, although in contradiction to the position of the gentleman who introduced the bill, [Mr. HEMPHILL] that no such necessity exists; and I further say, that it would not only be idle, but the extreme of folly, to expend money upon this road with a view to military advantages.

What say gentlemen who urge this branch of the subject? Why, "that New Orleans must always look to Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio, &c. for men and provisions to protect and feed them in time of war." Well, I grant this; but what further do they urge? Why, "that this road must be made to transport these troops and provisions upon." Now can it be possible that any man, in his sober senses, and under the influence of reason, can, for one moment, entertain the belief that, if this road were made, even one soldier or solitary barrel of provisions, from Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio, or any other State north of those, would travel over it? What! bring men from the State of Ohio across the States of Kentucky and Tennessee? Aye, and across the Ohio river, too, with its current teeming with steamboats, ready to waft the soldiers and provisions to the point of destination. But no, they must trudge through the muds of Kentucky and Tennessee, by marches of from ten to fifteen miles per day, till they intersect this road (after crossing navigable and inviting rivers) at Florence, Alabama; and then they will have the peculiar advantage of travelling this superb national earth-road from thence to New Orleans.

I invite gentlemen who think despatch and saving of time important in military operations, to calculate how long it would take troops to get to New Orleans by this "national road" from Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio, &c., and compare it with the ease, convenience, and despatch, afforded by steam power on the navigable rivers which pass through those States and empty into the Mississippi. It cannot be denied that troops from any part of Kentucky or Ohio could get to New Orleans by steamboat conveyance before they could reach Florence, in Alabama, the point of intersection with this road. Under this view of the case, the positions laid down by the honorable chairman, [Mr. HEMPHILL] with regard to the "exposed condition" of New Orleans, and the necessity of this road as affording means of defence, fall to the ground, and the whole superstructure of argument based upon them falls also.

If further arguments were necessary to show the impropriety, nay, the excessive folly, of making this road for military purposes, they would be found by a recurrence to the history of our last war, particularly in the operations in the southern section of the Union. There was a time when New Orleans was "dangerously situated and eminently exposed;" there was a time, sir, when that city was invaded by a powerful and well disciplined army; an army, too, stimulated to action by the "booty and beauty" which were promised them. This was a case of great emergency—this was a time of deep and dreadful anxiety; but sufficient for the occasion were the spirits convened, and hastily convened, for the defence of the city. Yes, an army was convened, defeated the enemy, and saved New Orleans. What military road, made at vast expense of time and treasure, were those troops transported over? None; yet they got to New Orleans, fought the battles of their country, and got home again; and thus will it be ever; this country will always find security in the strong arm of her "citizen soldiers." Dangers may stand thick around them; they only stimulate to exertion. The noblest deeds are done upon the most dangerous emergencies, and the glory of achieving them is the strongest incentive to action. Need I say more? Does the history of all ages that have gone before us, present a solitary example of a nation, at peace with the world, and whose policy it is to cultivate and maintain those pacific relations, preparing for the transportation of troops by large expenditures of public money for the construction of roads in this time of profound peace? But, on the contrary, does not all history prove that the first generals the world has produced, asked not roads over which to transport troops for the advancement of their military operations? Let me ask, what engineers designated the route, or what nation appropriated the funds, to construct a passage over the Alps for Hannibal and his Carthaginians, when he pushed his conquests to the very walls of Rome? Or who directed Cæsar to the point at which to pass the Rubicon, when he pronounced that "the die was cast," and struck the fatal blow at the liberties of his country?

But to come down to the present time—to things which transpired but yesterday, on the other side of the water. Did Nicholas tax his subjects to raise a revenue to open those passes through the Balkan, over which Diebitsch led that army which shook the Ottoman empire to its centre? and which, had they not been stopped by pacific measures, and, I might add, by the interposition of other European powers, jealous of the rising greatness and resources of the Russian empire, the christian flag would this day have been waving on the walls of Constantinople? It is by the energy of powerful minds and capable commanders, that armies are led to victory and glorious achievements; not by roads, for they might lead to defeat as well as victory. And here let me remark that those facilities to military operations are always occupied by the strongest; and such a work might prove a curse, instead of a blessing, (as was proven, said a gentleman standing near Mr. CARSON [Mr. DAVIS, of South Carolina] upon the Bladensburg course last war.) Yes, [resumed Mr. C.] but I would rather lose the argument afforded by the mention of that disagreeable subject, than wound the pride of the House by recalling their recollection to it.

The "transportation of the mail" is the next and last consideration to which I shall ask the attention of the committee.

I feel that my strength is failing me too much to go into this branch of the subject to the extent I had desired. I will lay it down as my opinion, however, that the framers of the constitution did not intend, by the words "establish post offices and post roads," to confer the power to construct roads, &c., but only meant that Congress should designate the roads over which the mail should be carried, and the points at which it should be opened. I shall not attempt an argument, sir, to prove the correctness of this construction, but it being mine, it is sufficient to govern me.

The first inquiry which suggests itself with regard to the expediency of constructing this road for the transportation of the mail, is, does any necessity for impediment exist to the transportation of the mail, which requires the application of this sum of money to remove or remedy?

Has the Post Office Department complained of a want of facilities in this particular, and asked the construction of a road at our hands? Or have they even suggested the propriety of the appropriation of any sum of money for purposes of the kind?

They have not; but, upon the contrary, we are informed by the very able report of the distinguished gentleman who presides over that department, that the facilities are now ample, and will be increased as the means of the department will justify, or the public interest shall require. I ask the attention of the committee while I read part of that report, which treats of the very subject now under consideration.

[Mr. C. read the following extract from the report of the Postmaster General:]

"The mail communication between New Orleans and the seat of the General Government, by way of Mobile and Montgomery, in Alabama, and Augusta, in Georgia, will, from the commencement of the ensuing year, be effected three times a week, affording comfortable conveyances for travellers, and the whole trip performed in the period of two weeks, each way, through the capitals of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia.

"Lines of four-horse post coaches will also be established, from the first day of January next, to run three times a week, both ways, between Nashville and Memphis, in Tennessee. This improvement was deemed important to keep a regular and certain intercourse between the Western States and New Orleans—Memphis being a point on the Mississippi to which steamboats can come at all seasons of the year; it being contemplated to extend this line to New Orleans by steamboats, so soon as the means of the department will justify, and the public interest shall require it. To give greater utility to this improvement, a weekly line of coaches will also be established at the same time from Florence, in Alabama, (where it will connect with the line from Huntsville,) to Bolivar, in Tennessee, at which point it will form a junction with the line from Nashville to Memphis."

Now, what more can be required? Does not this report also prove that steam navigation will supersede roads for all purposes, wherever it can find water for the boats to run on? The despatch and quickness of steamboat passage from Memphis to New Orleans has drawn the attention of the Postmaster General to that point; and it is already viewed as the route which can be travelled with most expedition, because of the advantages of steam power. Does not this speak volumes against the expenditure of public money upon roads, when it must be manifest that they never would be travelled for the purposes pretended here as the strong reasons for constructing them? It may be possible that, with regard to despatch and saving of time, a direct road from this place to the Mississippi river, thence by steamboats to New Orleans, would be the best. But, taking this as granted, it does not prove the necessity of our constructing a road for the purpose. Roads are already made. The mail is now transported from this to Nashville, Tennessee, seven times a week, in post coaches, at a cost of upwards of thirty-four thousand dollars per annum; and this line, sir, as we see from the report just read, is to be continued three times a week to Memphis, and from thence to New Orleans by steamboats. What more is wanting? or what more, in modesty, can be asked?

I shall now turn my attention to the relative merits of the different routes; and, if this road is to be made, I think I can show the propriety of selecting the most direct, practicable route.

For all purposes, connected with the transportation of the mail, the saving of time, cost of construction, distance, &c., the most "direct, practicable route," as proposed by the amendment, I had the honor to lay upon your table some days since, and which was printed by order of the House, and which I shall offer to the committee before I take my seat; is certainly the preferable one.

I lay down, then, as incontrovertible facts, that the route I propose will be better, the cost of construction less, the distance less, and the number of inhabitants accommodated much greater.

Now, if I establish these positions, what member can refuse to vote for the amendment, whether he be for or against the bill?

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ISACKS] has clearly established the correctness of my three first positions, (as to the goodness, cost, and distance,) and the engineers who made the reconnaissance of the different routes have proven the fourth, (the number of inhabitants to be accommodated.) The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ISACKS] said (and I truly thank him for the argument) that on the east of the mountains we had a fine level surface; that nature, in her works, had been kind to us; we had nothing to do but throw up a little sand, and we had fine roads, &c. With him, [he said] and his constituents, and the people along the route selected, it was very different; they had mountains and limestone to contend with, and natural obstructions, which required the hand of art to alter, and render them in a condition for the use and advantage of the country, &c. &c., and therefore the western route was the proper one. In answer to this argument, I have nothing to offer; the gentleman has granted all I ask--nay, more, sir, I did not intend to disparage his route, by portraying the lofty mountains and the quantities of limestone, which it would cost millions to make a road over, but only meant to urge, what cannot be denied, that the direct route is unquestionably the nearest; that the east side of the mountains afforded abundant materials for the construction of a road; that the surface was better, and the graduation more easy, than on the west side of the mountains; and that the cost of construction would be much less. The engineers support me in these positions; and what they have failed to do, has been abundantly supplied by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ISACKS.] With regard to the population, sir, to be accommodated by this road, I beg leave to read from the report of the engineers, (the same as before recited,) page 22:

"Leaving out the States (say the engineers) of Louisiana and Mississippi, and the District of Columbia, the States accommodated directly by the eastern and middle (or direct, as I propose) route will be (census of 1820)--

Virginia, the population of which is	1,065,336
North Carolina, do.	638,829
South Carolina, do.	502,741
Georgia, do.	340,989
Alabama, do.	127,901

Making	2,675,796
The States directly accommodated by the western route, will be
Virginia, - - - -	1,065,336
Tennessee, - - - -	422,813
Alabama, - - - -	127,901

Making 1,616,050"

This shows a difference in favor of the direct route, of one million fifty nine thousand seven hundred and forty-six of a population to be accommodated by this road.

[Here Mr. BLAIR, of Tennessee, requested Mr. C. to read further from the report, with regard to the States that would be indirectly as well as directly accommodated.]

Mr. C. resumed. I am requested by my honorable friend from Tennessee, [Mr. B.] I say my friend, sir, because I know him to be so, to read further from this report. I will do so, and I assure my friend that due deference shall be paid to his route, (western route.)

"But (say the engineers) if we add Kentucky and Georgia, which will be indirectly accommodated by the western route, we shall have for the population accommodated, both directly and indirectly, by this route,

Virginia, - - - -	1,065,336
Tennessee, - - - -	422,813
Alabama, - - - -	127,901
Kentucky, - - - -	564,317
Georgia, - - - -	340,989

Total 2,521,386"

Now, even with the addition of the population of the State of Kentucky, which they say is to be indirectly accommodated, there is a balance still in favor of the direct route, of a population directly accommodated, of one hundred and fifty-four thousand four hundred and forty.

But why does my friend from Tennessee [Mr. BLAIR] press this indirect consideration upon the House? Does he not know, sir, that Kentucky cannot be benefited, either directly or indirectly, by this road? And does he not further know that the State of Kentucky would never have been mentioned, if it had not been to effect political results, favorable to the men in power when this report was made? Does my friend recollect who was Secretary of State at that time? and the exertions made to continue his influence and control over the State of Kentucky? Was not every branch of the "American system" brought to bear upon her, and particularly this branch of internal improvement?

Those were the causes which produced this report, or the name of Kentucky would never have been mentioned. But the times were dangerous, the "line of safe precedent" was threatened, and every nerve was exerted to arrest the blow; but all, all would not do; the line was broken, and it is matter of deep surprise to see those who gave their aid in producing the result, now using the same flimsy, futile, and disingenuous arguments which were resorted to by those persons, with a hope of continuing their power, merely to effect sectional objects, or with a view of producing benefits to themselves and their constituents.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BLAIR] also said that nothing had ever been done to advance the interests of his constituents, or his State, by this Government. The gentleman has surely forgotten that four hundred thousand acres of land in Alabama, equal to six hundred thousand dollars, were appropriated by this Government for the opening of a canal round the Muscle shoals, on the Tennessee river; and that the completion of that work would admit steam navigation into East Tennessee. One steamboat has already been (as I am informed) so high up the Holston as a place called the Boat Yard, which is the district of my honorable friend, [Mr. BLAIR.]

[Mr. B. here corrected Mr. C. and said the boat had only ascended as high as Knoxville.]

I thank the gentleman for the correction. I had mistaken the point, but it does not weaken the argument; for the streams leading from the district represented by that gentleman to Knoxville are navigable, and boats are daily passing them. I heard a fact stated the other day, by a highly intelligent gentleman who resides near Abingdon, Virginia, while conversing with the Vice President and some other gentlemen, "that he had started at one time forty boats, each containing one hundred barrels of salt, from a point on the north fork of the Holston river, fifteen miles above Abingdon, which salt was probably to supply North Alabama, and part of Tennessee. I mention this fact, as an answer to that part of the argument of the gentleman from Tennessee, which related to the transportation of salt from the salt wells in Virginia. Certainly, if this road were made, no one would think of transporting salt by wagons, incurring the expense of teams, &c. which could not haul more than ten barrels at most, when they could send one hundred barrels by one boat. But why talk of those considerations which are merely sectional in their character? They should have no bearing in this case, if, indeed, the work is national. But, who will say, after witnessing the whole proceeding of the committee which introduced this bill, that national considerations were the causes which induced them to report this bill, and to make the selection they have done for the location of the road?

National considerations have nothing to do with it; it is the offspring of a combination, based upon local considerations, for the accommodation of gentlemen who compose part of the committee, and through whose districts this road is to run; and the location fixed on was for their accommodation, not for the nation. Yet we are called on now to appropriate millions of the public money (two million two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars is the sum wanted for the present) to promote the interests of certain sections of the country, and to subserve the views of combined interests upon this floor. I say combined; and, if any have doubted the fact before, has not the introduction of this bill, for a lateral route, leading from "Zanesville, Ohio, to pass through Lexington, Kentucky, Nashville, Tennessee, and to intersect this road at Florence, Alabama," put the seal upon the arrangement, and developed the matter, in bold relief, before every eye not blinded by interest or other motive?

But look who compose the committee who produced these bills. See the States they are from, and the sections of States they represent;* then couple the routes and circumstances together, and tell me if there is room left to entertain a doubt as to the causes which have produced the effect. I will push this subject of combination no further, lest the feelings of some personal friends might not escape unscathed. I desist, therefore, not that I fear the contest, or doubt the results, but for the reason just mentioned.

I have endeavored to show that the considerations urged by the supporters of this bill did not exist, or at least did not exist to that extent which required at our hands the application of the public money. How far I have succeeded in my feeble effort, I must leave to be decided by those who have been so indulgent as to favor me with a hearing.

But, above all the reasons which have been urged against the expenditure of public money at this time, is there not yet another, which should sink deep upon the minds of the friends and supporters of our present illustrious Chief Magistrate? Does he not stand pledged to this nation to pay off the public debt, and to exhibit the proud and sublime spectacle to the world, of a nation out of debt; which, indeed, sir, would be "something new under the sun"—and was he not pledged by his friends, in anticipation, to effect this desirable, this important object? What said they, sir? Why, elect the plain, old republican, Andrew Jackson; he will bring "order out of chaos;" he will restore republican simplicity; will pay off the national debt, and relieve us from the necessities of high tariffs, &c. And what are those very men doing, who were foremost in exciting those expectations, and pledging him for those results? Why, sir, we now see them willing, nay, urgent, to squander millions of money, because perchance their immediate districts may receive some little benefit. In my opinion, if ever there was a man anxiously desirous to fulfil the just expectations of his friends, and to advance the general interest of this nation, Andrew Jackson is that man. But, if we go on in the manner we have started, how can he discharge those obligations, and meet the expectations of the American people?

Is not every dollar which we appropriate beyond the current expenses of the year, so much of the money which would otherwise go to the payment of the debt of the nation? If we appropriate these two millions and a quarter, where will the surplus be, or where any money, except the sinking fund, to apply to the payment of our public debt? Nay, the sinking fund, also, is to be broken in upon; that sacred guaranty, pledged to the creditors of the nation, must be taken also, and distributed among the States for purposes of education. [Here Mr. ISACKS said he was not aware of any such intention on the part of any one.] Mr. C. resumed: I allude to the resolution passed by this House, instructing a committee to bring in a bill for the distribution of the net proceeds of the sale of public lands among the States for purposes of education; and those lands were solemnly pledged by this Government to its creditors, and belong to the sinking fund, and should not be touched till every farthing of the obligation is discharged.

[Mr. ISACKS said he did not vote for the resolution.]

Nor did I charge the gentleman. I only speak of what is going on, and the effect it will have upon the administration; and I must further tell the gentlemen from Tennessee [Messrs. BLAIR and ISACKS] that if they desired (which I know they do not) to ruin and blast forever the hard-earned fame of that best of men, who, upon all occasions, has proven his disinterested devotion to his country and to his friends, they could not have fallen upon a better plan than this, of appropriating money, leaving him powerless, and without the means of doing that which he stands pledged to do.

Are they prepared to hear him exclaim, as did Cæsar, (when he was struck by, as he thought, his best friend,) "and you, too, my son?" Will they bind him in fetters, and leave him, mangled and bleeding, to the mercy of his political enemies, who would glory in the spectacle? If I believed them prepared for this, the line of separation should be eternally drawn between them and me. I supported the election of General Jackson; because I believed him honest and meritorious, and I shall support his administration, because now I know him to be so; and he will realize the expectations of his friends throughout the nation, if his friends here, by their misguided policy, do not prevent him. My strength has failed me; I am done. I only ask leave to tender my thanks to the committee, and to offer the amendment which is on your table.

Mr. CRAIG said, he should play the hypocrite were he to attempt to disguise the interest he felt in the bill under consideration. Many of the people whom I represent [said Mr. C.] have a deep and direct interest in the road which it proposes to establish; and if, under existing circumstances, I did not give it my humble support, I should feel a conscious conviction of misrepresenting their interests, and of betraying the trust with which they have honored me.

The representative, according to my political creed, is bound, in all cases, except where the constitution interposes barriers, in this or any other body, to reflect the wishes and interests of his constituents, and not his own individual views. To do this is happily felt by me not to be less a duty than a pleasure.

Although I am one of those who construe the constitution as denying to Congress a general right to make roads, even though their extent invests them with the characteristics of nationality, yet the peculiar combination of circumstances which exists in relation to this subject, at this time, rids my mind of all scruples upon this point.

The constitutionality of the measure, as I conceive it, is not now involved. The question is not whether Congress possesses, under the constitution, power to make this road; but it is, more properly, has Congress a right to re-distribute the surplus money in its treasury, beyond what may be necessary to defray the ordinary expenses of the Government, and what may be applied to the extinguishment of the national debt, among the people of the Union?

A little reflection will satisfy you, sir, that the appropriation of money involved in this bill is an evil (if it be an evil, as some apprehend it to be) which has its root in the existing revenue system. So long as the present tariff of duties is maintained, it is manifest that we shall find in our treasury a large annual residuum, after all ordinary appropriations have been made. And who can doubt, after what has occurred here, in this session of Congress, that it is the fixed determination of a majority of this body, and, by inference, the determination of a majority of the people of the United States, to persist in the existing tariff system? The question, then, unavoidably occurs, what disposition ought to be made of this surplus money? Surely no one will contend that it ought to lie rusting in our coffers; none will contend that, after it has gotten there, the constitution will require it to remain there. And to what use shall we appropriate it? Can we appropriate it to any more valuable use than to internal improvements?

I would myself have preferred that this surplus of revenue should have been apportioned out amongst the several States, according to their population, for purposes of internal improvement; but in this we, who construe the constitution rigidly, are opposed by a majority. Congress now, as to all practical effects, possesses the power to appropriate the money of the public treasury to objects of internal improvement, as fully as if the constitution, in so many words, gave that power. Nor has this power been dormant. It has been exerted in a variety of instances.

The money collected into the public treasury from imports, &c. belongs to the people in the mass; and it becomes our duty to return it to them by that mode that will most equally distribute it among them, and, at the same time, effect for them the greatest general good. In no way, does it seem to me, can this end be more advantageously attained, than by expending it upon a work like that proposed in the bill under consideration. The road will extend from the northern to the southern extremity of the Union, and, as a road, will accommodate a vast proportion of its citizens; besides, the money expended in making it will be as generally scattered among the people as it could be by being appropriated to any object or improvement whatever. It is utterly impossible, after having collected by taxation a sum of money from the people, ever to return it to them again individually, in the proportion in which it was taken from them. The nearest approach that can be made to such a distribution is to be effected by throwing it into general circulation, and leaving it to the influence of individual enterprise to control its particular destination. It seems to me, then, that we cannot adopt a better policy, at this time, than to put it to general circulation a few hundred thousand dollars annually of the people's money, by constructing with it, for their accommodation, this great national road. You will then have the pleasure of reflecting that you have returned to them not only their money, but, along with it, a great national improvement. And here, sir, the question is not unworthy your most serious reflection, how far this capital, thus collected and thus expended, will have suffered diminution when it returns again to its legitimate channels of circulation among the people. Will it have suffered any diminution? As I view the subject, it will not. Then, if it will not have suffered any diminution, is it not a fair deduction that the road will be a clear gain to the people?

The policy of a nation, in regard to its pecuniary funds, is very different, in some important particulars, from that of an individual person. It is the policy of a nation to have on hand no greater capital than is sufficient for the emergencies of the time—it is the policy of individual persons to augment their funds as much as possible. The wealth of an individual depends upon himself—the wealth of a nation depends upon the wealth of its citizens; and whether capital be in the private pockets of the citizens, or in the public treasury, it is alike the capital of the nation. Now, if, without occasioning any sensible inconvenience or distress to the people composing the body politic, a sum of money can be drawn from them in the course of a few years, sufficient to produce a work of great national benefit, a work of the advantages of which thousands of your citizens will be highly sensible, what sound objection, upon the score of policy, can be urged against the execution of such a plan?

There have been, for many years past, large annual balances in the treasury, which have been, to the nation and the people, dead capital. On the first day of January, 1828, there was in the treasury an unexpended balance of six million six hundred and sixty-eight thousand two hundred and eighty-six dollars and ten cents; on the first day of January, 1829, there was a balance of five million nine hundred and seventy-two thousand four hundred and thirty-five dollars and eighty-one cents; on the first day of January, 1830, there was a balance of four million four hundred and ten thousand and seventy-one dollars and sixty-nine cents; and, on the first of January, 1831, according to the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, there will be a balance of four million four hundred and ninety-four thousand five hundred and forty-five dollars and two cents. Now, sir, it strikes my mind, if Congress had commenced this road four, five, or six years ago, it might, before now, have been finished; and yet no portion of the people would have been sensible of the least pecuniary loss or pressure. And now, sir, if you proceed to its construction, what pecuniary embarrassments can you expect to encounter? The whole sum estimated as necessary to complete the road is considerably short of the balance which, it is believed, will be in the treasury on the first of January next, and which must be regarded as dead capital, if not employed. What mischief, I ask, will you do? What injury to the people, or any portion of the people, will you do, by appropriating a part, or even the whole, of this balance to the construction of an improvement so valuable as that proposed by this bill will be?

But, sir, I have not yet presented this subject in its most flattering point of view, in reference to the resources of the nation. It should not escape reflection, that in five or six years from this time at most, the annual balance in the treasury will rise from four, five, or six millions, to ten or twelve, or, if the tariff of duties should be reduced to such a standard as that no one could complain of it as oppressive, to a steady balance, as I believe, of from five to eight millions. When our revenue shall thus overflow, which will certainly be the case after the extinguishment of the national debt, what course of policy shall be pursued? Will it be constitutional or expedient that a portion of the people should sit still and obstinately refuse to participate in the excess of revenue, because it was collected in a manner they did not approve?

But gentlemen say, let us prevent this unnecessary accumulation of revenue, by a reduction of the tariff of import duties, &c. Sir, it should be remembered that this tariff is suspended upon another interest, the manufacturing interest, which influences a majority of the people of the United States to continue it as a system of protection to manufactures; and, I confess, I do not see any symptoms to justify the opinion that it will be abandoned. This protecting system may, from its over-tension and consequent inaptitude to an infant and agricultural community, break down; but I am persuaded, from what I have seen here this session, that it is the determination of a large majority of the people of the United States to adhere to it.

There is another reflection which intrudes itself here, and is not to be disregarded. It is this: However justly the people of the South may hope for an amelioration of the present tariff, it were too much to expect a total abandonment by the Government of those interests which were brought into existence and nurtured by its own patronage. To abandon them suddenly to the storm of foreign competition, would be an act alike marked with cruelty and injustice, and might be justly reprobated as an act of bad faith on the part of the Government. Do not understand me here as advocating the tariff system to the extent to which it has been carried. By no means; I mean only to say that the Government, having induced the citizen, by holding out protection to such investment, to invest his capital in manufacturing operations, is bound, in good faith, if it shall find it expedient to abandon the policy, to recede from it gradually, at least so gradually as to give the capital thus employed time to seek new and more advantageous channels.

For my own part, I have always thought that the constitution was never intended to confer upon Congress the right to protect manufactures by revenue regulations, further than that protection might be incidentally afforded by the operation of a tariff of duties intended to raise a revenue for the purposes specified in the constitution. But I find myself, in relation to the tariff and internal improvements, in the situation of a mariner who is borne away by a storm which he cannot resist. Although he may be driving with the speed of the wind in a direction exactly opposite to that to which he should go to gain his destined port; yet, if he be skilful, he will not be found idly fighting against the wind and tide, but he will yield to the power, and thus acquire a velocity greater than the current; by which means his bark is made obedient to her helm, and he is enabled, in some measure, to direct her course. Here, sir, although I cannot control the circumstances and events which surround and pass me, yet, by falling into the current with them, and yielding myself in some degree to their control, I may, possibly, aided by others of similar views, give them another and better direction, in my opinion, than they would otherwise have taken.

By voting for this bill, it may happen that an expenditure of money will be made, advantageous to the country, in the welfare of which I am more directly interested, and that an improvement will be effected, which will directly diffuse its benefits through it. And I know that, to the nation, nothing in the form of money will be lost, by appropriating three, four, or six millions of dollars to this road; because, it cannot be denied, that, if the surplus money of the treasury be not appropriated to this object, it will be appropriated to some other, perhaps, of less national value; so that, at last, the whole effect of voting for this bill will but tend to decide the choice of Congress in favor of this over many objects, some of which are destined inevitably to absorb your surplus funds. If we, in the South, will not take your offered favor, others, less fastidious, in other sections, will.

I am not disposed; because the world will not go on precisely as I could wish; to fall out with it, and turn cynic. On the contrary, I find it to be the easiest and the best policy, generally, to conform in some degree to that uncontrollable state of things which I find around me. I have no idea of denying myself a fair participation in the blessings of this Government, because every thing is not done according to my notions of sound policy and constitutionality. It would be too much to expect that my opinions should rule in all things. I can estimate the respect which I owe to the opinions of other gentlemen, by the respect which I would claim for my own.

Whenever a people become so dissatisfied with their Government as to refuse to accept its benefits when tendered to them, they or their Government must be in gross error. If the Government be in such error, (a condition which cannot be induced without corruption,) it should be reformed at all hazards. If the people, or a part of them, be thus in error, the cure is to be expected from their own sobered reflections.

It has been intimated here, and elsewhere, that the people are, in some sections of the country, in such a state of inquietude as to endanger the Union. In relation to this intimation, I can only speak for those whom I know, or think I know. I cannot believe that there is any portion of the Virginians, much as I have heard since I came here of the nullifying doctrine, who meditate a dissolution of the Union, or who would not deprecate it as the severest calamity. Sir, I think I know the temper of Virginia upon this subject. I have had many opportunities to know it; and I may say, that, so far from harboring any wish adverse to the Union, her sons would be among the first, if danger threatened, to rally round its sacred standard. Nor can I do my fellow-citizens of South Carolina, to whom allusion has been made in this debate, the injustice to believe that her sons cherish any such design. It may be thought extravagant, after what we have witnessed in the other branch of Congress during the present session, but I do not hesitate to say it, as my opinion, that the approach of danger to the Union—the common palladium of their liberties—would again unite even old Massachusetts and South Carolina in those strong bonds of affection which held them together in the struggle for independence.

Go among the common people, who form the body and strength of your community, and I shall be much deceived if you do not hear another than the language of disunion, even in the South. The heated politician is not at all times to be regarded as affording fair indications of the temper of even the people among whom he resides. His inflammation is very often personal, and therefore does not threaten imminent danger to the Union. Indeed, I believe much less is meant, generally, in relation to this subject, than the language used would seem to import. It may be, and I think sometimes is, intended merely to deter from the prosecution of disagreeable measures.

Permit me here to bespeak your reflections upon these questions. If the Government, at any time, shall have engaged in a system of measures which some of us may, perchance, think impolitic or unconstitutional, will we, who think thus of that system, be justified in thwarting all its operations, and in rendering it, as much as possible, productive of bad instead of good effects? or will it be come our duty, when we, being the minority, can no longer, with any hope of success, resist the establishment of that system, to give it such a direction and such an operation, as to make it productive of the greatest public good? I do not, myself, hesitate about the answer which, in my humble judgment, ought to be given to these questions. Certainly, if, as I believe to be true upon our principles of government, the majority have the right to rule, and, consequently, a right to settle the policy of the Government, the minority are bound to lend their aid in producing the best results from any system which the majority may adopt. I do not mean to include extreme cases—such as can only exist under the influence of corruption. It is, I admit, right enough that the opponent of any system should, upon every occasion involving its propriety, directly vote to abandon it. But this, it seems to me, does not imply that it is prudent or proper to oppose every incidental measure which may grow out of it. To illustrate my idea by the very case under discussion: if the internal improvement system is to be maintained, it is proper that those who oppose it should aid in selecting the most advantageous objects of its action, and, of course, keep back those less advantageous.

I hold, sir, that the adoption of an error may make that right, which would otherwise have been wrong; or, to speak perhaps with more precision, that may be rightfully done, as resulting out of a previous error, which, if that error had not been committed, would never have arisen to be done.

I have nothing to do, in this argument, with the ulterior and unalienable right of any people to resist oppression, when they may choose no longer to endure it.

I have said that I gave such a construction to the constitution, as denies to Congress the right to make internal improvements; and have endeavored to justify myself for voting for this bill, upon the ground that that power exists in fact, (a large majority of this House, and, by inference, of the people, being for it,) and, as to all practical effects, as fully as if the constitution was without the shadow of a doubt upon the subject; and because, by so voting, I do nothing more, and intend to do nothing more, than to give a preference to this object over the many that are proposed; not doubting, as there is no room to doubt, that whether this bill pass or not, internal improvements will be carried on under this Government commensurate with its means. In this operation of my judgment, I assume to be my own casuist. My conscience is quiet.

The policy of protecting manufactures by high duties on imports, begets the necessity of creating some system of policy for the consumption of the money arising from that source. I am not chargeable with the tariff system. I found it fully established when I came here; and have since lent the aid of my vote, at three different times, for a modification of its provisions. We all know the result. I, and those who voted with me, found ourselves in a minority. What, under such circumstances, ought we to do? We cannot, reasonably, expect the majority to sacrifice their opinions to ours. It would be the merest arrogance in me to assume infallibility for my opinions. I can see no just line of conduct but to acquiesce. I am, as I have said, opposed to the tariff of 1828; but I cannot see, in justice, in reason, in conscience, why the people whom I represent, as they bear their share of its burdens, should not have their share of its profits. I do not see the line between submission to the majority, and what tends to a dissolution of the Government.

A disposition has been manifested, in this discussion, to waive the question of constitutionality, and to rest the claims of this bill upon the grounds of expediency. Such has been the course pursued by my intelligent and eloquent colleague, [Mr. P. P. BARBOUR.]

And here, sir, before I meet my colleague upon this ground, I request to be indulged in a few brief reflections upon the policy of confiding to the General Government the power to construct works of national improvement.

Although I cannot, as I have already said, see in the language of the constitution any satisfactory authority for the exercise of this power, yet I am unable to discover any good reason why this power, under well defined limitations, should not be confided to it. The mere power to make roads, canals, &c. has in it, as I conceive, no dangerous tendency whatever. The probability that such a power would benefit the States is a thousand fold that of the probability that it would injure them. The danger consists in the retention of jurisdiction over these works after they are made, not in making them. With this view of the subject, it is my present impression, that, if I were now sitting in convention, for the purpose of amending the constitution, I would vote to confer this power, limiting it to the making of the work. I would do so, as at present persuaded, for another, and perhaps more powerful reason. It consists in this: the States have, for obvious and imperious reasons, surrendered the entire regulation of their commerce to this Government; and thus have surrendered the richest and by far the most convenient and least oppressive sources of revenue. I should not, therefore, think it at all unwise to require of the General Government, in times, like the present, of extraordinary prosperity, that a fair proportion of the means derived from these sources should be made available to the States in internal improvements, or in education, where the preference might be given to that object.

The States, being dependant for their means upon direct taxation, can never effect great improvements but by producing uneasiness amongst their citizens. The United States, through their custom-houses, can collect from the people millions, by a process so magical, that the people will be wholly insensible of having paid them. And thus it would seem that, as the means of the United States are much more ample than those of the individual States, the United States ought to have the power of employing them for the good of the States.

Indirect taxation, as a mode of raising revenue, is preferable to direct taxation, not only because all classes of citizens feel the operation of the former less than the latter, but because, under the former mode, the rich citizens are sure to pay their just proportion of the revenue. They, having the ability to do so, will consume vastly more of those articles which bear heavy duties than the poorer citizens.

Under a system of indirect taxation, a person may resort to his prudence—to abstinence—for an amelioration of its burdens. He may, if he choose, abstain wholly from the use of wine, cogniac, tea, and various other articles in which the rich may choose to indulge, without materially impairing his comforts, and thus avoid subjection to a large proportion of indirect tax.

The proposition is generally true, that actual consumption is measured by the ability to consume; and as the ability is enlarged or diminished, actual consumption is increased or diminished.

Having made these remarks, I will now endeavor to answer some of the arguments used by my colleague [Mr. P. P. BARBOUR] for the purpose of showing that it is inexpedient to make the proposed road. I am sorry that this gentleman, and that other gentlemen should, on account of their opposition to it, have thought it necessary to undervalue this road. Sir, if we are to give full credit to their arguments, we could not resist the conclusion, that, if this road would not be indeed a national evil, it would be, at least, useless. The warmth of opposition, I must think, has carried gentlemen too far. The utility of this road is not to be seriously denied by any whose situation enables them properly to estimate it.

The honorable gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CARSON] has advanced the opinion that it will not be even an indirect accommodation to the people of Kentucky. My situation enables me to correct this misapprehension. I live directly upon the track along which it is proposed to construct this road; and I do know that many Kentuckians do, yearly, use this track, and that great quantities of stock are taken along it from that State to the interior of Virginia, and sometimes to Pennsylvania.

My colleague [MR. BARBOUR] asked, will this road be of any commercial advantage? It will run, [said he] a great part of its way, between the waters which flow to the East and the waters which flow to the West, crossing some of them near their head springs, at right angles; and almost in the same breath said, that if the road ran parallel with any of these navigable waters, it would be still of less commercial importance. To what does this argument amount, except to this: that although the road is most judiciously located, in reference to the interior navigation of the country, yet it is wholly useless. Who can believe this? What country was ever so situated as not to feel the advantage of good roads. The gentleman here, as indeed throughout, seems to have been under the influence of feelings excited by the warmth of his opposition.

The gentleman next intimated that the estimate of expense in the bill was far too low; that the road would, more probably, cost ten or twelve millions of dollars, than two and a quarter millions. Now, in answer to this remark, I have only to say, that, whilst it is undeniably true that ten or twelve millions will make a better road than two and a quarter millions, it is equally true that two and a quarter millions will make a very good road. Again, the expenditure of two and a quarter millions upon this road will not, as insinuated, lay Congress under any obligation to expend a further sum upon it. But if the prosperous state of the treasury hereafter, combining with other circumstances, should make it expedient, Congress may, in its discretion, appropriate additional funds to that object. I cannot see that Congress may not, as I cannot foresee that it will be wrong to do so, at some future time, say fifty years hence, if you choose, cause the whole line of this road to be Macadamized.

The gentleman further said, that the interest upon the sum proposed to be expended upon this road is more than the whole cost of transporting the mail throughout the whole of its distance, and then drew the conclusion, that it was inexpedient to make it for the accommodation of the mail. This argument, though the conclusion may be just, is, certainly, not quite fair. If the accommodation of the mail were the sole object of its construction, then the argument would be fair. But it should not be forgotten that this is but one of three objects to be effected by making the road. In addition to the advantages which are to be derived from the superior facilities in the transportation of the mail which this road will afford, are to be considered the advantages which it will afford to internal commerce, and the advantages it will afford, as a military road, in time of war. The aggregate of advantages, resulting from these three sources, constitutes the reason of the committee for reporting this bill. We all know of how much importance the despatch of the mail is, at any time, but particularly in time of war. The delay of a day may cost a city and many lives. The battle of the 8th of January, 1815, at New Orleans, was fought because despatches, which were on their way, had not reached their destination. The value of this road, in a military point of view, I admit to be, chiefly, contingent. It may, in this relation, be incalculably valuable, or not, according to circumstances.

Again: The gentleman asks, will troops ever pass from the Northern frontier to the Southern, or from the Southern to the Northern? I answer, I have no expectation that they ever will. Nor have I any expectation that many persons will, either in times of peace or war, travel through the entire line of this road. But this, I conceive, is no drawback from its value. This road is to be regarded, if you please, rather as many roads all united, than as one road: for, whilst the various sections of it will be crowded with travellers, you will rarely find one destined to pass along the whole line. This view of the subject will obviate, I think, many objections which are made to the bill.

Who would think, says the gentleman, of transporting ordnance from here to Buffalo by land, when it might be carried by water? Where is the grand canal of New York? Sir, these questions produce no difficulty. No one would be so foolish, I suppose, as to think of conveying ordnance by land when he could convey it by water. But, supposing your waters to be blockaded by your enemy, would you then deem it foolish to prefer a transportation by land to a transportation by water? I should think not.

The honorable chairman of the committee which reported this bill, having, in the course of the very interesting views which he presented to this committee, alluded to the state of internal improvements in England and France, my colleague, [MR. P. P. BARBOUR] as if determined to strip improvements every where of all claim to public favor, asked, in what countries do you find a poorer and more oppressed people, than in these? Surely, the gentleman will not seriously contend that the internal improvements of a country are disadvantageous to it. And yet, sir, what other inference can you deduce from this question? Immediately after putting this question, in the manner I have represented, the gentleman expressed his willingness, nay, anxiety, that the improvement of the country should go on. He was willing to bring roads and canals to every hamlet—to every door; but by the States themselves, and not by this Government. Now, how does this declaration comport with the question which the gentleman put to the committee relative to the pauperism of England and France? How much less, I will ask the gentleman, will this road, or any other piece of improvement, be worth, having been made by the General Government, than if it had been made by the State Governments? I never before heard it insinuated that improvements promoted pauperism. I cannot avoid thinking that the violence of the opposition which the gentleman feels to the assertion of jurisdiction over the soil of the States, by the General Government, sharpens in a high degree the opposition which he feels to this measure, on the ground of expediency; else, why such strong efforts to undervalue, to disparage, the proposed road?

The gentleman has said, that, in proportion as you remove the expenditure of money from the influence and control of self-interest, you increase extravagance. I subscribe most heartily to this proposition. Self-interest, when it can be brought to bear upon the subject, is the surest guaranty of economy in the expenditure of money. But how will the gentleman apply the principle, with any advantage, to the case under discussion? Can a State, any better than the United States, dispense with agents in executing its schemes of internal improvement? If it cannot, I should think the argument was without force. There are no means, in reference to this subject; it seems to me, which can be employed by a State, that cannot, with equal facility and advantage, be employed by the United States. The plan adopted in Virginia, and referred to by the gentleman, of requiring the subscription of three-fifths of the stock necessary to complete a work of this character, by private individuals, as a condition upon which the State will subscribe the remaining two-fifths, is wisely accommodated to the limited means of the State. But I apprehend the adoption of a similar principle here would amount to an abandonment of some of the most important objects, in a national point of view. I have already intimated that the wealth and prosperity of a nation does not always consist in the amount of money which it may have in its coffers; and that the wealth of its citizens was the wealth of the nation. Every convenience, every commercial facility enjoyed by the citizen, adds to the general stock of national wealth. Why, then, I would ask, should conveniences, commercial or personal, be withheld, when they can be so easily supplied by the Government? The gentleman himself admitted, if I rightly understood him, that the money of the treasury was collected imperceptibly from the people: if so, the complaint upon this score is rather imaginary than real. I will venture to affirm that the advantages of this road, should it be constructed, will be something more than a phantom of the imagination. Besides this view of the subject, I repeat, that funds far more than necessary for the ordinary purposes of the Government will flow in upon us, and that we must make some disposition of them.

The gentleman again said, that this system of distributing the public money was unequal in its operation, and therefore unjust. Now, it would appear to me that if this objection be sound, a system of internal improvements could not be sustained, either by the State, this, or any other Government, for the objection certainly lies as strongly against it in one place as another. Sir, all civilized nations admit the importance of internal improvements. All have practised, to some extent, under the principle of their importance; and shall we now be told, that, because in constructing them we cannot distribute the money employed upon them with perfect equality among the people, we must abandon them altogether?

Sound policy requires that the most important improvements should be selected, with due regard to national advantage, including equality of distribution of money, so far as practicable, as well as every other fair consideration, and nothing more.

Perfect equality in the distribution of the public money is not expected—is not possible.

I do not feel the force of this remark of my colleague, that exactions and contributions should be equal.

How equal? Literally and arithmetically? If he mean that they shall be literally and arithmetically equal, then I take issue with him, and without an argument will submit the question to the decision of this House. If he mean, as I presume he does, that the constitution requires only practicable equality in public exactions and contributions, then I will contend that in the construction of no work which can be selected, would a more equal distribution of the people's money be made among them, than in the construction of the proposed road. Exaction—as that is a term which belongs to the tariff, a matter which the gentleman declined to discuss—I shall permit it to sleep undisturbed.

The gentleman said it would be unjust, after he and another had, with great nicety, weighed out each one hundred pounds, in gold scales, as contributions to the Government, that that other person should take the whole sum, and appropriate it to his exclusive use.

I should certainly not differ with my colleague in opinion here. I will, however, ask the gentleman how he applies the remark to this bill? It may mean something, if it be taken as referring to the tariff; but I do not understand it in its bearing upon the proposed road. The two or three millions which will be expended upon this road, should it be made, will, instead of going into the hands of one or a few, be scattered amongst thousands.

The gentleman, as if willing to defeat this bill by any honorable means, here ridiculed the idea of applicants coming before Congress from all quarters of the Union, for internal improvements—some with propositions for national improvements—some with propositions for more national improvements, and—some with propositions for most national improvements. Sir, there is nothing in this conceit at all ludicrous or ridiculous in my mind. Improvements of all these several degrees of nationality being submitted to Congress, from which to make selections, it is to be inferred that the selections will be made from that class denominated most national.

There is, I confess, a good deal of ludicrousness in the idea of Congress roaming over the country in search of objects of this kind; but that they should be brought to its view by applicants or petitioners, is a mode of proceeding quite too common to excite risibility.

The gentleman thinks that, upon a fair division of ten millions of dollars among the States, the share of Virginia would be one million; yet, he says some portion of its inhabitants (the people of Norfolk) felt great joy when the United States subscribed one hundred and fifty thousand dollars to the Dismal Swamp canal stock, as if they had, through the mere bounty of Congress, got something that did not belong to them.

Now, upon looking over the ideas here conveyed by my colleague, the inference is to be drawn, that, instead of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, one million ought to have gone to Virginia. The idea seems not to have been present in his mind when this train of reflection entered, that from ten to twelve millions, and upwards, have been annually consumed by the national debt. He seems to have proceeded upon the idea that there had been an annual fund of ten millions to be distributed among the people. If this had been the case, the people of Norfolk would have been miserable dupes indeed, to have exulted because their State had got one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, when it was in fact entitled to one million. Such, however, was not the fact. The people got a hundred and fifty thousand dollars through the favor of Congress, rather than because, at that time, Virginia had any particular claim to a dividend from the treasury.

My honorable colleague was pleased, in the course of his eloquent speech, amongst other things, to direct our attention to old Rome, once the proudest city of the world. He asked, where is Rome, with all its splendid aqueducts, towers, and temples—Rome, that once urged its conquests almost to the Ganges? Aye, and where are the Romans themselves, who built these splendid works? They, too, are gone. They were the workmanship of the Deity, yet they have perished. Could mortality impart immortality? No. Athens, Rome, and Carthage once were, but now they are not. The reflection is melancholy, but it is irresistible. The time will come when our beloved republic will live only in history. It is the common fate of all things beneath the sun. But I do trust, that, under the blessings of a kind Providence, ages upon ages will run their ample round ere it will be asked, where, now, is the once splendid republic of North America?

As the downfall of no Government, heretofore, is to be ascribed to its improvements, there can be no just cause to apprehend such a consequence from such a cause in future. Sir, let gentlemen say what they may, it will, nevertheless, remain an unshaken truth, that internal improvements are a source of wealth and prosperity to a nation.

A well regulated system of internal improvements will, I doubt not, be found to be one of the most efficient ligaments of our Union, whilst it will give no just ground for the apprehension of consolidation, and a destruction of the State sovereignties.

If destruction shall come upon our Union, (which God forbid!) it will be alike to me whether the fault shall have been with the Federal Government, or the State Governments. Disunion is the dreaded result. It may as readily happen from the ill-devised measures and ill-timed opposition of the State Governments, as from similar causes springing out of the action of the General Government. Both sides should be alike careful to avoid this result—both animated with a spirit of conciliation and forbearance.

Mr. RAMSEY said, he did not mean to detain the committee long, nor did he intend to enter upon the constitutionality of the power of Congress to make the road contemplated by the bill. I [said Mr. R.] consider that question settled long since. I go upon the expediency of the measure. The road proposed by the bill runs about midway between the North and Western frontier and the seaboard. It is a road that will be of immense importance to this place and to the Government. It will be a welding link to solder together this Union. There is not a member in my hearing, that does not know that each State in the Union has a seat of Government within the central limits of the State, and has erected public buildings for the convenience of the legislative bodies and public officers. I take it for granted that other States have done as Pennsylvania has. Harrisburg is the capital, or seat of Government, and that State has, out of the State funds, expended very large sums to make roads and avenues to and from that place—a turnpike road by the southern route, as it is called, to Pittsburg; one by the north route to the same place; one to Lancaster, one to Reading, a bridge at Harrisburg, and one at Clark's ferry. Not less than five hundred thousand dollars of money has been expended to make roads, bridges, &c. to lead to and from the seat of Government of my State, so that every individual who had business to transact at the seat of Government might have a good, safe, and convenient way to travel over. Now, are we not sent here to legislate for the whole community, and particularly for this ten miles square, the District? Will this great, growing, and prosperous Union be behind the States? This Government, with a treasury overflowing, will it refuse to make roads and avenues to lead to and from this capital? I hope not. I do not know, nor do I believe there has been one dollar expended by this Government, to make a road from the interior to reach this place, the capital of this Union. Then, if the different States make good roads and avenues to lead from different parts of the State to the capital, on the same principle I contend that we are called on to aid in making similar provision to reach this capital, from the interior of this great and very rapidly growing nation. I hold it as an imperative duty for us to do so. Make the road from this to Buffalo, (that is, the part I will speak of,) it will run through some of the most rich and fertile valleys in the United States. You will see, in ten years or less from this time, from fifty to a hundred wagons a day, in the months of November, December, and January, in the streets of this city, loaded with iron, flour, beef, pork, whiskey, and a great variety of other articles. Would that be of no advantage to this place? Have we not our navy yard here, our marine barracks, with a great variety of other public works? And no doubt more will be built. Would it not be of vast importance that every thing from the interior should be got upon the best terms to supply those public works? And where will you get such supplies but from the interior? Yes, make this road as contemplated by the bill, and you will see wagons and teams from the district I have the honor in part to represent, in the streets of this city, one of which would load up and haul off ten of your wagons, horses, and loads, that we now see in the streets, at one load. It is said we have no right to legislate beyond this District on the subject of roads. Now, suppose Maryland and Virginia were each to pass a law to make a wall around the District, (as it is contended we cannot go beyond it,) what would we then do? Would the fine spun arguments of the gentlemen from North Carolina and Virginia keep us here, or not let us come to this capital to legislate for the whole United States? Of what use would this House, and all the public works erected here, be to the United States, if we could not get to them? What would be said of Congress, after spending from six to ten millions at this place in erecting public works, if we could not get to them for want of a road.

We have been doing indirectly that which it is contended we cannot do directly. Congress has appropriated near four millions of dollars to internal improvements, such as canals, roads, &c., and as much of the public lands as would make four millions of dollars more for roads and canals.

I ask, where is the difference between granting a sum of money to be expended under the direction of this Government to clear out the mouth of a river or creek, or the granting a sum of money to make a road? The one is to let the boat pass, and the other to let the wagon pass. And, further, where the difference between the United States making a steamboat channel to carry the United States' mail through, or the United States making a road to carry the mail over? I, for the soul of me, can see none.

It is four hundred miles from this to Albany; we are as near Buffalo at this place, (Washington city,) as when we arrive at Albany. Now, will any gentleman tell me that it is of no importance to save four hundred miles in the transportation of the mail from this place to Buffalo?

My people want this road; they want to come here with their produce; there is no direct road to this place in a northern direction; all the roads in my State lead to the seaboard. The influence of Philadelphia has caused all our public roads to point that way. Last year the Legislature of Pennsylvania nearly unanimously refused to permit the patriotic Baltimoreans to make a railroad up into that State. It is said this is to be a direct road. I can tell the gentlemen from Virginia and North Carolina, that if the Government will give me the one thousand five hundred dollars per mile that this bill proposes, I will make a road for two hundred miles from this place towards Buffalo for that sum, which they would travel forty miles out of their way, were they going in that direction, to get upon, if they did not think their consciences were to be affected by travelling on an unconstitutional road. My constituents want this road. They say they have a right to ask for it. There is money enough to make it. The people along this road have paid more money long since into the treasury than would make it. They have sent me here to speak for them, and express their wishes and desires; I do it most willingly, and honestly believing I ask nothing but what is just and right.

I expect a disinterested magnanimity from many of the members from New York. It is true this road will run through but a corner of that State: it does not lead down the canal to the city of New York; yet I hope to hear the members from that State say, much has been done for the eastern end of the State, we will not now withhold from the western end this small pittance they ask. I hope none of my colleagues will be found voting against this bill; the western part cannot, with any propriety, in my opinion, vote against it; they have had many favors extended to them out of the public treasury, and they expect many more. The eastern part I know will not, from the example set by the chairman of the Committee on Internal Improvements, who reported this bill. He has acted a highly honorable part in this project, and he merits the applause of the American nation.

I now appeal to another class of men, and I hope to see them act the part of honorable, liberal men—I mean the commercial part; they have had upwards of thirty millions of dollars given for light-houses, sea-walls, harbors, piers, wharves, fortifications, &c. to protect commerce. The State of North Carolina alone has got upwards of two hundred and eighty thousand dollars for light-houses, and I believe one hundred and fifty thousand dollars to the Dismal Swamp canal; yet gentlemen say she has got nothing. Now, can gentlemen ask me, or any other member residing off the seaboard, to vote away millions annually for the break-water, light-houses, &c. for their direct and consequential advantage, and not give to the people in the interior what they have a right so justly to ask for, that they may have some of the direct and consequential advantages from an expenditure of a part of the public money amongst them? If the deepening of channels, opening the mouths of creeks, rivers, harbors, and inlets, and the erection of light-houses and fortifications, &c. is necessary to the convenience and interest of commerce on the seaboard, and a direct advantage to the neighborhood where the money is expended, let me ask those seaboard gentlemen, if we, who reside in the interior, have not a right to ask their aid in the passage of this bill? I think none will deny that we have that.

It thinks I hear every gentleman recording his vote in favor of it. If they do not, they say to us, you may get to the seat of Government by some of the old Indian paths, or down some stream in a canal, or on the back of a pack-horse or mule. No, no, I cannot for one moment harbor such an opinion; but, as high-minded, honorable men, to whom the interior has always granted every thing they have asked for, I hope to see one and all of you come out manfully and vote for the bill, and not shelter yourselves behind the constitution; for there is no other excuse left for you, in my opinion.

I am too feeble to say more; I hope some gentleman more capable than I am will do justice to this subject.

Mr. SMYTH said, I have had no concern whatever in forming the bill now before the committee. I am to vote upon it; and I will do my duty to my constituents, the commonwealth, and the constitution. I will very briefly discuss, first, the power claimed by this Government to make roads, and assume jurisdiction over them; second, the power to appropriate money for the purpose of making roads, without assuming jurisdiction over them; third, the power to aid internal improvements, by subscribing for the stock of companies incorporated to make them; fourth, the power to appropriate money in fulfilment of a compact; fifth, the power conferred on the President by the bill; sixth, the general expediency of this appropriation; seventh, the particular utility of the road proposed to be made.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ISACKS] contends that the power to establish post roads, conferred on Congress by the constitution, is a power to make them. I contend that "establish," wherever used in the constitution, signifies, to give legal existence, or legal effect. The people "ordain and establish the constitution;" one of their objects is declared to be "to establish justice;" Congress shall have power "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization;" "the ratification of the convention of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this constitution." "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion." In all these cases, it is obvious that to establish means to give legal effect, to give legal existence, to set up by law. Congress have power "to establish post offices and post roads." Whatever be the meaning of establish, as it relates to post offices, must be its meaning as relates to post roads. The same word, used in different sentences, may have different meanings; but the same word, only once used in the same sentence, cannot have different meanings. Does power to establish post offices signify power to build, to put up brick and mortar? No, it signifies power to give legal existence to offices. So, power to establish post roads, is power to designate, by law, the roads on which the mail shall be carried; and this construction has been acted on by Congress during forty years.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ISACKS] contends that Congress have power to regulate commerce "among the several States;" and, therefore, may make roads for carrying on that commerce.

Sir, the power to regulate commerce, signifies power to pass laws controlling commerce. Laws are regulations. Regulations are laws. "No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce, or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another." The power given to Congress to regulate commerce among the States, is a power to control it, and to prevent the State Legislatures from burdening it by duties, taxes, or licenses, and so on; by which one State might oppress the inhabitants of another. Will the gentleman from Tennessee contend that to make a canoe is to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes? Will he contend that to build a ship is to regulate foreign commerce? If not, how can he contend that to make a road is to regulate commerce among the States? Sir, when it shall be proved that canoes, ships, and roads are commercial regulations, otherwise commercial laws, then I will give up this point.

Sir, if there is any question respecting the power of Congress, that has been decided against the claim of power, in a way that ought to be satisfactory, final, and conclusive, it is this. We have the authority of Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, that Congress do not possess jurisdiction to make roads. Mr. Madison and Mr. Monroe expressed their opinions in the most solemn manner, when rejecting bills passed by both Houses of Congress, assuming this power. The last act of Mr. Madison's administration was to return, rejected, a bill assuming this power. But we have not only the authority of these great names. This House has repeatedly, on great debate, decided that Congress have not the power; and there is not an act in the whole statute book that assumes it. In March, 1818, after a protracted discussion, this House decided that Congress had not power to construct post roads and military roads, by eighty-four votes against eighty-two; and that Congress had not power to construct roads between the States, by ninety-five votes against seventy-one. And when Mr. Monroe had negatived the bill establishing toll gates on the Cumberland road, and returned it with his objections, on reconsideration, a majority of the House voted against it; a satisfactory proof that it had been passed without due consideration.

Sir, as this power is claimed by implication, and as in forty years not one act has been passed that asserts it, this long nonuser should be taken as evidence that it is not contained in the grant; and we should now consider it as settled, that Congress have not power to enter into a State, assume jurisdiction, and construct roads.

I will now consider the claim of power to appropriate money to the making of roads, without assuming jurisdiction. I have not found it in the constitution. But more than fifty acts of Congress, passed during the last twenty-eight years, make such appropriations. The ground on which we, who opposed the construction which authorizes such appropriations, stood, is nearly beaten from under us. The States and the people may construe their constitution; and the construction thereof, by them, must be conclusive. The long use of a power by Congress, by the approbation of the State Legislatures and the people, may sanction the construction of the constitution by which it is assumed. I would like to see the opinion of the State Legislatures taken, to ascertain if threefourths of them admit that this power is in Congress. The people, by re-electing those who have assumed it, seem to have given it their sanction.

I will next consider the power of Congress to aid internal improvements, by subscribing for the stock of companies incorporated to make them. I have always been of opinion since I had a seat here, that Congress possessed this power as a fiscal operation, which might be necessary if the treasury was full. It is well known to my colleague, the late chairman of the Committee on Internal Improvements, [Mr. MERRICK] that such has been my opinion. If we have a surplus revenue, it would be inexpedient to have it lying in the treasury, or in bonds, unproductive. It must be a question of expediency, whether money should be thus invested; and I hold that it will be always inexpedient, when we have a debt to pay, and that debt is payable. The object of such an operation should be a profitable investment of our money. The promotion of internal improvements would be an incident. This power, duly exercised, would give to the Government command of the accumulated surplus of its revenue, on any emergency; and it would be very convenient to have fifty millions of productive stock to dispose of at the commencement of a war. This power has been exercised, and we do possess stock to a considerable amount.

I am next to consider the power of Congress to appropriate money in fulfilment of a compact. In 1802, the United States entered into a compact with the State of Ohio, on admitting that State into the Union, that five per cent. of the nett proceeds of land in that State, sold by Congress, should be applied to the making of roads from the navigable waters of the Atlantic to and through the said State, under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the States through which the road should pass; and, in consideration thereof, the State engaged to exempt from taxes, for the term of five years from the sale thereof, the land to be sold by Congress. In pursuance of this compact, the Cumberland road was made. And here again we have the authority of Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, and Mr. Monroe, who severally approved the appropriations for this purpose.

Now, sir, you have the like compact with the States of Alabama and Mississippi. That with the State of Alabama provides that five per cent. of the nett proceeds of lands within the territory, "shall be reserved for making public roads, canals, and improving the navigation of rivers, of which three-fifths shall be applied to those objects, within the said State, under the direction of the legislature thereof; and two-fifths to the making of a road or roads leading to the said State, under the direction of Congress." And, in consideration thereof, the State of Alabama has engaged not to tax the lands sold by Congress for five years; that the lands of non-residents shall be taxed no higher than that of residents; and that no tax shall be imposed on the lands of the United States. Here, then, we have a valuable consideration for the money which we shall appropriate to make this road, leading to Alabama and Mississippi. We owe a debt; we have an unquestionable right to appropriate money to pay it. This appropriation, in pursuance of our compact, is as fully authorized as the appropriation of fifteen millions for the purchase of Louisiana, made in fulfilment of a treaty.*

I will next consider the powers granted to the President by the bill. He is authorized to appoint commissioners, who are to lay out the road; he is then to take the necessary measures for the construction of the road; contracts are to be entered into, and releases obtained from the proprietors of lands. No jurisdiction is assumed; no power is given to take and condemn the lands. In adopting measures for the construction of this road, the President must pursue the authority given by this bill, or have recourse to the existing laws.

I will now notice some of the objections made by my eloquent colleague, [Mr. P. P. BARBOUR] who opposed the bill. He would dissuade Congress from making this appropriation, because there are seven and a half millions of imposts which might be repealed without touching the duties which protect domestic manufactures. Sir, many of those duties which he would thus repeal, protect agriculture; many of them are paid by manufacturers, and they are the only duties which are not imposed for their benefit. Repeal those duties, and you exempt the manufacturers from all burdens. Let me caution Southern gentlemen against repealing these seven and a half millions of duties. Such a measure would render the reduction of the imposts which oppress their people hopeless. Let the whole of the imposts be gradually reduced, so as not suddenly to affect any interest. The manufactories being brought into existence by protection, it ought not to be suddenly withdrawn.

My colleague would not follow the example of France and England, in making internal improvements. The people of those countries are depressed, and many of them paupers. Sir, it was not the canal of Languedoc that depressed the people of France in the reign of Louis XIV. That great work cost five hundred and forty thousand pounds, and was finished in fifteen years. It was the perpetual wars of Louis XIV, which, in his latter days, were disastrous. It was that despicable bigotry which drove five hundred thousand protestants from their country, and scattered their wealth and arts over all christendom. It was not the expense of making canals and roads that depressed the people of England. Canals in England are but of recent date; they are made by companies; occasionally the Government gives a small grant. It is the public debt of England that depresses the people. At the end of the year 1701 it was six millions; in 1714 it was fifty millions; in 1775 it was one hundred and thirty-five millions; in 1784 it was two hundred and sixty-six millions; it is now perhaps a thousand millions. Thus, we see that it was the wars of the American and French revolutions that have involved England in a debt which can never be paid; and this depresses her people. Her hierarchy adds grievously to the burden. The revenues of the Episcopal Church in England amount to about forty millions of dollars, paid to eighteen thousand priests; while eight thousand other priests receive about two million two hundred and twenty thousand dollars. It is not the expense of internal improvement that has reduced seven thousand of the people of Dublin to live on three half-pence each day. In Ireland, seventeen hundred episcopal priests receive five million seven hundred and seventy-two thousand dollars, extorted from agriculture, while two thousand seven hundred and thirty-eight other priests receive one million and sixty-one thousand dollars. There is no danger that internal improvements will depress the people.

I will say something of the general expediency of this appropriation. If there is a surplus of revenue to expend in a beneficent way, it should be distributed as generally and as equally as circumstances will admit. This appropriation will be extensively beneficial; seven great States will share in its benefits. This road will extend through the interior of the country, where nothing has been dispensed for internal improvements, and little for any other of the expenses of the Government. Set one point of a pair of compasses at my residence, describe a circle of the diameter of five hundred miles, within that extent, not a cent has been disbursed by this Government for any work or improvement; not a salary is paid within my knowledge, and no compensation, except to members of Congress, mail contractors, postmasters, jurors, and for taking the census. Your expenditures for the army, navy, fortifications, and collection of revenue, are on the seaboard, in the cities, or on the frontier. The interior suffers by a perpetual drain of its money, none of which is restored by the Government. The prevailing policy is to have a revenue above the amount of the necessary expenses of the Government. I did not sanction this policy; but, as it is adopted, as the system is fixed upon us, let a small part of the surplus be expended, according to our compact with the South-western States, in the district of my colleague, and of mine.

I am to say something of the particular utility of the road proposed to be made. My colleague [Mr. BARBOUR] sup-

* Extract from a speech delivered by Mr. Smyth in the House of Representatives, in February, 1823.

"I will justify the appropriation made for the construction of the Cumberland road. Congress are authorized 'to dispose of, and make all needful regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States.' Now I apprehend no regulation can be more 'needful' than one which preserves to the United States a title to their property. Is it certain that, admitting a new State into the Union on an equal footing, in all respects, with the original States, would not vest in the State the domain? Would it not operate like an acknowledgment of the independence of a colony? Be that as it may, Ohio, by this compact, surrendered her right to tax, during five years, the land which the United States might sell, and thus gave an equivalent for the two per cent. which the United States engaged to disburse in making roads leading to that State. To make needful regulations respecting the public lands, is a granted power. Congress may pass the necessary laws to execute that power, and consequently may pass appropriation laws for executing this 'needful regulation,' this compact with Ohio. Thus the appropriations for making the Cumberland road appear to have been constitutional."

posed it of no commercial utility. Commerce, he says, goes from West to East. He has never been in the southwest quarter of Virginia, and knows nothing of the direction of the commerce of that part of the country. The commerce of East Tennessee and Southwest Virginia does not go to the East. The merchants obtain their merchandise from Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York. The caravans of wagons which carry on merchandising between Knoxville and Baltimore, now pursue the proposed route three hundred and fifty miles; and, when the road is made, they may pass through this place, or continue through Winchester, as at present. It is true, that, eastward of the Blue ridge, in Virginia, commerce goes to the East; therefore the middle route, on the east side of the Blue ridge, would be useless for commercial purposes, except that some hogsheds of tobacco, within thirty or forty miles of James river or Roanoke, might be carried along the proposed road, if made on that route, to those rivers. The commerce of the interior and western ports of North Carolina passes eastward to her own towns, or to Norfolk and Petersburg. The most eastern route through the capitals of the Southern States will only facilitate governmental and commercial correspondence. On the western route, the cotton of Alabama and the south of Tennessee may be brought to, and manufactured in, the towns of the great valley as far as Winchester, and will pass four hundred miles along the proposed road. The engineers have given this route a decided preference; they show it to be the best and the cheapest; it will require less expense in causeways and bridges: and the expense of making the road from this place to New Orleans, should it be Macadamized, would cost, according to their estimate, more than a million of dollars less than making it on the middle route, advocated by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CARSON.]

The engineers do not seem to have observed the fact, that James river is navigable where the western route passes that stream. There will terminate the trip of wagons bringing from the Southwest produce for the Richmond market. To the other recommendations of the western route, I will add, that the accommodations for travellers, along the great valley, from Knoxville to Winchester, about four hundred and fifty miles, are, in my opinion, not equalled, in goodness and cheapness, on any road, of the same length, in the world. Sir, the road through the southwest of Virginia is an exceeding important highway. It was formerly the usual road to Kentucky; but the making of the Cumberland road, and the Kenhawa road, has lessened its importance. It is still necessary to the inhabitants of the south of Kentucky, as the gentleman before me [Mr. LETCHER] well knows. They send along it to market vast numbers of live stock, to the northern parts of Virginia, to Maryland, and even to Pennsylvania. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. C.] asks if this road can ever compete with the Mississippi. Sir, the Mississippi does not run near us; and if our branches of that river were navigable, New Orleans never can compete with Baltimore in supplying us with merchandise.

On motion of Mr. SHEPARD, the committee then rose, and reported progress.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

On motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, the House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. LETCHER in the chair, and took up the consideration of the bill "making appropriations for examinations and surveys; and, also, for certain works of internal improvements." The blanks in that part of the bill containing the appropriation for the continuance of the road from Detroit to Fort Gratiot, was filled with seven thousand dollars.

For the continuance of the road from Detroit to Saginaw bay, with seven thousand dollars.

For the continuance of the road from Detroit to Chicago, with eight thousand dollars.

For the continuance of the road from Pensacola to St. Augustine, with five thousand dollars.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved to amend that clause of the bill containing the appropriation of thirty thousand dollars for defraying the expenses of examinations and surveys, and of arrearages for the years 1826, 1827, and 1828, by increasing the sum to thirty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. WICKLIFFE desired that the arrearages should be made the subject of a separate appropriation, and not blended with that for defraying the expenses of the surveys. He inquired of the chairman of the committee, who reported the bill, what was the amount of arrearages.

Mr. McDUFFIE replied, they amounted to five thousand one hundred and forty dollars.

At the suggestion of Mr. INGERSOLL,

Mr. HEMPHILL withdrew his amendment; and then

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved to amend that part of the bill stating the objects of the appropriation, so that they would be confined to surveys already commenced and not completed, and to works of a national character. He was opposed to instituting any new surveys.

Mr. CLAY and Mr. MERCER opposed the amendment. Mr. M. urged the necessity of continuing the surveys, which [he said] were done at so trifling an expense, since the topographical engineers who made them must of necessity be employed by Government, even if the surveys were discontinued.

Mr. LEA suggested to Mr. WICKLIFFE to enlarge the object of his amendment, so as to embrace "such surveys as are recommended by either House of Congress."

Mr. WICKLIFFE said, he would prefer that the gentleman should offer the subject of his suggestion as an amendment. He wished to test the sense of the committee on the proposition he offered.

Subsequently he accepted the amendment as a modification of his proposition.

The amendment was negatived: yeas, 50—nays, 66.

On motion of Mr. VERPLANCK, an appropriation was inserted of five thousand four hundred and fifty dollars for office rent, &c.

On motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, this bill was then laid aside, and the bill "making appropriations for improving harbors," &c. was taken up.

The blanks containing appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors therein mentioned, being filled,

The committee then rose, and reported the two bills.

PENSIONERS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BATES, from the Committee on Pensions, reported the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, &c. That the heads of the departments who may be severally charged with the administration of the pension laws of the United States of America, be, and they are hereby, respectively directed and required, as soon as may be after the opening of each session of Congress, to present to the Senate and House of Representatives a several list of such persons, whether revolutionary, invalid, or otherwise, as shall have made application for a pension or an increase of pension, and as in their opinion respectively ought to be placed upon the pension roll, or otherwise provided for, and for doing which they have no sufficient power or authority, with the names and residences of such persons, the capacity in which they served, the degree of relief proposed, and a brief statement of the grounds thereof, to the end that Congress may consider the same.

The resolution was twice read; and

Mr. TUCKER moved to amend it, by adding to it the following words:

Pay of Members.

"And also the names of the several pensioners, and their residence, who continue to receive their pensions; and likewise the whole amount of applicants for pensions, under the law of 1818, giving pensions to revolutionary soldiers."

Mr. TUCKER'S amendment was agreed to: yeas, 77—nays, 69.

Mr. CHILTON was opposed both to the amendment and the resolution. He argued that the power and the patronage of the Executive Department of the Government were sufficient already, without vesting in it what the resolution proposed: for, if it passed, not five or ten, but fifty additional officers would be necessary to examine the cases, and prepare the information called for. Instead of this general reference of all the cases of application for pensions to the War Department, or a Board of Commissioners, with discretionary power to dispose of them, he preferred that every case should come at once before Congress to judge of its specific merits. The plan he thought wrong, because, after imposing this labor on the officer, the cases would still have to come to Congress; so that the only effect would be to give useless employment to a large number of additional clerks. Mr. C. went on to remark on another subject. He was aware [he said] that the transaction of the legislative business required committees; but he thought it a dangerous practice to give to committees unlimited confidence, and making it an apology for members of this House to neglect investigation themselves. He meant no reflection on the motives of any one; but the practice was bad. The consequence was, that the House passed measures without knowing any thing of their merits, trusting entirely to the reports of committees. No chairman of a committee, he presumed, would venture to report a pension bill solely on the abstract which should be furnished by the Secretary of War, and therefore it would be as well for the subject to stand as it does, and let the committee report the cases on their own examination.

Mr. BATES was indifferent to the fate of the resolution since the amendment was added to it, because it would require the reporting of a large volume every year of useless matter. The resolution had been offered to the House by the committee, because a great deal of time was now lost in investigating individual cases, which have been presented to the War Department, and, after examination there, rejected, as not coming within the provisions of the existing laws. The committee thought that, as these cases necessarily passed under the investigation of the head of the department, he could prepare with ease and accuracy a summary view of the nature and merits of each case, for the information of the committee. Nothing was to be referred to his discretion; he was merely to report facts; it imposed on him no additional responsibility, and would give him but little additional trouble. Mr. B. therefore, thought it a wise provision, calculated to save time, and facilitate the business, so as to grant relief in cases which were entitled to it, and ascertain at once those which were improper.

The resolution was then ordered to a third reading—yeas, 95.

SATURDAY, MARCH 27, 1830.

PAY OF MEMBERS.

The House again resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. McDUFFIE on the 18th instant, reducing the compensation of members of Congress to two dollars a day for every day the House may sit after the expiration of one hundred and twenty days of the long session, and of ninety days of the short session.

Mr. COULTER addressed the House in opposition to the resolution, till the hour for considering resolutions elapsed.

MONDAY, MARCH 29, 1830.

The House again resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. McDUFFIE on the 18th instant, relative to a reduction of the compensation of members; in case they remain in session after a certain period in each session, as specified therein.

Mr. COULTER concluded his remarks commenced on Saturday, against the adoption of the resolution.

[They were to the following effect:]

Mr. C. said, I would not of my free choice say any thing concerning the proposition now before the House. I am induced to do so solely by the accidental circumstance of my belonging to the Committee on Retrenchment, whose especial duty, it seems to be considered, is to aid and abet every gentleman in cutting down and breaking up every part of the machinery of this Government which does not meet with his approbation. As I cannot, in this instance, labor in the vocation which has been assigned to me, it is perhaps due to myself, and only respectful to the House, to state my reasons. If, however, this resolution had been offered, as some have been, and I suppose will be again, by gentlemen who love to amuse their constituents, I should not have touched it. It might have come upon the stage, made its bow, and exit, and went off, like its predecessors and associates, in a flourish. But it comes upon us urged and sustained by a gentleman of high political consideration, who is likely to win for it much favor, here and in the nation. It is meet, therefore, that it should be considered with the gravity and respect due to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. McDUFFIE.] I regret that those who now give this proposition their patronage, had not brought it forward at an earlier period of the session, especially as a most appropriate occasion was then afforded them for presenting it to the House. It will be recollected that one bill, concerning the compensation of members of Congress, passed this House about the last of December. In that bill the proposition now under consideration was once contained. But a majority of the Committee on Retrenchment of this year divested the bill of what they considered an unjust and odious feature. Yet, when it was undergoing the action of the House, it was competent for the gentleman from South Carolina, or the chairman of the Retrenchment Committee, [Mr. WICKLIFFE] to have offered an amendment, embracing this their favorite proposition. Business had not then thickened upon the House, and time, which, it is now said was then wasted, might have been employed in considering what we are now discussing. If it had then been acted upon, it might, by operating on our aversion, have produced some of the good with which the gentleman from South Carolina feeds his fancy. Now it is too late for this Congress, at all events. But at that time we heard nothing of this proposition. No, not even from the Magnús Apollo of retrenchment. A proposition in relation to the daily pay of members, which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CHILTON] did then offer as an amendment, received so little countenance or encouragement, that the House refused to order the yeas and nays upon its rejection. I think the House did wisely and well. It is certainly a delicate affair for this or any other legislative body to agitate the question of its own compensation. The necessity of the case constitutes it an exception from the general rule, which forbids public functionaries to be the judges of their own salaries. It has been judged safer, in all free countries, to vest this power in the legislature, though interested, than in any other department. But the delicacy of their position ought to make them cautious in their movements. If they attempt to increase their allowance, it will be ascribed to love of gain. If they attempt to reduce it, ten to one if they either get or deserve credit for patriotism or sincerity. They will most probably be charged with the grovelling design of purchasing popularity, by relinquishing a modicum of their pay, without deserving it by merit. The best way, therefore, seems to be, for a statesman to leave the matter as he finds it, until the people complain. They know how we stand; and if we are entitled by law to more than we deserve, they will demand that we shall set the matter right. I have heard of no voice of complaint among them. Their minds are tranquil, and have settled down for many years with contentment upon the present rate of compensation. They know that we are the nearest power of the Government to themselves—the representatives of their wisdom, their virtue, their feelings, and their patriotism—and they have not demanded of us to cut down our compensation below that of clerks in the public offices; nay, even below that of the humblest messenger employed about this hall. Under these circumstances, I regret that this measure has been brought forward at a period of the session when it can produce no practical result, except that of displacing business well matured, and delaying the action of the House upon measures, the progress of which the public eye is watching, and in relation to the fate of which the public feeling is now engaged. Sir, it appears to me that an economist of time could hardly have been less fortunate in the selection of an occasion, or a mode of doing public service. The question of compensation, as presented in the resolution, comes in a form as noxious and offensive as could possibly have been given to it. So far as my recollection ranges over the history of representative governments and deliberate assemblies, whether in free or monarchical countries, I can bring to mind no example or precedent, no proceeding that bears any likeness or parallel to this. It has at least one merit, that of originality of invention. Of what character is it? Is its object to produce deeds of patriotism, of honor—to advance the interests and extend the renown of our country, by appealing to our nobler feelings? No—but by addressing itself to the base and sordid passions—to those feelings which actuate the most degraded and worst of mankind. Looking to the ancient republics, we find that they, when they wished to elicit deeds worthy of a free people, addressed themselves to the higher feelings, to the patriotism, the love of country—the honor and integrity of their public functionaries. That is the mode in which I should like to see the lagging integrity, the slow attention, the wandering thoughts, of this assembly, if such things be urged into concentration and quickened into action. We have fallen on evil times indeed, if our bosoms can respond to nothing but such a call as this. We have experienced a rapid and premature decay, if, at the end of fifty years after the declaration of independence, and before the last, lingering, and almost hallowed footsteps of one of those who proclaimed it, have left the earth, we have so lost its spirit, become so degenerate in purpose, as to be urged to duty and honor by no other incentive than a small pecuniary penalty hanging over our heads! Sir, we are required to perform an undefined and undefinable amount and extent of legislation, to provide for the interests, wants, and exigencies of twelve millions of people, and a vast extent of country, in a specified time, or be fined for it. Knowledge and wisdom are thus to be measured by hours, and patriotism by dollars. The iron bed of Procrustes is the only thing I know, to which the resolution bears a resemblance.

The reproach which the resolution conveys, (not designed, I am sure, by the gentleman who offered it,) may be correct or not. I will not undertake to say that the majority of gentlemen on this floor are induced to waste the time, and lengthen out the session, for the purpose of receiving their per diem allowance. There are many members, of whose character, standing, and virtue, I am unacquainted, (the gentleman from South Carolina has more experience than I have,) but there are many with whom I am acquainted; of these last I can say with confidence and candor, that they are not influenced by mercenary motives, and that while they remain here they are influenced by a sense of public duty, and sustain an actual pecuniary loss. But to them money is not the primary motive to action. Other and more exalted motives actuate them. To them absence from kind friends, from their accustomed scenes, from the domestic hearth, which I trust comes home to the bosoms of all who are entrusted with a seat on this floor, is sufficiently painful—spring returns, but not to them returns its accustomed joys—daily and hourly they are recalled to the scenes of their home—their hearts yearn after their wives, children, and friends, but public duty, their obligations to their constituents, keep them here. When they have accepted the honor conferred on them, they will remain here so long as duty requires them. To such men this resolution only offers insult—it is addressed to them in vain. But it seems to be addressed to men of different mould, with whom it may be supposed the gentleman from South Carolina has “sounded the depths and shoals of honor;” and I would ask the gentleman whether even as to them it is not bottomed on a wrong estimate of human nature. Upon the principle of the resolution they are selfish. They have no care for, and pay no regard to, the public interest. Their feelings and passions are absorbed in speechifying, as the word goes, for their own aggrandizement. They will, of course, go on in their usual course until the period when the eight dollars per diem shall cease, and, after having picked up the crumbs and offal of every debate, to make themselves notorious, will go home at the end of the four months, and leave the public business undone. The old adage, that “you cannot bring blood out of a turnip,” is too true to be overturned by this resolution. I do not wish to be understood as believing that this is the true character of this House, or any very large portion of it. I believe the members generally to be actuated by as high and honorable motives as any former Congress. It is not requisite I should, in candor, say that they possess the same amount of talent. I know that in this session, as in all former ones, time has been consumed in what has been often called frivolous debate, but still I am satisfied, from the information of those sufficiently qualified to know, from correct and official sources, that we are not behind any preceding Congress in the amount of business actually done, and that we are much ahead of them in important national affairs, well matured by our committees, and now awaiting the action of the House. In addition to this, it ought to be recollected, by experienced gentlemen, that we have had three contested elections, each of which was the subject of warm excitement and debate, and which for the time entirely excluded ordinary legislative business. I know that many “wise saws” have been uttered about a debate of two days on a small Indian memorial. I do not set myself up as a censor upon any gentlemen who may think proper to enter a debate upon any question before this House. They are all of age, and act upon their responsibility to their constituents, and are amenable to the high bar of public taste. But, as I did not enter into that debate, and have been generally “a looker on in Verona,” I may be permitted to say that it involved an important principle. It ought to be supposed that gentlemen from various quarters of this Union, meeting together here, somewhat strangers, debate for mutual and public instruction. For my part, I listen with pleasure and delight to the effusions of genius, talent, and experience, on any subject, and bear with patience its concomitant evil, garrulity without wisdom. The public never said that the time so consumed was wasted, until some gentlemen here, perhaps with a view of building up their own reputation at the expense of others, made some stir about it. If we could all see ourselves as others see us, it might, perhaps, be considered that the best way to build up a reputation for business habits, is to attend diligently to the matters before us, without making a parade about it. A close mouth is not only the sign but often the very perfection of wisdom. The discussions of the early part of this session may have led to no practical measure, still they may have awakened public attention, and sharpened public inquiry. I believe there is no valuable institution in this world without some alloy; assembled here from the different sections of a mighty empire—the representatives of a free and intelligent people—overlooking the multitudinous interests of this great republic—exercising the right of free discussion—that great and glorious right—can we expect to have it without some alloy? It is impossible—discussion would not be valuable if it were so controlled as to exempt it from being abused. We cannot have that bean ideal in legislative proceedings which gentlemen seem to desire, and we should be careful lest, in attempting to take away what may seem objectionable in debate, we do not destroy the value of the right of discussion altogether.

The resolution is founded upon an assumed fact, the contrary of which is proved by experience. It would doubtless be a wise measure, if it was satisfactorily established, that the legislative business could be transacted in four months. If not, the resolution ought to be abandoned. How are we to ascertain that the business can be done in one hundred and twenty days, not only now, but in future time? Are we to resort to experience, the sure guide which statesmen ought always to follow, or draw upon our imaginations? We must consult the records of our country, and they will admonish us that it is a gratuitous supposition, a mere fancy, to say that our business can be transacted in four months. I have looked at the sessions of Congress from the commencement of the Government, and I find that, at no period, has the first session of any Congress been less than five months, not even when the population of the country did not much exceed three millions of souls; at times, too, when men of the purest patriotism and most distinguished talents appeared in the councils of the nation; men whose bright escutcheons were never stained with the imputation of eking out a session for the love of their per diem allowance. The first Congress sat, in the two years, five hundred and nineteen days. I admit, that putting the new machinery into operation required more than ordinary time; but in the years '93 and '94, when the whole machinery of Government was in harmonious operation, Congress sat three hundred and eleven days; in '99 and 1800, it sat two hundred and seventy-two days. At that period the population was five million three hundred and nineteen thousand and thirteen souls, less than one-half of our present population, and the great States in the valley of the Mississippi have since grown up, as if by magic, claiming the paternal care of this Legislature. But I have turned to another period of our history, in the hope that its example would be more prevalent here. Mr. Jefferson came into power upon the basis of economy and reform, and I believe he had a sincere desire to promote both. But I have looked in vain to find that the first session of any Congress, during that administration, was brought to a close in less than five months. The first session of his administration lasted one hundred and forty-eight days, and the second eighty-eight. Supposing, however, to humor the fashion of the times, that they had some trouble in clearing away the rubbish left by General Washington and Mr. Adams, in the first Congress, yet the second Congress of that administration, influenced by the strictest economy, conducted by the purest republicans, sat two hundred and eighty-two days. Is it to be expected that this Congress, legislating for more than double the number of people, covering a much wider extent of territory, and embracing six additional States, with less of political experience and wisdom, can do the business in two-thirds the time? The gentleman from South Carolina would task us too hard, he would fix a badge of disgrace upon us, unless we far surpass the Roger Shermans, the Albert Gallatins, the James Madisons, of other days. Sir, it may do very well for the gentleman from South Carolina, but it will not do for me. But, if we cannot trust the National Legislature of primitive times for an example, let us look to the State Legislatures. There the members stand in close affinity and contact with the people, under the eye of their constituents; yet it will be found that they consume as much and more time than we do, making allowances for the difference of circumstances under which we operate; and the magnitude and variety of interests for which we provide. I speak with knowledge of the State from which I have the honor to come. The Legislature of that State met one month before Congress, and has not yet adjourned. If the members have done wisely, they will hear, when they return home, the words "well done" from their constituents; because that people look more to the worthiness and value of legislation, than to the ordinary time expended in maturing it. I think, then, I may safely say, deriving my information from that great source of political knowledge, experience, and we should always pursue our path into futurity by the light which beams from the past—looking to this authority, I may safely say that the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina is bottomed upon a presumed fact, the converse of which is established by experience. Shall we, then, who are entrusted with the concerns of a great nation, be guided by experience, or follow the imaginings of the gentleman? I choose to follow in the path of those wise and patriotic men of our early days, with whom the spirit of the revolution abided, who were honored in their lives, and, in their deaths, were embalmed in the recollections of our people.

At the close of the hour on Saturday I was about to reply to some observations of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ALEXANDER] which introduced the tariff, and the peculiar feelings of gentlemen from the South, into this debate. I will forbear, because I feel that I shall trespass long enough on the time of the House by advertising to the topics that more properly belong to this resolution. I hope to have some more fit occasion to express all my feelings and opinions on the subjects which the gentleman from Virginia has touched. They are like those of the people from whom I am sent, decided and emphatic. The gentleman from Virginia spoke of the rapine and plunder committed on the people by an army of legislators. I do not know but those might have been the sentiments of Robespierre; when he undertook to regulate every thing by the jacobin club. Bonaparte dispensed with the representatives of the people in a summary mode—and so did Cromwell. As long as liberty dwells in this land, its brightest, purest, and most secure abode must be in these halls. I do not wish to see the power of the people, as here unfolded and exemplified, curtailed or straitened. The gentleman from South Carolina has devoted his energies hitherto, to what he considered some improvement in the constitution. But I would ask him whether the practical effect of his proposition would not be to weaken the popular representative branch of this Government, and to strengthen unreasonably the Executive arm. The constitution provides that neither House shall adjourn without the consent of the other, for more than three days. The notion and view of the convention in this provision is evident. The aristocratic branch, or, as some will have it, the representatives of State sovereignties, (if that expression can be used without a solecism in lexicography and common sense,) might choose to adjourn so long, in times of public excitement or public apathy, as to leave the Executive authority in perfect control of the Government. Now they cannot do it without the consent of the popular branch. Sir, every despot who has arisen in the world, commenced by encroachments on the voice and privilege of the people, first limiting, and then suppressing it. The freedom of the press, which is entirely analogous to that of debate, is liable to abuse; and there is a class of gentlemen who are constantly engaged in fastidiously bewailing its corruption.

It is most undoubtedly liable to abuse. More, much more than the privilege of free debate. Yet who would wish to see it trammelled or circumscribed? The constitution provides that Congress shall pass no law "abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." Now, what freedom of speech was it that they intended to place beyond the reach of legislation? That which takes place in the market place or in the public streets? One would think not, because that is provided for by the common law, on the subjects of suits for slander. Once there was a seditious law—a sin, in a degree as fatal as the original sin of Adam—because the crime of the father is visited upon their children. But, on the whole, considering the provision as a general political guaranty, it is hardly to be doubted but that it was intended to guard the freedom of debate in the national assembly as well as in private circles or the bar rooms of a tavern. And is not the national representative of this people possessed of sufficient discretion to confine within reasonable bounds the privilege of debate? In the Roman Senate, a consul was not permitted to interrupt a senator, but, if the debate was unreasonably prolonged, the senators interrupted it and stopped it by their clamor. Cannot the representatives of this people, the most enlightened and patriotic that ever existed on the earth, be entrusted with the same privilege? No, sir, upon the principle of this motion, our controlling motive is avarice. It cannot be disguised or forgotten that this Government is the first hope of liberty, and, if it fails, the last prop of enlightened humanity and justice will have left the earth. We are entrusted with a sacred deposit. The eyes of the friends of liberty and justice in all quarters of the world are directed towards us. We have proclaimed that virtue is the foundation of a republic, and knowledge its surest support. It seems that we have been going on upon a mistake. If so, we ought to undeceive the world.

A gentleman brings in a motion, bottomed on the supposition that we are governed by money. Even Walpole, in the pride of his power, never broached so bold a notion; he thought, to be sure, that every man had his price, but he thought that public men were to be bought by something magnificent, not by the paltry sum of six dollars a day. If we adopt this resolution, the people will take us at our word; they will say that we have fixed the mark of Cain on our foreheads. I never yet knew any man who acknowledged himself to be a mean fellow, who was not believed. If we condemn ourselves, the people will believe us. No man can gather "golden opinions" by branding himself with iniquity. If the resolution passes, the people will perform a solemn lustration, they will purify this hall; and I trust in heaven, that no man who has been present at the degradation of his country's honor, will ever again be returned. Sir, the people of the old continent have looked upon us with something of wonder and admiration. They have not exactly comprehended the spirit of public virtue which urged us on to prosperity and happiness. Sir, the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina will meet all their wishes. If it is adopted, as quick as the ocean can bear it, winds will waft it to the old world; royal presses will proclaim it; and the tottering and decaying institutions of despotism will be stimulated into fresh vigor by the sound.

The decline of republics is traced from the first moment of the decline of public virtue and public spirit. I need not run over the history of ancient times to prove this. Every gentleman in this House is sufficiently informed to know it. Shall we not bring disgrace upon representative government, if we establish, by our law, that we shall accomplish all our legislation in a given period, or have a brand of disgrace upon us? I do not agree to it. It may suit the views of gentlemen who wish to weaken the popular branch of this Government. There may be saved to this people the amount mentioned by the gentleman from South Carolina, by the adoption of this measure; but what will that signify? The expense of the army is annually about five millions of dollars, and that of the navy is nearly of the same amount, whilst the whole civil department of the Government does not much exceed half of one million. Now if Congress did nothing, its value would be felt. It is something like the eye of a master watching the labor of his workmen. If gentlemen speak over again, in the "stock debates," the same speeches that have been spoken, to use the language of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BARBOUR] "de die en diem," it is undoubtedly an evil, and is only to be remedied in the firm good taste which resides in this House. It must come to that at last: gentlemen must learn that they will be tolerated in speaking only when they have something valuable to communicate. If ever I set up for a pedagogue to lecture the House, I will strike at these standing debates, not at the occasional flashes which bring fire from the eye and eloquence from the lips of some gentlemen.

Sir, in the beauty and repose of yesterday evening, I strolled, in company with others of this House, to the neighboring city of the dead, where some of the fathers of the republic repose quietly side by side. Their bones lie where the bones of their kindred and people do not lie. There is the tomb of George Clinton, upon which it is recorded that his children performed that pious office which was due to his remains from his country. There is also the tomb of Elbridge Gerry, upon which his own memorable saying is engraved, "Government has a claim upon the time of every citizen, and, if he had but one day to live, that day ought to be employed in doing good to his country." It was refreshing to my spirit to read this memorial of his devotedness to his country, by one of its fathers and benefactors. But my heart fell within me, when I recollected that it was my humble office to oppose this day a resolution, which seems to imply that public spirit no longer remains among us, and that our most appropriate motive to action is love of money.

Mr. EVERETT expressed himself as friendly to the object of the resolution, so far as regarded an abridgment of the sessions, but not disposed to employ the means which the resolution proposed to attain this object. He moved to amend the resolution so as to limit each session to a fixed term, which, he thought, would obviate the objections which had been urged against the resolution in debate, and suggested to him by many of his friends.

Mr. STANBURY said that he did not like the resolution, and he lamented that it came before the House from so respectable a source. It proceeded upon the supposition that a majority of the members of this House procrastinate the session, for the purpose of increasing their own compensation. If gentlemen can persuade the people to believe this, it will have a manifest tendency to bring us into contempt and disrepute with them, and prepare their minds for certain irregular movements against this Union, with which we have been threatened. The truth cannot be disguised, that the people have a deep-rooted attachment for the Union. This attachment is much stronger than a certain class of politicians among us perhaps may wish. Not all our measures for the protection of the industry of the country, and for its internal improvement, complained of as so oppressive by some, will, I am persuaded, have the effect of stimulating the people in any quarter to sanction any of the irregular movements to which I have alluded. Those who may wish to prepare the minds of the people to look with approbation on any measures of this kind, have yet a great work to perform. They must first bring this Government into contempt: nothing would so effectually do this as the passage of this resolution, which would proclaim to the world that we, the Congress of the United States, the immediate representatives of this great people, are public robbers.

Pay of Members.

But, sir, it is not true that this House, or any considerable portion of its members, desire to remain here without performing any public service, for the mere purpose of entitling themselves to their pay; neither am I prepared to admit that this Congress has been less industrious or less patriotic than any which have gone before us. An immense mass of business has been prepared by our committees, and is now ready for the action of the House. The passage of many of the measures before us for the internal improvement of the country, and which the state of our finances can at present so well afford, and the passage of the bill on our table for the enforcement of the laws already in being for the protection of the woollen manufactures, are, I believe, loudly called for by a large majority of the people; and if it be one object of this resolution to defeat all or any of these measures, by depriving us of sufficient time to act upon them, it only affords an additional reason for my opposition to it. If it were in my power to go any further than to vote against the resolution, I would vote it a libel on the House.

Mr. McDUFFIE replied to Mr. S. with equal warmth, and vindicated his resolution against the objections urged by others.

Mr. SCOTT said that, were it not for the imposing appearance which the resolution now under consideration presented to the view of the public, he would have rested perfectly satisfied (as he had heretofore done on other occasions) with giving a silent vote. And now I regret [said Mr. S.] that I have to differ in opinion with the gentleman from South Carolina, who offered it, because I believe his motives were pure, and that his only object was to facilitate the business of Congress; and I now disavow the most distant intention of attributing any improper motives to him. But I feel well satisfied that the introduction of a principle, such as is comprehended in the resolution, would have a tendency virtually to destroy one, the most valuable co-ordinate branch of our republican Government. I mean the representative branch, which is at all times under the immediate control of the people, and ought to be free and unrestricted in its deliberations. In my humble opinion, it would be imprudent, impolitic, and unjust in us, who sit here in the time of peace and prosperity, to limit the sessions to a certain period of time, when we know not the day that troubles and misfortunes may befall us. Yes, sir, there is a possibility, though, I grant, not a probability, that, previous to the end of our present session, an indignity may be offered to our flag upon the ocean, which might render it absolutely necessary for the present Congress to take the matter under their most serious consideration. I hope a kind Providence may avert any such evil, as no one would deplore it more than myself. But this and many other circumstances may occur in future, which may require the solemn deliberations of Congress, when they may require time, and the utmost extent of their talents—whenever national safety may hang suspended on the lips and the wise deliberations of the statesmen within this hall. And, from what I have seen and experienced of the gentleman who is the author of the resolution now under consideration, I, for one, would have as much confidence in his integrity, talents, and opinions on such an occasion, as of any member within these walls. But, much as I have admired the general course which the gentleman from South Carolina has pursued, since I have had the honor of observing it, I must be permitted to think very differently from him on some subjects; and, at present, I feel opposed both to the resolution, and the amendment to it, which has been offered by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT] because I believe that either of them is at variance with our republican institutions, and that, if either is adopted, and should become a law, the most pernicious consequences will most inevitably follow. The very principle implied, both in the resolution and amendment, is, that the members of this body prolong the sessions, from the mercenary motives of receiving their per diem allowance, trifling with the business of the people by an unnecessary delay. The gentleman has himself illustrated this view of it most satisfactorily, because he insists that if such a law was in operation, there would be as much business transacted in the term for which they were to receive eight dollars per day, as there is at the present time, when the session is extended so much longer; and he has, but a few minutes since, given it as his opinion that Congress would not sit either at two dollars per day, or without a compensation. When he first advocated his resolution, we were informed that if Congress would sit a month after the eight dollars per day would expire, and then receive two dollars per day, there would be an ample compensation for the session, as the aggregate would be about seven dollars per day. This position, I apprehend, only goes to show that eight dollars per day is too much; because, if seven dollars is "amply sufficient" for a long session, it is equally so for a shorter one; and, if gentlemen are in earnest, and have any desire to reduce the wages of members, I shall go with them most cheerfully to reduce the daily pay to seven dollars, because I believe that sum is worth as much for ordinary uses at the present day, as eight dollars was at the time the present pay was established by law; and this will be a certain saving to the Government, and much more congenial to our republican institutions.

In the great uncertainty of human affairs, suppose some national calamity was to befall our country, and it should become absolutely necessary for Congress to deliberate a much greater length of time than is contemplated by the present project, they would have to sit for a sum scarcely sufficient to pay their boarding. Should there, then, be any such mercenary men who would have the honor of a seat in this House, and have no more honorable and patriotic object in view than their daily pay, would they not very soon leave your hall? But what would be the unpleasant situation of one (perhaps of the most virtuous and patriotic members of your body, who, under some severe dispensation of Providence, would have to resign his seat, or ask leave of absence? Would he not have his feelings wounded with frequently being stigmatized with the epithets "unworthy," "mercenary." Sir, my honorable colleague [Mr. COVINGTON] had the fortitude (and I was much gratified to hear it) to bring into the view of the House the true cause of the procrastination and delay of business in this body, namely, the protracted debates which frequently take place on trivial and unimportant questions. This I take to be the true cause of delay. But, neither the adoption of this resolution, nor of the amendment before the chair, nor of their principles enacted into a law, would, in my humble opinion, in any degree, remedy the evil. The same gentlemen who retard the business in the present situation of affairs, would do the same provided the proposed system was adopted. And should our country ever be so unfortunate (which I hope it never may) as to have unworthy and designing men in this hall, they would then be much better enabled to accomplish their evil ends by device and stratagem.

I am well aware that, in some instances, tedious and protracted debates may be carried to too great a length; but as all human governments must necessarily bear marks of human frailty, and although this privilege, in large deliberative bodies, may sometimes be carried to excess, yet, sir, it is to the enjoyment of, and a full and free exercise of this privilege, that we must look for our freedom and independence, and the security of every thing that is most dear to us; and I apprehend much more danger from legislating too precipitately, than from the tediousness of investigation—and I think that almost every experienced legislator will agree with me in this opinion. And the moment you take away or restrict the privilege of debate in your legislative halls, you strike a fatal blow at the whole system of representative government. Then, I am not willing to place any restraint upon our successors; I hope they may be men who will represent faithfully the true interests of a free and independent nation, for ages yet to come.

Fallen, as the human family is, from a state of perfection, I cannot agree that if even the gentleman's proposition should succeed, and any calamity should befall our country, that would render it necessary for Congress to be in session eight months, but that there would be men, even in very limited circumstances, that would be willing to sacrifice their time and labor for their country's welfare. Much as I deplore the frailty of human nature, much as I feel the effects of it, I do most unfeignedly believe that it is sinking it far below its present dignity, to suppose that there is no such thing as disinterested patriotism, and that mere mercenary motives are the whole rule of action with all public men. If such is our deplorable situation, our liberties will soon be at an end, and the adoption of the principles contained in the proposition now before the House, in my humble opinion, would soon put it in the power of the most dangerous and mercenary to assume the control and evade the will of the people. I trust there are no such men within this hall, as would, from mere mercenary motives, detain the proceedings of Congress for the sake of daily pay; should there be such, which I hope there is not, I will close my remarks, by addressing them with a sentiment, which was suggested to my mind by a description given by my friend and colleague this morning.* I would say to them, that they ought to be afraid to tread the soil that had been enriched by the blood of the heroes of the revolution—that they ought to be afraid to visit the tombs of the patriots and sages who gained our liberty and founded our Government—lest the spirits of the departed brave should be aroused from their peaceful slumbers, and forbid the foul intrusion. We have been informed that our names will have to appear on this question. I am willing and prepared to record my name, both against the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and the original resolution, not fearing the consequences, when I am in the conscientious discharge of my duty.

Mr. WAYNE next rose, but the debate was discontinued, the hour for considering resolutions having expired.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, in order [he said] to have the sense of the House ascertained on the resolution, as he presumed members had made up their minds on the question, moved to suspend the rule which confines the discussion of resolutions to one hour of the day. The motion was negatived.

BUFFALO AND NEW ORLEANS ROAD.

The previous orders of the day were, on the motion of Mr. HEMPHILL, postponed; and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HAYNES in the chair, and took up the bill making an appropriation for a road from Buffalo, in New York, to New Orleans, by Washington city.

Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD said, he rose principally for the purpose of offering an amendment to the bill now under consideration. I have hitherto forbore to do so, from a wish that my colleague [Mr. CARSON] should have an opportunity of offering one that was long since printed and laid on our tables; but as he has twice had the floor, and twice been induced to withhold his proposition, I now feel myself at liberty to present my own; the effect of which will be, as I intimated when I obtained the floor, to make up an issue different from that already pending, by presenting something like an interplea in favor of the people east of the mountains, and bringing directly before the committee the relative claims of the different routes proposed from this place to New Orleans.

These examinations and surveys were executed by order of the Government, under authority of the act of April, 1824, directing the survey of such objects of internal improvement as might be considered of national importance. But while it is my purpose to show from them that the routes east of the mountains, as indicated by the reports of the engineers, and especially that termed the middle route, possess advantages superior to those west of the mountains, I must be permitted to express my regret that these documents do not furnish that accurate information so desirable in deciding the perplexing question of the proper location of this road: they exhibit a mere outline, without noticing many of the prominent difficulties or peculiar advantages characteristic of the face of the country through which these surveys are carried. I have understood, sir, that the visit of the engineers detailed on this service was known to very few persons throughout the line of their survey in the western part of North Carolina; and that they neither sought nor obtained, from intelligent individuals, such local information as might have tended to a full understanding of the advantages which that route presented. They seem to have travelled with the caution and expedition that might have been expected to characterize an excursion into an enemy's country. It is true that, at the time of the performance of this service, some of our southern politicians, both here and elsewhere, had assumed a rather threatening attitude in their denial of the power of this Government to execute surveys, and construct roads and other works of improvement, in the several States; but whatever reason this might have offered for a careful and unobtrusive passage through other parts of their journey, yet, in North Carolina, these Government officers had nothing to fear—they were there, at least, on neutral ground. Not that the people of that State are indifferent to, or united in their opinions as to the powers of the General Government upon this and other subjects, but, influenced by that spirit of concession and compromise which gave existence to the constitution, they are prepared to yield much; yes, sir, they would pause long before they uttered even a gasconading threat of opposition to this or any similar act of authority on the part of the General Government; and though they may believe that, in many acts of legislation here, a due regard has not been paid to their interests, their complaints will be found to mingle with them no spirit of resistance—no sentiment of disunion. This is a subject that they have not been taught to think or talk about; and I, sir, am the very last man on earth that would attempt to teach them so fearful a lesson. But I return to the immediate question before the committee. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HEMPHILL] asserts that the western route, the one embraced in the bill, has decided advantages over any other; but he has not told us to which of the routes his assertion is intended to apply; or, is he ignorant of the fact that two directions and two distinct surveys west of the mountains have been reported? I may well suppose the gentleman from Pennsylvania to have fallen into this error, not only from what he has said, but from the fact that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BLAIR] has triumphantly exhibited a chart of the route reported in 1826, and has referred to it as giving the only western direction indicated by the engineers; but, sir, I have procured from the Engineer Department, and now have before me, a map of a route which diverges from the first a few miles beyond Knoxville, Tennessee, crosses the Clinch river at Kingston, is then found winding its way through the Cumberland mountains, and toiling up Spencer's hill, and, after a fatiguing journey of many miles west of a direct line, it reaches Huntsville, in Alabama; and from thence it is seen to encounter the Muscle shoals of the Tennessee. Here it must cross the river; but by what means its passage is intended to be effected, the report does not inform us; it is thence, through many difficulties, conveyed to the Mississippi, at or near Baton Rouge; from thence it follows the banks of that river to New Orleans. This is emphatically the western route, the one particularly recommended by the gentleman from Virginia; [Mr. SMITH] yet, sir, notwithstanding the engineers report the distance of this line of road from Washington to New Orleans to be twelve hundred and eighty-two miles, and that of the middle route, through North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, only eleven hundred and six miles, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BLAIR] has roundly asserted that the western had the advantage in point of distance. [Mr. B. explained—he referred to that through East Tennessee.] I certainly should have understood the gentleman as he now explains himself, but he is still unsustained in his position; for the same report makes even his favorite direction longer than that of the middle survey: the difference is indeed inconsiderable; but it is decidedly in favor of my side of the mountains; but the other gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ISAACS] will, no doubt, admit me to be correct, when I state that I understand him as joining the gentleman from Virginia, in recommending the road through West Tennessee. Taking this, therefore, as the western project, I will assume it as the standard of the comparison I intend to institute between the different lines surveyed. I have already shown that distance, a very important consideration, is decidedly in favor of the middle route; and I am equally confident that the facilities for constructing a good and durable road are also on my side of the question. It is true that the report exhibits little or no difference in this respect; but the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ISAACS] has himself furnished the proof that corrects the error of the engineers in this particular. He has shown the entire unfitness of his country for the making of even a tolerable way, according to the plan proposed by the bill; and it is so for the best of reasons—the great depth and richness of the soil of that favorite and highly favored region render it unfit for the construction of a road composed of earth only. This is a partial inconvenience that we have all understood to apply to the gentleman's country; but which need only to be stated, to convince us that its very existence implies an incalculably greater benefit in the abundant fertility of their lands.

Then, sir, whilst the bill proposes a road constructed of earth only, it is through the comparatively poor region of my State, and a large extent of the survey still farther south, that a soil will be found most happily adapted to its construction; it would not only be more cheaply made, but, when done, would be of a much more durable character.

But, in a commercial aspect, it is contended that the western direction possesses very decided advantages; yet, if I rightly understand the report upon this subject, even that authority will be found in favor of the middle route, for all purposes of internal commerce. By casting the eye over the surveys through East and West Tennessee, it will be seen that they are carried for many miles in a direction parallel to the course of the Tennessee, and other navigable streams, and often upon their very banks, or at the distance of but a few miles. Instead, then, of this improvement being called for by the absence of water communication, the road, if established as proposed by the bill, can only be regarded as an auxiliary or substitute for the navigable streams every where to be met with in its neighborhood, and running in the same direction. This is not only true in the State of Tennessee, but is remarkably so through a portion of the country still farther south; for not only are smaller streams to be accommodated with this road, but for at least three hundred miles it is found traversing the very banks of the Mississippi. Then, is it not evident that much of the country through which it will pass is already provided with a much better means of transportation than would be afforded by the proposed improvement? Not so, sir, in the direction of the middle route; there we do not propose the absurdity of making a national road that cannot be needed; but, on the other hand, its construction in a direction different from that of the streams flowing to the Atlantic, must afford a very extended accommodation to the inhabitants of the intermediate sections of country, by facilitating the transportation of their produce, if not to the destined market, at least to some point from which they would have the advantage of water conveyance. A preference founded on this view of the situation of the country east of the mountains, is clearly intimated in the report of the engineers; and although it may not be found to obtain with equal force throughout the entire line of survey, yet its general existence affords a sufficient reason why it should weigh much with the committee in fixing the direction of this road. But there is in my part of North Carolina a description of trade that would be peculiarly benefited by this measure. We have much intercourse with South Carolina and Georgia in one direction, and Virginia in the other. To these States the farmers of my district of country are much in the habit of wagoning their productions, either for the purpose of exchange or barter, or with the more desirable object of effecting a sale for cash. I will not say, sir, that this trade exhibits the numerous caravans of wagons that we are told are seen crowding along the western road; but I will say, it is far from being inconsiderable, and is much increasing, especially in the southern direction, and is of sufficient importance to claim our attention in the consideration of this part of the subject.

The military advantages of this western road have been heightened and embellished by frequent allusions to the city of New Orleans, as not only the scene of military operations, but as the theatre on which imperishable renown was obtained. Every idea of defence connected with this road seems irresistibly to terminate at this memorable point. My colleague [Mr. CARSON] was certainly very happy on this part of the subject; and although I could but regard some portion of his argument as underrating the importance of improvements in time of peace, tending to security in time of war, yet the reasons offered by him were quite sufficient to show the utter inutility of taking this road out of its natural course solely with a view to the defence of New Orleans: for, whatever possible necessity there may be, at some future day, to muster the sons of the West at this far-famed theatre of war, I can but believe that they will find their way thither more cheaply and expeditiously through other modes of conveyance than that which this military road would afford; and, sir, I have not heard it contended in argument, that any other point on the line of this western road was likely to present a field for military operations—no necessity is intimated of saving us from ourselves in the West; for, whatever may be thought of the South, all is peace and quiet in that quarter—there the spirit of insubordination is not thought to threaten disunion, or endanger our repose—the only possible cause of apprehension arises from their assertion of claim to the lands of the Government; and, for one, I hope, ere long, we shall remove this source of contention and apprehended danger, by making distribution of them among the several States of the Union.

But, sir, should I even be disappointed in this favorite measure, they do not threaten the Government with a military array in the field of battle; but it is here, sir, in this hall of legislation, that we are told the Western States will soon embody themselves in such numbers as no longer to petition for, and receive as a boon, that which they will then claim and obtain under the semblance of right.

With a view, sir, still further to diminish the claims of the route east of the mountains, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HEMPHILL] has said that we have on that side a dense population, and are consequently capable of defending ourselves. Admit, for the sake of argument, that this is now so; that, though presenting an extensive sea coast, assailable at numerous points by an invading foe, we require no interior preparations with a view to a state of war. I say, sir, admit the gentleman to be correct in this, yet I would ask him how long will this be so? Deny us this, and continue to withhold other benefits to which we are entitled; persist in a course of legislation imposing on us unequal burdens, and the already increasing tide of emigration will, in a little while, have so far diminished our population, as no longer to leave any pretence for the gentleman's assertion. We shall then be so insignificant, when compared with the population of the new States, as to cease, in their estimation, to be objects worthy of national interest or concern. Yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania, for a moment, seemed to present some faint hope of escaping from this melancholy fate: for, while inviting us to support this bill, we were assured that other portions of the country should hereafter partake of equal benefit: but this delusion lasted but for a day; for the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ISACKS] has explained what was meant by "other portions of the country:" he defines it to be the rich regions of West Tennessee, Ohio, and Kentucky; they are to be provided for by the gentleman's plans, but in none of their beneficent designs is my immediate section of the Union embraced. Relying, then, while we may, upon the important fact of our yet possessing the superiority in point of population, I feel myself justified in using it as a powerful reason in favor of my side of the question.

With us, sir, Government is necessarily the creature of those over whom it is established. Made and upheld by the will of the people, their adherence and attachment to it must ever be in proportion to the measure of benefit they receive in return for their contributions to its support. And although, as has been happily said by a gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURGESS] we cannot expect these governmental blessings to be dispensed among us with the perfect equality of the dew of heaven, yet it is but just that, in our acts of legislation, we keep an eye towards the attainment of so desirable an object. In relation to the subject before us, we shall certainly consult that principle, by accommodating the greatest possible number of our citizens. It is, therefore, desirable to see whether the bill, as now before the committee, conforms to this important end and design of legislation.

By reference to the report of the engineers upon this part of the subject, we learn that, by the census of 1820, the population of the counties and districts of country actually traversed by the western route, is at least one hundred thousand less than that of the middle route; and the entire population of the States through which these surveys are carried is at least one million more, by pursuing the middle or eastern direction, than it is along the western. Here, then, is a difference of no small amount, upon the score of population only; but, sir, when you add to this the very important fact, that this greater amount of population divides itself into a greater number of independent States, united with and acting politically upon the General Government, is there not a twofold reason presented in favor of the route I propose? By going west, you pass through Virginia, Tennessee, and Alabama; in the eastern direction, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama. Thus, by the western proposition, as contained in the bill, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia are wholly omitted, for the alone purpose of embracing the State of Tennessee. And, sir, friendly as are my feelings towards that State, and every other member of our Union, I cannot, I ought not to be expected to forget the superior claims of my own State: and, sir, let me not be charged with selfish and contracted views on this subject; for, whilst I readily admit that, in acting here, we should, in the language of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. HEMPHILL] regard ourselves, on all general questions, as merely citizens of the United States, I do believe I shall certainly sustain that character most essentially, not by seeking a benefit for North Carolina at the expense of Tennessee, merely because it is the State from which I come, but from the consideration, that, in the present instance, her accommodation is connected with a still higher object—the attainment of a greater national benefit than would be accomplished by omitting her interest. This view of the subject is offered, not in connexion with the idea that, under the constitution, we have not the power to do what we propose, but is intended to apply to this or any other subject of legislation, considered as a mere question of expediency and right among the several States: and, in this view of the matter, it cannot be urged that there is a corrupting tendency in this or any other measure, because it has the effect of improving the condition and increasing the prosperity of the people of the different States; for such an objection would deny all right of beneficence to the Government, and would give to it alone the odious power of taxation and oppression. By such an administration of this Government, the people of the States would soon become aliens in feeling to the Union, and would regard the constitution as not tending to promote the general good, but merely calculated to inflict upon them the evils, without the benefit of Government. Then, sir, while objects of improvement, similar to that now under consideration, have heretofore been undertaken and completed in other parts of our country, it is but just, and in conformity with the principles of equality, that some portion of the benefits resulting from such measures should be distributed in that from which I come; but, independent of this consideration, I think, in relation to the present subject, the line of survey through my State presents advantages superior to those west of the mountains. As a further argument in favor of our claim, I might advert to the peculiar hardships and afflictions of the people of that ill-starred section of the Union, arising, as they believe, mainly from the unwise and ungenerous legislation of Congress upon subjects vitally affecting their interests. But, sir, while I forbear doing out a list of our oft repeated wrongs, I confess I was but illy prepared to hear with patience the imaginary sufferings and privations of the West. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ISACKS] in his petition for the establishment of this road, occupied much time in describing the forlorn condition of the people of his country; he complained bitterly because there had been so small a portion of Government money expended among them; he spoke of the vast amount paid by that people for the purchase of their lands, the large proportion of taxes paid by them through the medium of consumption, and concluded by exhibiting the inhabitants of the extensive West as the eighth wonder of the world, in the fact that, though thus afflicted and oppressed, they yet lived! they yet survived! Now, sir, I cannot perceive any cause for the gentleman's admiration, and can but think that all he has said, when rightly understood, is not only compatible with their bare existence, but is just that state of things from which we might expect to find all that comfort and growing prosperity which I believe to be more truly descriptive of their real condition. It is true that, in most instances, they have had to purchase their lands, but at a price most abundantly repaid by their amazing fertility, producing not only what is required for their own consumption, but affording a large supply for the wants of others. That a people thus situated should be able to subsist, is, to my mind, no cause of wonder or astonishment; and, sir, though it be true that the General Government yet maintains its dominion over the unappropriated lands in all that region, our statute book abounds with almost innumerable instances of donations made to States, companies, and individuals in the West, for purposes of internal improvement, the establishment of schools, and for various other objects tending to improve their condition and advance their prosperity. To objects of this description, at least ten millions of acres have been appropriated; and so liberal has been the policy of the Government on these subjects, that applications from this quarter are seldom rejected: and but the other day, with a near approach to unanimity, we passed a law relieving the purchasers of the public lands from a large amount of their debt, contracted under the credit system. Admit, then, that it is true, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania; [Mr. HEMPHILL] that the new States have not any funds in lands for making public improvements, who can believe that, if they had been the owners of the soil, they would, under their own policy and legislation, have applied so large a portion to these objects as has been done for them by this Government? Do not understand me, sir, as objecting to these instances of liberality, for many of them received my support, and, in giving it, I was uninfluenced with the hope thereby of obtaining any boon for my own State; (no, I disclaim the sordid idea); but I acted from the conviction that the prosperity of the West; or any other large section of our Union, was, in some degree, the prosperity of the nation. But, sir, if this and every other measure of internal improvement is to have a western direction—if the Southern States are to be wholly neglected under the operation of this system, and if we are again and again to hear the affected language of complaint from the West, then, sir, I am prepared to withhold my assent to any further appropriations in that quarter: justice to my constituents will require it—a regard to the principles of equality will demand it. We have also been entertained by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ISAACS] with a sort of begging argument, founded upon the great expenditure of public money along our sea coast in the erection of fortifications, dock yards, and other works connected with the defence and commerce of the nation; and the gentleman has even objected to the contributions of the West in the building up of our navy—a measure in which he seems to think they have a very remote interest. Perhaps, sir, when more, and still more of the public lands shall be appropriated towards the improvement of the Tennessee at the Muscle shoals and other points of that river, the gentleman may be accommodated with a little navy of his own—one that shall be peculiarly western; and, therefore, unobjectionable to that gentleman. I was surprised to hear the illiberal and mistaken views contained in this part of the gentleman's argument; for, can it be said, with the least plausibility, that fortifications erected and designed along our extended and exposed Atlantic border are other than measures of strength and precaution, looking to the security of the nation generally? In consonance with this anti-national sentiment would be an objection on my part to the increasing expenditure of our military posts designed for the protection of our western frontier. These objects are alike in principle, and are both equally entitled to the support of those who consult the peace and safety of every portion of this Union. Nor should the gentleman decline a common interest in our naval armament, intimately connected as it is with the defence and commerce of the nation. He has told us that the people of the West are great consumers of imports, and, consequently, pay much indirectly to the General Government; and we are assured that this road is greatly needed to facilitate their supplies from Baltimore and Philadelphia; yet their arrival at those ports is intimately connected with these maritime expenditures of which the gentleman seems to complain: and, whatever comment or construction of the constitution may be necessary to sustain many other acts claimed on the part of the Government, these of which I have just spoken are conspicuously provided for in that instrument, and should be regarded as not only national in their character, but indispensably necessary to the well-being, and even the very existence of the nation.

I might here, sir, conclude my remarks, having said all that I intend upon the mere question which I proposed to discuss; but I have alluded to an amendment, which, in conclusion, I intend to offer; and as I propose (should it be adopted) to vote for the bill, I hope I may be permitted not to enter into an argument in support of my opinion, but simply to say that I believe the power to do the act proposed does rightfully belong to the Government; and, in conformity to this opinion, I have, on former occasions, voted for measures not differing in principle from the one now under consideration. But, while sustaining this power of the Government, and acting upon the high conviction of its great importance, I have felt no little embarrassment for the want of the countenance and co-operation of yourself, and many other of our southern politicians; and though I cannot surrender my judgment on account of this discouraging reflection, yet I will not withhold the tribute of my respect, and even admiration, for the unshaken firmness and distinguished ability with which your opinions have been sustained. They have not yielded to those nice shades of distinction, which, in the opinion of some, may have been sufficient to obviate all constitutional objections, when the measure proposed happened to look towards their immediate constituents.

But, sir, were I to attempt an argument in support of my opinion, I could not rest it upon the distinction taken by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH]. That gentleman denies the right of the Government to make the road, yet he says we may appropriate the money for that object; Congress may give the essential means for constructing, but have not the power actually to construct or make; but, in yielding his assent to this bill, he virtually concedes the latter power, unless he intends to do the very idle thing of giving the money merely to be wasted and expended for no particular purpose; for if the road is to be made at all, the bill proposes that it shall be done under the authority of this Government, without the agency or superintendence of any other power. Perceiving this difficulty, he takes a distinction in favor of this road, and seems to admit that we may make it, not under the general powers conferred by the constitution, but under the compact entered into with Ohio, Alabama, and other new States, by which it is stipulated that five per cent. of the sales of the public lands shall be applied to the making of roads in or leading to those States; but certainly a compact with a State cannot enlarge the constitution, and thereby confer a power which did not exist independent of such agreement; this would be making the powers of the Government either greater or less, according to the terms of the bargain it might happen to make with the people of any of our territories, when applying for admission into the Union. Nor I perceive, according to the opinions of some, how the assent of a State could confer upon the General Government the power of acting upon a subject prohibited by the constitution. This Government, sir, with all its attributes, must exist independent of the will of any State; and while its powers cannot be curtailed by opposition, neither can they be enlarged by consent, except in the way pointed out for an amendment of the constitution itself. But, sir, while I deny the necessity of this assent, and its utter inability to confer power, it might often be prudent and wise, in many instances, to abstain from the exercise of federal authority, without the assent of the State or States to be affected by it; for, upon ordinary occasions, I would pause long, and consider much, before I would run counter even to the prejudices of the smallest member of this Union.

This I would do in the spirit of conciliation, and forbearance, and without yielding the right of this Government, when the public good imperiously demanded it, to exercise all or any of its high functions, even in opposition to the will of all the States. It is not all that this Government can constitutionally do, that the harmony and prosperity of the States require to be continually called into action; but when emergencies of great national moment arise, or some general interest is proposed to be advanced, a liberal interpretation of its powers will often be found necessary to subserve the end and object of its creation. If, sir, we look within the limits of the mere letter of the constitution for the charter of our legislative privileges, there is scarce a page of our legislation that will not be found to have passed the pale of our authority. What words of that instrument give us the right to pension our citizens, and to appropriate thousands for their support? How have we relieved the sufferings of foreigners, when visited by any sudden calamity? How do we repair the ravages of fire in any of our own cities or towns? How will we sustain the long list of appropriations of the public lands to institutions for the promotion of science and objects of benevolence? These, and many other acts sanctioned by every Congress, and approved by all our Chief Magistrates, are, like the power to make roads and canals, not authorized by the express enumeration of them in the constitution; but do, in my humble judgment, conform to the spirit, scope, and design of those powers that are enumerated. But, sir, I do not intend a discussion of this subject, and will conclude by moving the following amendment to the bill:

[Here Mr. S. offered his amendment, proposing to strike out the western, and to insert the middle or eastern route, leaving the selection to the commissioners to be appointed under the provisions of the bill.]

Mr. POLK next rose, and said, that two of the delegation from my own State having given their views in support of this bill, I ask the indulgence of the committee whilst I endeavor, in a plain and practical manner, to assign the reasons of the vote which I feel constrained to give. My two colleagues and myself have been in the habit, during our service together here, of thinking and acting together upon most important subjects. Upon this we differ in opinion, and are compelled to separate.

My colleague, who first addressed the committee, [Mr. BLAIR] dealt with his usual candor. He informed us that the road contemplated to be made by this bill, addressed itself to the local interests of his constituents; that they were in favor of the road; and that his skirts should be clear of the imputation of disobeying their will. Yes, sir, the road addresses itself to the local interests of his constituents, and this is the evil of this and all similar propositions; it is the iniquity of this whole system of internal improvement; it does address itself to the local interests of sections; it deludes, and deceives, and misleads whole sections and communities; whole masses are bought up, and become advocates of this system, with the prospect of local advantage to themselves. They look only to their own local interests, and to the prospect of having disbursed, in their own immediate neighborhoods, large amounts of the people's money. Let me ask either of my colleagues, through whose respective districts one branch of road has been surveyed, if it were to pass on either of the other routes, if they would vote for it? If it were to pass on either the middle or the metropolitan route, would not nine-tenths, would not ninety-nine-hundredths of their own constituents, whose local interests would not then be addressed, think it wholly inexpedient, if not unconstitutional, to make the road at all? I repeat it: would either of my colleagues deem it a national work? Would they vote for it? They would not. And why would they not? Because, in their opinion, the western route is the best route, and the only national route. They think the western route the only true route. But the two gentlemen from North Carolina, [Mr. CARSON and Mr. SHEPPERS] to the local interests of whose constituents the middle route ad-resses itself, have urged that that is the best route; that it is the national route; and, if it does not pass that way, they will vote against the bill. Nine-tenths, ninety-nine-hundredths of their constituents, if it does not pass on the middle route, will think it wholly inexpedient, if not unconstitutional, to make the road at all. One of the gentlemen from North Carolina, [Mr. CARSON] I believe, said that he would vote against the bill upon any route, but had warmly urged, if the road was made, that the middle was the only true route. Here is a conflict between sections—between masses of your population, whose local interests come in collision; and how are this Congress to decide between them? My two colleagues have stated in their places, that, in their opinion, the western is the only true route, and they think it would be inexpedient to make the road on any other. The two gentlemen from North Carolina have stated in their places, that, in their opinion, the middle is the only true route, and that it would be inexpedient to make the road on any other route; and, doubtless, there are gentlemen here residing on the southern route, who think that the best and only expedient route. The engineers, in their report, have cautiously left the scales equally balanced between these respective main routes and their several subordinate branches; and how are we to decide?

I know, sir, it is exceedingly popular to tell the people of any section of the country that the Government is about to expend large amounts of public money amongst them for improvements. But when you tell them that it is their own money, that they are taxed to pay it, and that there is a national debt to pay, will the people of any one section or district agree that it shall be expended in another, and for the local advantage of another? No, if they get it themselves, it is well; if it goes to their neighbors, it is unjust and all wrong. Sir, this is, perhaps, natural; we are selfish beings; and I beg my colleagues to understand me, when I speak of local interests, as not intending to apply my remarks to their districts exclusively; their constituents are like the constituents of other gentlemen, and equally operated upon by their local interests. I mean to show the effect generally, and upon all sections, of these splendid schemes of internal improvement which have been projected; of the hundreds of reconnoissances and surveys of roads and canals which have been made. I mean to show the delusion practised upon whole communities, whereby they are bought up to the support of these splendid schemes, by the lure of local advantages held out to them; by the promise to scatter and squander the public money in the construction of a road or canal, leading through their immediate neighborhoods, and, thereby, addressing itself to their local interests.

This bill, and the discussion we have had upon it, furnishes the best practical commentary we could possibly have had upon this system; and I beg leave to exemplify, by a particular examination of its details, the tendency and inevitable consequences of persisting in it. You are about to construct a mammoth road, fifteen hundred miles in length, from Buffalo, in the State of New York, to New Orleans, passing by this city; and you propose, by this bill, to appropriate two millions and a quarter of dollars, to be applied to this object. From this city to New Orleans, the bill provides that the road shall pursue the general course of one of the branches of the western route. This end of the road I will examine presently. From this city to Buffalo the road is not located to any particular route by the bill. It is to go from here to Buffalo, and that is the only designation. The particular locality is to be decided by commissioners. Now, how many reconnoissances have been made between these two points, and how many routes surveyed in this age of engineering? I hold a document in my hand, sir, from the Engineer Department, which is a perfect anomaly, and furnishes the best practical illustration of the practical operations of his system. By this document it appears that twenty-one distinct routes have been examined; and, take my word for it, every town, and village, and hamlet, and every mill, cross road, and tavern house, on each and every one of these twenty-one routes, expect this road; and each has no doubt that this is the only national way; and that on either of the others the road would be utterly useless and inexpedient. Yes, sir, there have been surveyed five grand routes, and fifteen subordinate or collateral routes, from this city to Buffalo, a distance of about three hundred and seventy-five miles. The five grand routes are designated in the report of the engineers:

- The Eastern route,
- The Western route,
- The Painted Post route,
- The Pine creek route,
- The Direct route.

The eastern route has been surveyed in nine different directions. One of these is to pass "Fredericktown, Gettysburg, Carlisle, Millerstown, Lewistown, Karthaus, Driftwood creek, Port Alleghany, Olean, Aurora." The people on this route, and in these towns, if they are like all others whose local interests are addressed, will have no doubt but that this is the only proper route, that is, the only national route; and they will be greatly dissatisfied if they do not get the road. But on eight other branches of the grand "eastern route," each passing through other towns and other neighborhoods, the people will have as little doubt that theirs is the national route, and that they are entitled to the road. The grand "western route" has been surveyed in three different directions; one of these is to pass Hagerstown, Loudon, Huntington, Philipsburg, Trout Run, Instantur, Ellicottsville, Barton. In the estimation of the people on this route, this would be the national way, and they would be entitled to this great road. But the grand "Painted Post route," (and I frankly acknowledge that my limited knowledge of the topography of the country does not inform me where the "Painted Post" is,) with its four distinct branches, are, no doubt, exceedingly national; and each branch of it exclusively so, in the opinion, at least, of those whose local interests are addressed by it. One of the four branches of this route would pass Westminster, Siddons town, Valley of Susquehanna, Williamsport, Peters's Camp, Bath, Mount Morris. But the grand "Pine creek route;" aye, sir, the grand "Pine creek route," with its four distinct subordinate branches, must not be overlooked. Doubtless that will be the most national route of all, at all events in the opinion of the settlers on Pine creek, (I suppose there is such a creek from the name of the route,) and by the people in the neighborhood whose local interests are addressed by it. One of the four branches of this grand route will pass through Wormleysburg, Uniontown, Jersey shore, Cowdersport, Oswego creek, Olean, Aurora. And, lastly, in this document, comes the "direct route," which would pass Weedsborough, Shippensburg, Valley of Driftwood creek, Barton. Here, then, sir, in the rage for engineering, surveying, reconnoitering, and electioneering, during the last administration, the hopes and expectations of a whole scope of country near a hundred miles in width, filled, I admit, with as virtuous and respectable a population as any in the Union, on twenty-one distinct routes for this road, have been raised on tiptoe. Each expects, and each has no doubt that it is entitled to the road. The hopes of all are kept up. The representatives of each and all these routes vote for this bill. But all cannot be gratified. Twenty of the twenty-one routes must be disappointed; and if this bill located the road to some one of the routes definitely, I have my doubts whether the representatives here of all the other routes would not vote against it. It is not the policy of the friends of this project to locate the road definitely in the bill, for they might thereby lose votes from the other routes, and the bill might be lost. Why are not the friends and advocates of this bill willing to designate in the bill the precise route of the road to Buffalo? Evidently from the conviction, on their part, that they would lose the support of the representatives of all the other routes. I appeal to gentlemen themselves, who support this bill, if this is a fair and statesman-like legislation. If the road must be made, why not fix the route in the law which authorizes its construction? Sir, we all understand how it happened that these several routes, twenty-one in number, came to be examined by brigades of topographical engineers. The examinations were made through portions of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and the western part of New York, during the last administration, and during the heat of the canvass for the last Presidential election. Some hopes were, likely, entertained, that these respective portions of the country might give their support to the then administration in the ensuing election. And, in order to stimulate the people, and ensure (as it was supposed) their support the more certainly, brigades of engineers were sent out in twenty different directions, to survey a great road. This powerful and delusive branch of Executive patronage was employed to induce whole sections, whose local interests were addressed, to believe, that, if they wanted this road, the best way to secure it was, to support the then administration. We have all seen and known the powerful effect of these reconnoissances of the United States' engineers through the country. I speak not of this project alone. Why was it that this road to Buffalo, all of a sudden, should have been deemed of so much national importance? Why should the delusion be kept up any longer? The certain effect of this system, as exemplified by this road, is, first, to excite hopes; second, to produce conflicts of section arrayed against section; and, lastly, dissatisfaction and heart-burnings amongst all who are not accommodated.

I come now to examine the southern portion of this road, that from this city to New Orleans. Three grand routes have been projected: the eastern, the middle, and the western, each with its subordinate and collateral routes. The distance between the extreme points of the western and eastern routes is near six hundred miles; and the first thing that forcibly strikes the mind is, that here is an immense country, the extreme lateral points of which are six hundred miles apart, each and every portion of which has been flattered with the hope, excited by the visit or reconnoissances of the United States' engineers, that each would have this great road to pass through each respective section of country. This bill provides that it shall be taken upon the general direction of the western route, as surveyed by the United States' engineers; but does any one know, can either of my colleagues tell me, where its precise locality will be? On the western route, from Washington as far as Lexington, in Virginia, we are informed, by the report of the engineers, that "two directions have been examined in relation to the western route, one through Rock Fish Gap, the other through Snicker's Gap." The people on both doubtless expect, but both cannot get it. From Lexington it passes Abingdon to Knoxville. At Knoxville the route forks. The main route, first surveyed, diverges from that point to the left, passes New Philadelphia, Athens, enters Alabama, passes Centreville, Demopolis, and thence to New Orleans. The other branch from Knoxville passes the Crab Orchard, Sparta, Winchester, Huntsville, in Alabama, thence to Baton Rouge, to New Orleans. The bill does not determine which of these routes it is to go. If it should be located on the New Philadelphia route from Knoxville, as one of my colleagues, [Mr. BLAINE] if I understood him, contends it ought, it will not touch the district represented by my other colleague; [Mr. ISAACS] it will not then address itself to the local interests of his constituents; and, in that event, I desire to know whether he will consider it sufficiently national to vote for it; would he be willing that the money of his constituents should be expended to construct it on any other than his own route? I shrewdly suspect he would not. If it so happens that it should not cross Cumberland mountain at all, his constituents will be apt to think they have been badly treated, and that it would be inexpedient to make the road on any other route. And if it does cross Cumberland mountain, New Philadelphia and the people on that route will be dissatisfied. If gentlemen are determined to construct this road, I submit to them whether it would not be better to have the precise route fixed with certainty, by previous survey, and then consider of the expediency of passing a law to construct it. But that is objected to; and why? I know of no reason, except that the bill would lose some of its present support, by locating the road to any one route definitely. All those routes which did not get it would fly off and vote against it. I shall vote against this bill, let the route be where it may. I have brought to the notice of the committee the conflicting interests of different sections, and large masses of your population arrayed against each other, for the purpose of showing the corrupting tendency of this whole system, by addressing itself to the sordid interests of sections and localities. I speak of the tendencies and certain effects of the system. I do not wish to be misunderstood by my colleagues, or any one else, upon this subject. I do not intend to impute to them or their constituents any thing which does not equally apply to my own, and to the constituents of every other gentleman upon this floor. There are but few districts that will resist the lure of local gain, in the shape of a road or a canal, if you will hold it out to them. I have seen something of its effects in my own district. This same national road was mounted as a political hobby, three or four years ago, in that district. For a time, the people seemed to be carried away with the prospect of having millions of public money expended among them. We were to have a main route and cross routes intersecting the district in every direction. It was to run down every creek, and pass through almost every neighborhood in the district. As soon as there was time for reason to assume her seat, the delusion passed off. The people very properly reflected that the money to build the road was collected by taxes paid in part by them. They reflected, too, that the nation owed a debt of many millions, upon which a large annual interest was paid. Their better judgment taught them that it was time enough, if ever, to enter upon these splendid and extravagant schemes of internal improvement when the public debt was paid. And, sir, this is the conclusion to which the people of every district must and will finally come, when they properly understand the practical operations of the system. The delusion may, and probably will, continue as long as localities and sections are flattered with the immediate prospect of gain to themselves, at the cost of all the rest of the people of the Union. But, sooner or later, the veil which obscures the vision will be rent asunder; they will see the evil effect of this system, and put it down.

There is one remarkable fact attending the discussion of this bill; which illustrates the tendency of which I have spoken. Every gentleman who has advocated it, with the single exception of the honorable chairman who reported it, represents districts through which some one or other of the many routes of this mammoth road is expected to pass. Each advocates his particular part of the road, and seems to have but little care for any other. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RAMSEY] advocates the Buffalo end of the road; that passes through his district. He says he leaves the New Orleans end of the road to other gentlemen who are interested in it. My two colleagues, and the two gentlemen from Virginia, who have addressed the committee, argue to prove the importance of the New Orleans end of the road; they leave the Buffalo end to gentlemen who are more particularly interested in it. What does this prove, sir? Why, that we are each representing our own local interest; and to what will it lead, and to what has it led upon this very bill? To combinations of local interests, to effect that which no one local interest by itself could effect. Why was it that the road from Washington to Buffalo, and the road from Washington to New Orleans, were united in one bill? Was there any necessary connexion between them? Were they ever united before the present session? Was such a union ever dreamt of before? Am I at liberty to suppose that they were united for the purpose of combining local interests enough to carry the whole, but which neither, standing independent of the other, could effect? I put it to my colleagues, and to the two gentlemen from Virginia, to know if they would vote, if their constituents would justify them in voting away so large a sum of the people's money, to construct the road from Washington to Buffalo, if the New Orleans end of the road was struck out of this bill. Would the gentlemen residing on the Buffalo end deem it expedient to vote for the New Orleans end, if that to Buffalo was struck out? Sir, I beg gentlemen to trace the operations of these combinations of local interests a little further. I hold in my hand an amendment laid upon the table by a gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RICHARDSON] a few days ago, and printed by order of the House, which he intends to offer to this bill, as soon as he can get the floor. I will read it. Sir, it proposes to extend the road "from Buffalo, in the State of New York, to the head of Lake Champlain, in Vermont, and thence to Boston, in the State of Massachusetts." If this amendment should be adopted, we shall have a gigantic, a tremendous road, indeed. A road from Boston to New Orleans. If this does not give strength enough to the bill to pass, add more to it. Extend it to Hartford, if you please; we may need a military road in that direction, in the event of another war. If this is not still sufficient, I see a bill reported, and now upon our tables, proposing to appropriate forty-four thousand dollars "to improve Back creek;" and where Back creek is, I am again at fault, no doubt from my want of knowledge of the geography of the country; but it must, of course, be a great national work. Add this to one end of this road; put on it "Conneaut creek" and "Cunningham creek," and divers other creeks, which I see have been surveyed by the United States' engineers as great national objects, and be sure that you unite local interests enough to carry the bill. This is the magnificent and beautiful system that is now in the full tide of experiment. Can we close our eyes, if we would, upon its unequal, unjust, and pernicious operation, both here and upon the community, if it is persisted in?

I have spoken of conflicts between sections of country, and between different masses of people arrayed against each other, and I have spoken of combinations of interests to effect a common purpose. These conflicts and combinations will exist, not only out of this House, but in it. They will exist here; and, by saying this, I do not wish to be understood as imputing any thing wrong to any one. It is the natural and almost inevitable consequence, if this system goes on. The combinations of the strong sections of the Union represented in this House will overshadow and overpower the weak; and in this general scramble for the public money, (for I can call it by no other name,) the weak will get no portion of the spoil.

I have taken this road as one out of the many objects of improvement which have been projected, to illustrate the evil tendencies and pernicious effects of this system generally. From a report of the Board of Topographical Engineers, communicated to Congress at its last session, I find that, on the 8th of December, 1828, there had been projected and surveyed one hundred and twenty-eight distinct objects of national internal improvement. Since that time we have no report showing the increased number. No one knows

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

how many more there are. All, of course, great national works. The power to construct each and all of them, according to the doctrines of the advocates of this system, is derived either from the war-making, the commercial, or the post office powers. In this document we find, among other equally national works, the following truly important projects: "survey of Conneaut creek, with a view to its improvement;" removing obstructions at the mouth of Ashtabula creek;" "survey at the mouth of Sandy creek," &c.; and how many other creeks, of great national importance, have been surveyed and examined, I will not fatigue the committee by reciting. Each gentleman can examine this very interesting document for himself. One or two others, however, I must mention, before I pass from this document. I find, sir, a "survey of the Cobhoseconte canal route," a "survey of the Winnepiseogee canal route." (I do not know that I pronounce these names right. The learned gentleman before me [Mr. EVERETT] says I do. I am glad of it. I believe it is the first time I ever saw the words in my life.) But no doubt they are great national works. I find, too, there has been a "survey of the Sunapee canal route," a "survey of the levels of the Androscoggin river," a "survey of the Ammonoosuck canal route," and many other such great national works. Every creek, and mill path, and corner of the country, at which a United States' engineer touches, assumes, as if by magic, nationality of character. It is at once dubbed a great public improvement, and its construction by Congress clearly authorized, according to the doctrines of the advocates of this system, under the war, the commercial, or the post office powers: Whatever the President, or his engineers, or Congress, in their discretion, choose to denominate national works, become so ipso facto; but there is no security that what is national this year will continue to be so the next.

I have no means of calculating what the probable cost of constructing all the works contained in the long catalogue of projects contained in this document would be. I have understood that some general estimate has been made, by which it is calculated that it will require the revenue which we may have to spare, for more than half a century to come, to complete them. All cannot be constructed at once, and presently we will see conflicts between the friends of different objects for precedence in point of time. When we contemplate the illimitable extent of these visionary and wild schemes; when we see the abuses to which it has been, and may be, subject, in scattering and wasting the public money; when we see that it has been, and may again be, used as a powerful branch of Executive patronage, to buy up whole sections of country to the support of the "powers that be," even if there was an express grant of power in the constitution, ought we not to stop in our wild career, and pause and hesitate before we push it further?

I beg leave now to notice some of the arguments which have been urged in support of this bill, and to inquire what advantages would result, in a national point of view, from the construction of this road. I admit that good roads are an advantage to a neighborhood, or county, or State, or the nation; and if made by the proper authority, and if they do not cost too much, I do not object to them. But all roads are not national; and some of the benefits which my colleagues suppose would be derived from the construction of this road, in the manner proposed, I am sure are rather ideal than real. One of my colleagues [Mr. ISAACS] urged, with much earnestness, that it would be a saving of thirty-nine thousand dollars per annum in the transportation of the mail. A very short examination, in a more financial view, will show the fallacy of this argument. I understand that the average cost of transporting the mail in stages, on the present roads, from Buffalo to New Orleans, is fifty-two dollars per mile. The distance is fifteen hundred miles. At this rate, the amount paid annually is seventy-eight thousand dollars. This bill proposes to appropriate two and a quarter millions of dollars to make a mud road. The interest for a year upon this sum, at six per cent. per annum, is one hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars. So that the simple interest per annum, upon the amount now proposed to be expended to commence this road, will be fifty-seven thousand dollars more than the whole amount now paid for transporting the mail on the present roads. Now the money, if left in the pockets of the people, and especially in the Western States, is always worth simple interest, and more; and will my colleague tell me where the saving, in a pecuniary point of view, upon which he dwelt with so much confidence, would be? If we estimate the value of this improvement by a calculation of dollars and cents, will there not be a clear loss instead of a saving? But the two and a quarter millions, to be expended under the provisions of this bill, will be but a small portion of the amount which will be required to complete it. This is only intended by the advocates of the bill to make it a mud road. It will not be more than sufficient to locate it, to clear out the brush, to throw up the earth and graduate it. To construct it upon the McAdam plan, the engineers, in their report, estimate that it will cost:

From Buffalo to Washington,	$ 1,877,063 92
From Washington to New Orleans	5,997,802 30

This immense sum, as all other estimates for similar works have proved to be, will doubtless fall much below the real cost. But suppose this sum to be sufficient to construct it, the annual interest upon it, at six per cent. per annum, will be four hundred and seventy-two thousand four hundred and ninety-one dollars and ninety-six cents. The interest upon the cost of construction will be more than six times the whole amount now paid per annum for transporting the mail. Where, then, will be the saving of which my colleague speaks? If we take the actual cost of the Cumberland road as the criterion by which to estimate the probable cost of this, it will amount to more than twenty-one millions of dollars; and the annual interest upon the cost will be more than a million of dollars. The road when made will have to be kept in repair; and if we take our experience upon the Cumberland road as any evidence of what is to occur upon this road when made, we shall be called upon annually to make large appropriations to keep it up. And if we do not make them, it will dilapidate and go to ruin. The States through which it will pass will have the humiliating honor of being annual beggars for life at your door, asking for appropriations to keep it in repair. This, sir, is the saving we will witness.

This great road, according to the arguments of my colleague, [Mr. BLAIR] is to constitute a great artery from the southern extremity of the Union to the northern border; it is to afford facilities for the marching of troops and the transportation of the means of defence from the interior to the extremes, in the event of war.

He insists that the munitions of war could be transported, the troops from Kentucky and Tennessee could be marched upon it in a much shorter time, to the defence of the southern frontier. Now, sir, all who will examine the map of these two States will at once perceive that it would require more time for an army from Kentucky and some portions of Tennessee to march across the country to get to this road, than it would to go on board a steamboat on the Ohio or Tennessee river, go to the South, fight the battle, and almost get home again. From Knoxville, by land, through Alabama to New Orleans, the way this road is to go is more than seven hundred miles. If this road is to be constructed, either for military or commercial purposes, or for the transportation of the mail, any one who looks upon the map will perceive that the proper route would be direct from Knoxville to Memphis, or some other point on the Mississippi river, from which steamboats run at all seasons of the year. It would pass, on this route, through a portion of the country upon which New Orleans must depend for defence in the event of war; the land travel would be shortened from two to four hundred miles; and at the Mississippi you would be within two or three days of New Orleans.

If any road is to be made for national or for any other purposes, this is the direction it ought to take. The Legislature of Tennessee, at its late session, have said that the State contemplates making a road from the Virginia line to the Mississippi river; they have asked the co-operation of Virginia to extend the road through that State; and she has said further, that the only manner in which this Government could give any aid, in the construction of such works, "consistent with the sovereignty of the States, and the legitimate powers of the United States," was by subscription for stocks in companies incorporated by the States. I do not mention this to raise the constitutional question; I only mention it to show, if the friends of this system are determined to make this road, regardless of all consequences, they ought to make it in the most useful direction. I understand that an amendment will be offered to change the route to the Mississippi river; for that I shall vote, but will finally vote against the bill on any route. To East Tennessee, whether in a military or commercial point of view, if improvements must be made, I submit to my colleagues and to the committee, whether it would not be of infinitely more advantage, and at less than a fourth of the cost of this road, to remove the obstructions in the Tennessee river, and connect the waters of the Tennessee with the rivers flowing into the bay of Mobile by a short canal. Could not troops and the products exported reach the points of destination much earlier and much easier by water than by this road? As to military purposes, no enemy is likely to invade our southern border at any other season than in the winter, and at that season our rivers are always navigable. East of the Alleghany mountain, from Western Virginia, the road to market, or to the defence of Virginia, is to Richmond or Norfolk. There are already good roads made by State authority from Staunton and Charlottesville to Richmond. From this city to Buffalo, how a road was ever conceived to be of importance in a national point of view, I do not know. The gentleman from Virginia, near me, [Mr. MERCER] formerly at the head of the Committee on Roads and Canals, no doubt can tell. He has a peculiar felicity in nationalizing every object of improvement, whether it be the mouth of a creek, or a neighborhood canal or road. If that gentleman shall be blessed with a continuance of life and health for twenty years more, and continues in the service of this House, I have no doubt he will be the most voluminous writer of the age upon the subject of roads and canals. He will leave a posthumous reputation behind him that will live in the documentary history of the country. And it will be fortunate for him if that reputation sustains no injury; from the fact that he has largely contributed to fasten upon the country a system that will embarrass the finances, oppress the people with unnecessary taxation, and distract the harmony of the Union.

I cannot but express my utter astonishment and deep regret at the argument that fell from another gentleman [Mr. SMITH, of Virginia] in support of this bill. It is true this road is expected to pass through his district, and addresses itself to the local interests of his constituents; but he is the last man in the House that I should have expected to see shake and falter in his long settled opinions. It is the strongest evidence we could have of the effects of this system, when it addresses itself to the local interests of sections. In the course of a long service here, the gentleman has uniformly denied the power of this Government to prosecute this system. In 1824, his powerful mind operated upon this great subject, and he delivered an argument upon this floor, which gained him a reputation which I am sorry to see him about to impair. In his argument upon this bill, he still denies the power, not only to construct, but to appropriate money to construct, roads and canals within the limits of the States. He places his vote for this bill upon a ground which no one before had thought of. He places it upon the ground of compact with the States of Alabama and Mississippi, and says it rests upon the same ground that the power to construct the Cumberland road rested. Will the gentleman inform the committee, if the constitution does not confer the power upon Congress, (and he says it does not,) how it is that a compact or a bargain with a territory about to be admitted into the Union, or how it is that an agreement with a single State can confer it. What is the compact with Alabama and Mississippi? Nothing more than that which has been made with most of the new States, upon their admission into the Union. It is, that five per cent. of the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands within their respective limits shall be reserved, three-fifths of which shall be applied by the Legislature of that State to make roads within the State, and two-fifths to the "making a road or roads to the said State, under the direction of Congress!" What is the compact with Ohio? It is, that one-twentieth, or five per cent. of the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands within that State "shall be applied to the laying out and making public roads, leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio, to the said State, and through the same, such roads to be laid out under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the several States through which the road shall pass." Although the consent of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, through whose territory the Cumberland road passed, from the navigable waters of the Atlantic to the Ohio, was given, yet, so strong have the gentleman's opinions heretofore been against the exercise of this power by Congress, that he has uniformly voted against all appropriations to construct or repair the Cumberland road. At the first session of the last Congress, at the very last session, he voted against an appropriation for this object. He now says that, under the compact with Alabama and Mississippi, if the road passes through any part of the territory of those States, we have the power to construct it; and as there is no point of beginning designated in the compact, we may begin it at Buffalo, or any other point, and run it through the territory of several intermediate States, whose consent has not been given. The consent of the gentleman's own State has not been given, and I shrewdly suspect will not be. The gentleman's argument amounts to this: that although in his opinion the constitution does not confer the power, yet, if you think proper to begin a road in one corner of Alabama or Mississippi, you may extend and ramify it all over the Union, and that, too, without the consent of the other States, upon the ground of compact. Surely the gentleman, upon further reflection, will not attempt to maintain this position. But, if he could, we are not authorized or bound, by the compact itself, to appropriate more than the five per cent. of the nett proceeds of the sales of the lands within those States. This bill appropriates much more. Suppose it could be placed on this ground, are Alabama and Mississippi asking for the execution of this compact, by passing this bill, or making this gigantic road? They are not. You have no memorials upon your table from those States for any such purpose. The representative from Mississippi upon this floor is opposed to the bill; the delegation from Alabama are divided; I understand a majority of them will vote against the bill. The gentleman must look out for some other ground—this certainly cannot be maintained.

The constitutional question I shall not argue or touch. It has long since been exhausted. But I beg to look at some of the details of this bill, and inquire of its advocates how they are to avoid some of the inherent difficulties which must present themselves in the construction of this road through the States. Commissioners are to be appointed to receive releases from the owners of lands over which the road is to pass. But, suppose the owners are minors, non-residents, or beyond seas, how are you to procure the release? Suppose the owner is unwilling to give it to you, will you extend the arm of the federal power, and coerce him? You have not ventured to put such a provision in the bill. That would be too bold. It might alarm the State sovereignties, and create resistance—constitutional resistance, I mean. It might produce collisions, difficult to manage, between the federal and State authorities. The same power that would enable you, by force, and against the consent of the owner and the State, to run your road through a man's plantation, would enable you to cut down his orchard, to demolish his houses, or to tear down court-houses if they stood in your way. Will you assume exclusive jurisdiction over the road, and punish offences committed upon it, by the federal judiciary? These are weighty considerations, worthy of much deliberation. If this road crosses the mountains at Rockfish Gap, it will intersect a State turnpike road, constructed by a company incorporated by the State of Virginia. Can this Government and the State of Virginia both exercise exclusive jurisdiction, at one and the same time, over the same space, and on the same subject matter? This turnpike company have vested rights under their charter, and the State of Virginia is pledged to guaranty them; and if their private interest should be affected by the construction of this road, and they should appeal to Virginia to make good her guaranty, is there no danger of serious collision? I merely throw out these things for the consideration of gentlemen, without intending to enter into the argument.

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

But my colleague [Mr. BLAIR] says that the question is settled; the constitutional question, I suppose, he means. Without admitting the fact, suppose, for the purposes of the present argument, that it was, is that any reason why we should vote for every visionary and extravagant proposition which shall be presented, under the guise and livery and name of internal improvement? Is it any reason why we should beggar the treasury, or postpone the payment of the public debt? But my colleague says that he would have the Government to do as he himself would do as an individual. If he had plenty of money, he says, he would buy a new coat; but if he had not, he would do without it. And if the Government has a full treasury, he would make a road. Let me ask him if he had plenty of money, as he calls it, and was indebted, if it would not be the part of prudence first to pay the debt, and then consider whether he could afford to get the coat? And if the nation is indebted, let me ask him if it is not the part of prudence first to pay the national debt, and then consider of the propriety of making the road?

I would next call the attention of the committee to an argument of an extraordinary character, used in support of this bill by a gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. CRAIG.] The gentleman, if I understood him, denied the power of Congress to make roads through the States, without the consent of the States; but, as this road passed through his district, and addressed itself to the local interests of his constituents, he concluded to vote for this bill, without the consent of the States. The reasons assigned for the vote were singular enough. They were, that the money was already in the treasury; and whether it got there constitutionally or unconstitutionally, it was the people's money, and we should not keep it on hand, useless and idle, but should distribute it amongst the people. The gentleman takes for granted a fact which does not exist. We have not a dollar on hand but what we have immediate use for, either in defraying the expenses of the Government, or in paying the debt. He seemed to suppose that the treasury was overflowing; that it was laboring under a dropsical affection; and he proposes to relieve it by tapping. Now, I would say to the gentleman, that he ought to be certain, in the first place, that the disease exists. In my opinion, he has mistaken the symptoms. But, if it does exist, I have understood that tapping is a very dangerous operation, and ought never to be undertaken but by senior physicians, and then not until all other means to save the patient had failed. The honorable chairman of the committee, [Mr. HEMPHILL] who reported this bill, is a senior; but even he should not hazard so perilous an operation, without a regular consultation of political doctors. There is, I believe in some of the colleges, such a degree as bachelor of medicine; and those who take it are accounted junior members of the profession. The gentleman from Virginia, and my two colleagues, have taken this degree, but are not yet entitled to be ranked as seniors. The junior members of the profession ordinarily enter upon the practice by dealing in simples. They commence by drawing teeth, blood-letting, and administering simple sudorifics; but it is contrary to all rule for them to use the knife in difficult surgical operations. And I would say to my two colleagues, and to the gentleman from Virginia, that they ought to be exceedingly cautious how they enter upon the operation which they are about to perform; should take care that they do not draw off from the body politic too much of its substance, and thereby leave the patient in an enfeebled and sickly state. It might linger and die on their hands. Sir, to be serious, you are about to tap the treasury with a vengeance. I have taken some pains to ascertain the amount proposed to be appropriated at this session of Congress for objects of internal improvement. The amount proposed to be appropriated by the bills already reported upon this subject, and now upon the table, including the two and a quarter millions contained in this bill, amount to four million two hundred and thirty-nine thousand dollars for the present year. How many more projects are under examination in the Committee on Internal Improvements, I do not know; but we know we have a new bill reported to us almost every day. Have gentlemen looked to the state of the treasury to see whether it will bear these heavy appropriations? Will they invade the sinking fund, and check the payment of the national debt? We all know, that, besides the annual sinking fund of ten millions, whatever surplus may at any time remain in the treasury, over two millions is applicable, by the act of 1817, to the payment of the interest and extinguishment of the principal of the national debt. And whatever appropriations are made for objects of internal improvement, or for any other purpose other than the necessary expenses of the Government, is so much subtracted from the payment of the debt. I was sorry to hear one sentiment fall from my worthy colleague, [Mr. BLAIR.] In his zeal to pass this bill, he said he need not be told that the public debt must be paid before we go into this system. I differ from my colleague in opinion. We owe a debt of more than forty-eight millions of dollars, upon which we pay an annual interest. And although our public debt is small, and indeed very trifling, when compared with the British debt, and perhaps that of every other civilized nation in the world—I look to its total and speedy extinguishment as an event devoutly to be wished for. A part of it is a debt, not only of obligation, but of gratitude; a debt of the revolution; a part of the price of the liberty we enjoy. I am gratified that it is a part of the policy of the present administration speedily to pay it. I would make none but the necessary appropriations for the support of Government, and thus leave in the hands of the Executive all the means which the receipts into the treasury would furnish, to enable him to accomplish it. If, by large and extravagant appropriations, we absorb a large portion of the revenue in objects of internal improvements, its payment, pro tanto, must be retarded. I wish to see this nation exhibit to the world the rare spectacle of a great and a powerful people freed from her pecuniary obligations; of a nation possessing vast resources, without a debt of a dollar. My colleague complains that large disbursements are made on tide water in fortifications, in building ships, in supporting a navy and army, in preparing the means of defence, and in protecting commerce; and he wishes to distribute a portion of the public money in other quarters of the Union. He does not expect an equal distribution under the operation of this favorite system of his, but he would have it so as nearly as may be. It is idle to talk about equality in this general scramble for the public crumbs. We will never get it. The system itself, if it goes on, is unequal and unjust, and we can never expect to receive our due proportion. We had better pay off the debt first, and then reduce the taxes, modify the tariff, and leave in the pockets of the people all that is not absolutely necessary for the support of Government. My colleague candidly admitted, in the course of argument, that if the money was collected by a direct tax upon the people, he would not vote to appropriate it for this or any other object of internal improvement. Now what is the difference? Do not the people now pay every dollar of the revenue by a tax imposed upon them, and paid by them, in a different mode? The tax collector, it is true, does not go to their doors, and demand and receive the portion of each. Each individual does not see the amount of tax which he pays go into the hands of the collector; but, notwithstanding, he pays the tax in the increased price that he pays upon almost every article of necessity which he eats, drinks, or wears. He pays it upon every bushel of salt he uses, upon every pound of iron, upon coffee, tea, sugar; upon every blanket and great coat that protects him from the inclemency of the season in winter. In short, every head of a family, whether rich or poor, pays a tax, and a heavy tax, in the increased price he pays upon every article himself or his family buys or are compelled to use, and which he does not furnish himself by his own labor or the domestic industry of his family. The revenue of the country is collected by a tax upon the people of the country. The tax is an indirect one. It is a tax on consumption; but it is as much a tax, and is as oppressive upon the people, as if it was a direct tax. According to the admission of my colleague, if the tax was paid directly by the people, so that each individual could see, and feel, and know, the precise amount which he did pay, he would not vote for this or any other appropriation for similar objects; but as the tax, although paid by the people, is collected in a different mode, and the people do not so well see and know the amount they do pay, he will vote for this and all other similar propositions; the argument is, in fact, this: If the mass of the people saw and understood the amount of taxes they pay, my colleague, and others who favor this system, would not, and dare not, vote to waste and squander public money in projects like this. There are not a dozen members upon this floor—I doubt whether there is a single individual, who would dare to support this system in the wild and visionary extent to which it has been pushed, if the revenue was collected by a direct tax, or if the amount of taxation actually paid under the present mode of collection, by imposts and duties, could be brought home to the knowledge of each gentleman's constituents.

The whole annual revenue of the United States, paid by the people in the shape of indirect taxation, may be put down in round numbers at twenty-four millions of dollars; it is about that amount. The aggregate of federal population, including three-fifths of the slaves, taken into the enumeration by the constitution, is about twelve millions of souls. Double the number of dollars, then, are collected than there are souls in the United States; so that every man, woman, and child, in the country, pays an average tax of two dollars per head. Each head of a family probably pays, upon an average, an annual tax of fifteen or twenty dollars. About half the annual revenue, or about twelve millions of dollars, is required to pay the necessary expenses of the Government. For the necessary support of Government, the people, every where, will cheerfully submit to any amount of taxation. The other half, or about twelve millions of dollars annually, is applicable to the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt, unless it is diverted from that application by appropriations such as this. After the debt is paid, according to the present rates of taxation, the people will pay twelve millions of dollars per annum, or a dollar a head for every soul more than is required for the support of the Government. When the debt is paid, will the people of this country submit to pay this enormous and unnecessary tax, merely for the purpose of enabling their representatives here to scramble for it, and waste it by unequal disbursements in wild projects of internal improvements, or for any other purposes? or will not public opinion force you to reduce your taxes, and thus leave in the pockets of your people a great portion of what they now are compelled to pay? Sir, let me apply these palpable facts to my own State, to the districts of my two colleagues, and to my own district, and see how the account stands. The constituents of my colleagues and myself, and the mass of the people of Tennessee, are agriculturists. The population of that State is about six hundred thousand souls; and upon the supposition that they pay their ratable proportion of the annual revenue, (and no one doubts the fact,) they then pay annually, in the shape of indirect taxation, one million two hundred thousand dollars. Half this amount, or six hundred thousand dollars, goes to the support of the Government, leaving the other half, or six hundred thousand dollars annually, to pay the public debt, and, after the debt is paid, if the taxes are brought down to the necessities of the Government, leaving in the pockets of the people of that State six hundred thousand dollars per year, no longer required from them in the shape of taxes. Suppose this system of internal improvement should be persisted in after the debt is paid, and the people should continue to be taxed to raise money to carry it on; let me ask either of my colleagues if they believe that Tennessee, in this general scuffle, when all will be contending for as much as they can get, will ever receive six hundred thousand dollars per annum for her share? Will she ever receive back as much as she pays in? She will not. And if she did, upon what principle of sound political economy is it, that you will collect a tax from your people, for the mere purpose of re-distributing or returning it back to them? It will be impossible, under any system that you can adopt, to re-distribute the money to the different sections of the Union in the same proportion that it is contributed.

Is this system of excessive taxation to endure forever? And must this system of internal improvement be kept up for the mere purpose of absorbing the surplus revenue? Does any thinking man suppose it will, or can? There is one point, I believe, upon which tariff men and anti-tariff men are agreed, and that is, as soon as the debt is paid, at all events, gradually to reduce, and finally to repeal, the duties on all those articles which do not come in competition with our own manufactures. This will reduce the taxes upon all sections from seven to eight millions per annum. The surplus would then be from four to five millions per annum. Must this excess of taxes be kept up to carry on internal improvements? Will you still keep this surplus in the treasury, to wrangle and contend about here? Did any wise Government in the world ever tax its people more than the exigencies of that Government required? I know it is the policy of the friends of a certain system to keep up the high taxes; to procrastinate the payment of the public debt; and, when it is paid, to have a plausible pretext to expend the surplus that is not needed for any necessary purposes of the Government. Sir, it is as well to speak out plainly what I think of this policy. The "American system," as it is falsely called, consists of three things: it is a tripod, it is a stool that stands upon three legs; first, high prices of the public lands, to prevent emigration to the West, or, as the late Secretary of the Treasury, [Mr. Rush] in his report two years ago, said, to check by high prices the system of bounties which he supposed were held out to agricultural pursuits in the West by the low prices of public lands. Or, in other words, the policy of this branch of the system is, to sell your lands high, prevent thereby the inducements to emigration, retain a population of paupers in the East, who may, of necessity, be driven into manufactories, to labor at low wages for their daily bread. The second branch of the system is high duties, high taxes, the consequences of which are twofold; first, to protect the manufacturer, by enabling him to sell his wares at higher prices, and next to produce an excess of revenue. The third branch of the system is internal improvements, which is the sponge which is to suck up the excess of revenue which you collect from your people. These constitute the splendid system by which the people of a great portion of this Union are to be taxed, and oppressively taxed, in all time to come, unless the policy is changed. The people of the West will soon see, if they do not already see, their true interest. The speedy sale and settlement, at low prices, of the public lands, is the paramount interest of the West, and it is the true interest of the whole Union, with the exception of the particular interest I have mentioned. I would sell out the public lands at low prices—at much lower prices than they ever have been sold. I would have them speedily settled by a hardy race of enterprising freemen, who would feel that they had a stake in the Government. I would impose no unnecessary taxation upon them, to support any particular interest. I would relieve the burdens of the whole community, as far as possible, by reducing the taxes. I would keep as much money in the treasury as the safety of the Government required, and no more. I would keep no surplus there to scramble for, either for internal improvements, or for any thing else. I would bring the Government back to what it was intended to be—a plain, economical Government.

We had a party in this country and in this House a few years ago, who were proud to be called radicals, and who assumed to be almost the exclusive friends of a plain and cheap Government. We find but few of them here now. Many of them, I fear, have changed the red jacket for the white, and have hoisted a new flag. Many of them, I fear, have mounted this delusion, this splendid "American system," this grand scheme of spending millions of the public money in internal improvements, as a political hobby upon which to ride into power.

The history and present practical operations of the constitution may be dated at the peace of 1815. Before that period, the Federal Government performed the functions, which it was chiefly intended to perform, by the States who were parties to the compact, and who created it. Up to that time, the action of the Government was chiefly external; the attention of its rulers was mainly taken up in attending to our foreign relations. In the early history of the Government, and during the long continued wars in Europe, it required a most vigilant attention to preserve a strict neutrality on our part. We were threatened with war, our commerce and our rights were invaded upon the seas; we were driven to an embargo, to a system of non-intercourse, and finally into the war of 1812. During this whole period, the action of this Government may be said to have been external. At the restoration of peace in 1815, our difficulties abroad were at an end, our rights came to be respected by all nations, and the attention of the Government was turned internally. Since 1815, the action of the Government has been internal and essentially vicious; I repeat, sir, essentially vicious. There has been a constant tendency increased and daily increasing, to accumulate power in the federal head, and to encroach upon the legitimate reserved powers of the States; a constant tendency to assume the exercise of doubtful constructive powers, and to build up here a splendid Government, differing, if this tendency shall continue, only in name from a consolidated empire. I was glad to hear my friend and colleague [Mr. BLAIR] say that he cherished the sovereignty of the States; and that he would have the Federal and the State Government each to move in their respective orbits, neither invading or encroaching upon the rights of the other. I heartily respond to this sentiment; but how my colleague reconciles it to the vote which he intends to give for this bill, I shall not undertake to decide. Upon the preservation of the rights of the States depends the perpetuity of the equipoise of powers between the Federal and State Governments, intended to be observed at the adoption of the constitution. The States will be the last citadels of your liberty; and so long as the wholesome check which they were intended to constitute upon the Federal Government remains, it will last forever. We are in no danger from a foreign enemy, who boldly shows himself, and lands upon our shore; we will meet him at the water's edge, and mark his approach by the blood of his soldiery. It is by slow and imperceptible assumptions of power on the part of this Government; that the balance of the constitution may be disturbed, and the liberties of the country undermined. I am not discussing the constitutional question involved by this bill. It has been my whole purpose throughout to avoid that, and to oppose the bill upon the ground of its expediency alone. I have been led into this digression by the sentiment that fell from my esteemed colleague, [Mr. BLAIR.] I shall not be provoked to depart from my original purpose by the broad doctrines laid down by my colleague, [Mr. ISACKS.] This is not the time nor the occasion to go into any examination of the nullifying power of the State authorities alluded to by him, nor to inquire how far the States may constitutionally resist the operation, within their limits, of powers assumed by this Government, which the States may suppose it does not possess. I only mention it now, for the purpose of saying that I cannot go with my colleague to the extent of the doctrines which I understood him to lay down.

Before I conclude, I beg leave to call the attention of the committee to a part of the message of the President at the opening of the present session of Congress. And if this system must go on; if we who are opposed to it are in a minority; if its friends are determined to press it; I call upon them to stay their hands for the present. Take the suggestion contained in the passage which I shall read as preferable to the present plan; husband all your means; pay off the public debt first; and then, if you are determined not to reduce the taxes, and there be a surplus in the treasury, "apportion it among the several States according to their ratio of representation." The passage to which I allude is as follows:

"As, then, the period approaches, when the application of the revenue to the payment of debt will cease, the disposition of the surplus will present a subject for the serious deliberation of Congress: and it may be fortunate for the country that it is yet to be decided. Considered in connexion with the difficulties which have heretofore attended appropriations for purposes of internal improvement, and with those which this experience tells us will certainly arise, whenever power over such subjects may be exercised by the General Government, it is hoped that it may lead to the adoption of some plan which will reconcile the diversified interests of the States, and strengthen the bonds which unite them. Every member of the Union, in peace and in war, will be benefited by the improvement of inland navigation, and the construction of highways in the several States. Let us then endeavor to attain this benefit in a mode which will be satisfactory to all. That hitherto adopted has, by many of our fellow-citizens, been deprecated as an infraction of the constitution; while by

"To avoid these evils, it appears to me that the most safe, just, and federal disposition which could be made of the surplus revenue, would be its apportionment among the several States according to their ratio of representation, and, should this measure not be found warranted by the constitution, that it would be expedient to propose to the States an amendment authorizing it. I regard an appeal to the source of power, in cases of real doubt, and where its exercise is deemed indispensable to the general welfare, as among the most sacred of all our obligations. Upon this country, more than any other, has, in the providence of God, been cast the special guardianship of the great principle of adherence to written constitutions. If it fail here, all hope in regard to it will be extinguished. That this was intended to be a Government of limited and specific, and not general powers, must be admitted by all; and it is our duty to preserve for it the character intended by its framers. If experience points out the necessity for an enlargement of these powers, let us apply for it to those for whose benefit it is to be exercised, and not undermine the whole system by a resort to overstrained constructions. The scheme has worked well. It has exceeded the hopes of those who devised it, and become an object of admiration to the world. We are responsible to our country, and to the glorious cause of self-government, for the preservation of so great a good. The great mass of legislation relating to our internal affairs was intended to be left where the federal convention found it—in the State governments. Nothing is clearer in my view, than that we are chiefly indebted for the success of the constitution under which we are now acting, to the watchful and auxiliary operation of the State authorities. This is not the reflection of a day, but belongs to the most deeply rooted convictions of my mind. I cannot, therefore, too strongly or too earnestly, for my own sense of its importance, warn you against all encroachments upon the legitimate sphere of State sovereignty. Sustained by its healthful and invigorating influence, the federal system can never fall."

Who can read this passage from the message without yielding his conviction of the truth at least of some of the sentiments it conveys? Who can read it without admiring the honesty of the heart, and the soundness of the head that dictated it. Do we not all know, that, whenever power over subjects of internal improvement has been attempted to be exercised here, it has been "at the expense of harmony in the legislative councils?" Is it not, upon this very occasion, attempted to be exercised "at the expense of harmony" in our deliberations? Without feeling myself called upon now to express an opinion on the question of "apportionment among the several States according to their ratio of representation," or whether "an appeal to the source of power" would be "indispensable" to the exercise of this power, I have no hesitation in giving to it a decided preference over the present plan. There would be equality at least in the disbursement, if not in the collection of the surplus revenue.

PAY OF MEMBERS.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. McDUFFIE, to curtail the sessions of Congress by reducing the per diem after a certain period.

Mr. WAYNE rose, and said he was opposed to the resolution proposed by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. McDUFFIE] and also to the amendment offered by the honorable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT.] The adoption of either would be productive of more harm than good—nor was there any thing in the past legislation of our country, or which had occurred at that session of Congress, to justify the changes suggested. I am satisfied [said Mr. W.] with the present arrangement for the sessions of Congress, and believe the House will come to the same conclusion, after mature reflection upon the subject.

The original resolution proposes that the compensation of the members of Congress shall be eight dollars a day for one hundred and twenty days, and, if a session shall be extended beyond that time, that the pay shall be two dollars per diem; and the amendment provides that the commencement of the sessions of Congress shall be on the first Monday in November, with a limitation of both to the 3d March.

The first is urged upon the grounds that there is a want of industry in this House, and that something is needed to coerce us to greater effort—that our inertness is caused by the mercenary consideration of daily pay—that it will save to the nation seventy-five thousand dollars; and that if the first session of each Congress shall be continued to its ordinary length, then eight dollars per day for one hundred and twenty days will reduce the daily compensation to seven dollars, which is said to be an ample allowance.

I shall examine each of these positions in the order they have been stated; and my reason for giving this formal investigation to a subject, apparently of no great importance, is the respectable source from which the resolution and the amendment came, and the disposition to prevent the mischief which either may do. If apology, however, were necessary, my justification would be found in the example of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COULTER] whose acute and talented exposition of the reasons against the resolution, and of the consequences which will result from its adoption, must have commanded the approbation of the House.

The first consideration urged in favor of the resolution by its mover—a want of industry—is the assertion of a fact, and its truth must be ascertained before it can be used as an argument.

I am told by those in whose experience I have confidence, and the examination of our statute book confirms the declaration—that if the legislation of this session is compared in kind and quantity with that of any preceding Congress, it will suffer no disparagement by the comparison. Between four and five hundred resolutions have been submitted, three hundred and ninety-nine bills have been matured by the committees and laid upon your table, one hundred and twenty-three of them have been finally disposed of in this House, forty-one of which have received the concurrence of the Senate, and passed into laws; seven from the Senate have been acted upon here, and fifty-two from the same branch of the Legislature remain for our consideration. Of the bills which have passed into laws, it should be remembered, there are several of national importance, and among them, what is unusual so early in the session, and which should have conciliated the kindness of the gentleman, [Mr. McDUFFIE] is his own bill of appropriations for the ensuing political year. With this formidable array of business done, it is easier to make an accusation of indolence than to sustain it. No preceding Congress has done more so early in the session; and at the termination of this on the 15th of May, the time fixed for its adjournment by this House, in quantity at least, we may anticipate enough to entitle us to the commendation of our constituents, and from present appearances, too, without having the volume of our laws enlarged by any making extravagant and experimental expenditures for internal improvements which can never yield a revenue to our treasury, or by such laws as press upon the loins of national industry, to encourage manufactures. However, let me not be supposed to intend any injustice to the gentleman, [Mr. McDUFFIE] as it is now owing to his want of ability or exertion that we have not been relieved from the latter; and as to the first, without thinking, with some of us in principle, between whom it must be admitted there are shades of difference, he has already manifested a strong desire to retain the operation of his own sentiments upon the power, strictly within the bounds of judicious and national appropriations; and I cannot refrain from expressing the hope that this session will pass without a difference between us as to what works or subscriptions shall be considered entitled to his cautionary opposition.

But the charge of a want of industry in this Congress has gone out to the world, under the sanction of the gentleman's name, and upon such authority it will be believed, unless it shall be repelled by a detailed examination of preceding Congresses—not very interesting, it is true, but which may command the attention of the House from its direct application to the subject. And one other reason urges me to be particular. Having come into this House under the political revolution which the people thought the condition of the country demanded, it is not to be supposed, composed as it is of a moiety of new members, three-fourths of whom were chosen to sustain the present administration, that such a charge, involving them in a moiety of its discredit, will be permitted to pass without a refutation, even when made by an old member of this House, though he be one of the firmest and ablest supporters of our common cause. Such a charge may raise the maker of it in public estimation, but it will throw his associates into disesteem if it be not denied and disproved, and might jeopard the administration itself at the ensuing election, unless it shall be shown that those who are here and its advocates are worthy of being continued. Our adversaries, sir, are sufficiently talented and numerous, without giving to them additional strength by the voluntary condemnation of ourselves.

The examination of our statute book will show that every Congress, from the beginning of the Government until the expiration of the last, excepting the fourteenth, fifteenth, and seventeenth, occupied more time than will have been consumed in this, if the pressure of our engagements shall permit us to separate on the 17th of May, which every one thinks so probable, that no one event suggests an extension of its sitting after the 24th of that month. A reference to the forty-eighth chapter of the first volume of our laws, which gives the periods of commencement and adjournment of Congress from the year 1789 to the 3d March, 1815, will confirm the declaration just made, as regards thirteen Congresses, and the journals of this House will show it to be equally exact as regards the sixteenth, eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth. The exception of the fourteenth, fifteenth, and seventeenth—and to the fourteenth and fifteenth, the gentleman [Mr. McDuffie] alluded as examples of commendable industry, and of reproach to this—may be accounted for, that the country having passed from a state of war to peace, the occupation of both consisted in repealing the taxes which had been laid to meet the exigencies of the first. More than the half of their legislation was strictly private and local; that which was of a mixed character, relating to our public lands, was the resumption of what had been discontinued by the war, with which persons in and out of Congress were familiar. True it is, then, was the inception of our present restrictive commercial code, by the passage of the act “to regulate duties upon imports and tonnage;” and the time was made equally memorable by the grant of the United States’ Bank charter. The first, however, was passed with much less discussion than has been had upon bills having the same object in view since; though the tendency of that, in the subsequent claims which have been based upon it, was foreseen and foretold by some, whose warnings were unheeded, by the honest wish of many to make our nation independent of foreign supplies, without looking into futurity for its cost; and by others, who overlooked consequences, in their eager desire to have the honor of its paternity. For the other, the bank charter, the public mind had been prepared by much previous discussion; by the existence of a former bank; by its plan having been matured in the recess of Congress; and because it was generally known that the then President’s constitutional objections to the charter had been subdued by painful recollections of the necessities of his treasury, and the rapacious combinations, during the war, to depreciate Government securities, issued in our hour of hardest trial, to supply its deficiencies. In referring to the history of that time, one scandalously inclined might also say, the salary compensation law, an immediate operation having been given to it, had its effect in causing an earlier spring flight than had been usual. I, sir, however, make no such charge; and in explaining the causes which enabled the fourteenth and fifteenth Congresses to adjourn the first session of both earlier than had been done before, I disclaim any intention to depreciate their industry, or assail their purity. I turn back to them with respect; for it was not until then that my mind began to pursue political investigations, or to think of public measures, either as to their consequences, or the principles by which they were to be sustained; and, from the reasoning of some of the prominent men of that day, my politics received a radical tint, which, as much decried as it was afterwards, is now the badge of many who would not then wear it, and is very fast becoming the national color, fatal as it was made to some who first raised it as a banner. There was inscribed upon it, judicious impost for revenue—proper expenditures for necessary national establishments, but nothing for patronage, and a limitation of the action of the Government to the text of the constitution—the best and only security for the perpetuity of the Union. The other exception of the seventeenth Congress is to be accounted for, from a part of the business of its first session having been done in the last session of the sixteenth, which was begun in November, three weeks earlier than the ordinary time of meeting.

Such is the fact, in regard to the time occupied in legislation, since our Government was organized, which of itself relieves this Congress from the imputation of any protraction of its sitting; and it shall be presently shown, if it is to be appreciated by the business done, it will have no cause to shrink from any contrast with the past. Nay, if the mere performance of duty could at any time justify exultation, it might be indulged by us, and those who have for some years preceded us, without any self-complacency, that the time passed in legislation has not been extended, if it is recollected how long the sessions of Congress were continued after the Government had been fully organized; when the subjects of legislation have been constantly increasing with this House, consisting of a fourth less number than it now has, for thirty years of our history, with all the rapidly progressive fluctuations of a population from three to twelve millions, living in twenty-four separate sovereignties, instead of thirteen. Sir, our predecessors were not drones in legislation; their labor is their eulogium, and ours shall be as well thought of hereafter; for I cannot be mistaken in believing that there is a spirit in this Congress, revolting at the slanders of inexperience and want of ability uttered against this administration, and determined, if they shall be permitted to do so, to make the effort to give to it as distinguished an elevation in the future annals of our country, as that which is held by the administration of its father and first President.

But it is urged, in proof of the propriety of limiting the first session of Congress to one hundred and twenty days, and as a reproach when it is extended beyond it, that the second session of three months is sufficient for all the purposes of legislation, and that as much is done in it as is accomplished in the first. The declaration was inconsiderate, for such is not the fact; and I ask the attention of gentlemen, while I resort to detail, to sustain the contradiction of both assertions. By advertg to our statute book, it will be found that the business done at the first sessions of Congress has been, with little variation, the same, and that the proportions of laws passed at the long and short sessions do not differ materially, though those of the latter are in number but two-thirds of the former. But, to prevent too great a trespass upon the time of this House, and because it will suffice to establish our position, I shall adduce the business of seven successive Congresses, being one-third of the number which have been chosen under the Government. In the fourteenth Congress two hundred and eighty-seven acts were passed, one hundred and seventy-three in the long session, and one hundred and fourteen in the short. In the fifteenth Congress one hundred and twenty-four acts were passed at the first session, one hundred and nine at the second; and this near approach of the business of the last to the other was caused by the second session having begun on the 16th of November, three weeks earlier than usual. In the sixteenth Congress two hundred statutes were enacted in both sessions, but only sixty-two of them in the short. In the seventeenth Congress one hundred and twenty-nine acts were passed in the first session, one hundred and one in the second. In the eighteenth Congress two hundred and eleven acts were passed at its first session, one hundred and twenty at the second. The nineteenth Congress shows a result of two hundred and fifty-nine statutes, one hundred and one of which were enacted at the short session; and the twentieth Congress added to our code one hundred and fifty-one statutes at its first session, and sixty-five at its last. Thus, in seven Congresses we have an aggregate of one thousand seven hundred and sixty-six statutes, six hundred and seventy-two only of which were passed in the second or short sessions. And this difference in the business between the long and short sessions of Congress, notwithstanding that of the first is resumed in the second from the point to which it had been carried, by which members, having a preparation of some months for much of what is to be done, advance in it more rapidly. The amount of business done in the short sessions shows there is not time enough for all that is projected, or of which Congress have jurisdiction; and a more conclusive evidence of this fact cannot be furnished, than the business left undone in the session of the twentieth Congress, which may be taken as equally applicable to those which preceded it.

In the first session of the twentieth Congress three hundred and three bills were originated in this House, one hundred and nineteen were sent to it during the session from the Senate, one hundred and sixty-one of our own bills were left undecided, to be resumed at the second session of the twentieth Congress, and forty-nine of the Senate bills were not acted upon, which, having passed from the branch of Congress in which they were begun, had to be originated again at an ensuing session, under all the forms of legislation. Thus, sir, we see, there were two hundred and ten bills left undecided by the Houses during that session. The second session began its business by resuming the one hundred and sixty-one bills, which were the fruit of this House at its previous session, but for which there had not been season enough to mature; one hundred and fifty-nine new bills were reported, making an aggregate of three hundred and twenty bills to be attended to in three months. What was the result, sir? One hundred and nine bills of the one hundred and sixty-one were again left undecided, and one hundred and sixteen of the one hundred and fifty-nine reported at this session never reached a third reading; thus showing two hundred and twenty-five bills of this House alone left undecided during the Congress, and the sum total of its three months' legislation were sixty-two acts, nineteen of which were bills from the Senate in which the House concurred, and forty-three of our own, out of three hundred and twenty, which during the session were on our calendar, or in the orders of the day. I have been thus particular, sir, not to vindicate this Congress alone from the charge of not having done its duty, but to show the source from which this accumulation of business flows, and to suggest the means to lessen its current. Some suppose it cannot be stopped, and that our sessions will have to be extended from necessity; and the real cause of delay is so much overlooked, that some even deem it a result of our biennial elections—a great constitutional feature in the Government, so much in harmony with its aggregate tendency, that it should not be subjected for a moment to the imputation of such slanderous consequences. The evil is, the mass of private claims of which Congress has taken jurisdiction, which occupy two days in each week, besides the time taken to receive the petitions relating to them, and which are more fit for judicial scrutiny than legislative inquiry. Relinquish our jurisdiction of these matters to a tribunal, which might be constructed and maintained at an annual expense of one-fifth of what it now costs the nation to attend to them, and one-third more time will be gained for national legislation, by which your sessions will be limited in the same proportion, besides securing to the country, and the persons interested, more speedy and ample justice than can now be done to either. This, sir, is the evil which protracts the sitting of Congress, to which the gentleman's [Mr. McDUFFIE] talents and influence should be directed to correct, and which, when corrected, will hasten our departure even before the day intended by his resolution, without restricting our official duties by law to a day, to be produced by the apprehension of members being left without a support if the session should be continued beyond it; and that, too, notwithstanding some pressing and unexpected emergency or interest might make it necessary for us to be longer in session. This latter consideration was happily expressed by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] in his opposition to the resolution. Sir, the reform we need is, that of lessening the subjects of our jurisdiction, or to have nothing to do with private pecuniary claims; and, to produce it, I will become the gentleman's willing auxiliary. Nor should I ask him to take the lead in such an honorable enterprise, if my novice did not admonish me to keep in the back ground, though no one here has a better right to attempt it nor more able to accomplish it than the honorable gentleman. It should be known that of the disbursements of this session for this branch of Congress alone, which never exceed three hundred and sixty thousand dollars, one hundred thousand of it may be fairly charged to the time we are engaged upon private claims, strictly judicial in their character—all of which might be settled by a tribunal such as has been suggested, and which might be maintained at a cost of less than twenty thousand dollars per annum. Neither the fact nor the remedy proposed are mere suggestions. Examine the statutes of the twentieth Congress, or those of any preceding it, and one-third of the laws passed will be found to have been for private relief. I go further, sir. Look over the present calendar of private claims, compare it with those of other years, and mark how often there is the recurrence of the same claim. How Congress is occupied from session to session, year after year, until a generation has been comprehended in the pursuit, by the perseverance of claimants, either feeling that justice has been withheld, or hoping that importunity will extort what justice does not demand. Such a tribunal would, indeed, be an achievement worthy of the Committee on Retrenchment, to whom is to be assigned the honor of maturing the present conception, if it shall receive the approbation of this House. The more this subject shall be scrutinized, the stronger will be our conviction that the time consumed upon private claims, and which is forced upon

Congress by their number, is the principal cause of its protracted sitting. The gentleman and myself, it will be perceived, have the same object in view—to lessen the time of our stay here, but we differ as to the mode of effecting it.

There are causes, however, which should not be overlooked, growing out of the nature of our institutions, which have, and will always give to our legislation the semblance of delay, and which, in connexion with the facts already stated, fully account for the protracted period of our sessions. They are slight inconveniences, inseparable from their source, differing entirely from those delays caused by our neglect or want of sagacity. In our work of reform, to make it improvement, we must distinguish unavoidable from adventitious evils, and be careful not to confound them. In the remarks, therefore, now about to be made, complaint is not intended, nor is correction believed to be practicable; they are only illustrative of some of the causes which extend the first session of each Congress to a late day in May. The constitution and laws require the President and the heads of the departments, at the opening of each session of Congress, to give a detailed exposition of national affairs. These documents are voluminous; and with all the effort of the most industrious printer, provided with the most extensive establishment which private means can acquire or support, they cannot be printed in less than three or four weeks. The constantly occurring business of the House, from day to day, make such draughts upon the press also, that these documents cannot be given to us in less time than has been just said. It is believed not much more printing is done than is necessary; though a change may be made in the mode of doing it, by which a part of the expenditure on this account may be saved. The extent of it, however, will surprise even ourselves, when thus definitively stated. Sir, there have been already laid upon our tables eighty-five Executive documents, four hundred bills, and three hundred and thirty-seven reports from committees; and of the first, four hundred and thirty copies of each were struck off; and of the others, six hundred and thirty. The Executive documents are laid upon the table at different times; but it does not always happen, nor can it be so, that they are brought to us connectedly as regards the subjects to which they relate; some days after they have been received, will pass, before members can be prepared even to propose the important legislation which they suggest. Whatever shall be done, must be begun either upon motion for leave to bring in a bill, or in the almost invariable way of resolution, to commit the subject to one of the standing committees, or to select one raised for the purpose. As is natural, debate begins at the inception of the proposition, which, though sometimes too much extended, is not without benefit, as it enables the House to arrest a mischief at once, or, by developing the objects of the mover, instructs the committee upon the points most material to be investigated; for, from the brevity of the resolutions, the sum total of the information intended to be reached is as rarely displayed in its particulars, as the human countenance rarely portrays the ruling propensities of the man. The one tells the main object, as the other does the strong passions of which he may be the victim. Thus, what to an ordinary observer seems to be delay, is no more than deliberate action; and these rules of proceeding have been well said to be “a check and control against the attempts of power.” And it also often happens, that very unexpected calls are made by both Houses of Congress at the same time, upon the same department, for information upon subjects entirely disconnected. Notwithstanding the division of labor in the departments, and the utmost energy of their chiefs, a fortnight or a month will often intervene between the call and the answer; and, after it is made, some days will pass before it can be printed. And, sir, permit me to remark, that these calls are answered with a minuteness, compared with information of the same kind given by other Governments, and which may be examined in our library, showing the acknowledgment of a responsibility from our highest functionaries to the people; unknown and unfelt by the officers of any other nation in the world. It is an allowable source of pride, and a strong proof of the permanency of our system. In proof of what has been just said, I refer to the call made by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Gen. BLAIR] upon the Secretary of War, for information concerning our military school. Every particular which has been stated relating to such calls for information, or as regards the time of preparing and printing them, as well as in the characteristics of minuteness and responsibility, may be affirmed of this document. Such calls are intended to be the basis of important legislation, which will rarely be matured if no alteration shall be made in the subjects of our jurisdiction, and the session shall be limited, as is proposed by the resolution. In stating the causes which delay proceedings in the beginning of the first session of every Congress, it should not be forgotten that in every Congress there are many new members, unaccustomed to legislation, unwilling to obtrude themselves upon the notice of the House, unacquainted with their own strength in this new scene of action, and ignorant of the actual strength of those who have been here before them. The half of this Congress are new members, who are here for the first time; they have been desirous to have the way shown to them by their seniors; and, not having been very prominent in debate, must be exempted from the charge of having protracted the session, either by their listlessness or loquacity. Coming, sir, as we do, from many States, all of which, except four or five, are divided into districts, upon which the legislation of this House bears, or is desired to be brought to bear, it is probable each member is charged by his constituents with something particularly interesting to them. Shall not a little time be allowed to us to become familiar with our novel position, for the consideration of what we may propose? or shall the provision in the constitution, graduating representation to population, be made virtually to mean that their representative is not to be heard? By having shown, sir, that our long sessions are principally caused by the subjects of our jurisdiction, by our rules for doing business, and that they are, in some measure, an incident of our institutions, the accusation of voluntary protraction is refuted, and the propriety of rejecting the resolution made manifest.

In regard to inertness from mercenary motives, though such an imputation has been disclaimed by the honorable gentleman, [Mr. McDUFFIE] and I do not believe in his observations he meant to make it; if it had not been disclaimed, it could have been met but in one way, and that would have been by saying, a charge so disreputable in mass, no one will venture to make particular in its application. But, sir, though it was not intended, it is implied by the terms of the resolution, for if it be not addressed to an existing corruption, it is meant to act upon our fears, which is not less disreputable. What is the resolution? The compensation shall be but one-fourth of what it is to be for one hundred and twenty days, and this reduction is the penalty for not having done in that time all that the exigencies of legislation may have required. If it be not in the nature of a penalty, one or the other of these consequences must ensue, either that the sum then to be allowed is always sufficient, or that the laborer deserves as much for his services after the time proposed by the resolution for the limitation of the session, as he received before it. It may be that there are persons here who would protract the session from sordid calculations, but we must presume they are in number too small to give decisive results to their wishes. But allow them to be numerous; how can they operate? The motive is too mean for avowal and concert, and a general indolence would be counteracted by the heads of committees, who control the business of this House, and no one of whom can be supposed to be of the number of the delinquents. Can there be among them any who, by mind, education, or character, are fitted to take an active part in our proceedings, and I trust I may say, without being suspected of spreading a general uncton of flattery over ourselves, that a very large majority of such are here, to countervail the sordid selfishness of any of our associates. The insinuation includes more than is supposed by those who indulge in it, or who believe that its existence has any influence upon our proceedings. It is not that a small number are so mercenary, but either that a majority are so, or that a large portion of the majority are the auxiliaries of its influence. But, sir, neither this House nor any part of it is liable to the charge; and I invoke the feelings of human nature in its vindication. Of whom is Congress composed? Of fathers and husbands used to the quietude and sweets of domestic life. When deprived of them for a few months, our hearts burn with a fondness to partake again of their enjoyment, which even avarice cannot control. The affections trample down every impediment in the way of their gratification; nor is their restlessness appeased until we are in possession of the objects of our love. The resolution has also been recommended to us upon the ground that it will lessen the expense of each Congress seventy-five thousand dollars. I think a more certain way of doing it has been shown, and, I repeat, the only difference between the gentleman and myself is as to the best way of doing it. It is certainly worth considering; but I would also remark that all saving is not economy. An investment is often made by individuals and nations, which brings a moral and political return far beyond the value of the expenditure. And, unnecessarily spent as this seems to have been, has it been productive of no good? Is the information spread abroad by our debates no credit to which Congress is entitled? Or, is it seriously believed, as gentlemen have impatiently declared, that our great evil and cause of delay is the prevalence of debate. Sir, much of our legislation is private, strictly so—much local; both involving a knowledge of many particulars which we should have, and can only acquire by patient listening, to enable us to vote understandingly. We have two things to do: first, to convince ourselves that we are acting right, and, by telling our reasons, to convince our constituents that we have done so. And uninteresting as the greater number of speeches may be that are spoken here, they are instructive to the people. Cut off this source of information—close your doors against your reporters, or, what will be the same, pass every thing because your committees have recommended it, or reported a bill—reduce the reasons for all your measures to plain narrative, divested of all the charm, collision, and acuteness produced by debate, and half of the dignity of your Government will have been sacrificed, and our responsibility be lost sight of, in a general indifference to our proceedings. It is this indulgence of debate which tells the constituent of the real attitude and weight, here, of his representative; and it is the expectation, upon the part of the people, that it will be indulged and exhibited, which throws into the House so many possessing the talent. They know that our nation was spoken and written, as well as fought, into existence; and that, in many perilous periods of our history, the soldier's arm was nerved, and his heart warmed, with a hero's patriotism, by the animation of the orator. But, sir, I dismiss the subject, because, as yet, we are the only complainers, and our constituents have not admonished us that they think it an evil.

There is a remaining consideration upon which the adoption of this resolution has been urged, and which is entitled to a remark. It is, that the compensation of members will be reduced, even if the session shall be extended to its ordinary length, to still an ample allowance. I do not intend to dispute the sufficiency of the sum which will be received under such circumstances; but, without intending now to compromit myself to any course when the subject shall be directly presented to us, I cannot refrain from observing, if the reason given for it be correct, that it should be applied to the compensation of every officer in the Government, at least to all whose salaries have been increased in the last ten years, and which were not before absolutely insufficient. Such a work of reduction must be carried on in the gross; and when begun, though it may be an evidence of our sincerity and disinterestedness to become the first victims ourselves, it will not be esteemed abroad a proof of our sagacity, if we do not give to others a chance for the honors of such martyrdom. What, sir! money more valuable to us now, by fifty per cent. than it was twelve years since, when the question of compensation was settled between this House and the people, by the repeal of the salary law and the enactment of the present allowance. If our purchases were confined to the actual sustenance of life, as the same sum now will buy half as much of food again as it would have done then, and the consumption of men not having increased, the proposition would have the aspect of correctness. But if it be tested by the endless expenses required and forced upon us by our social condition, by the comparative prices of labor then and now, by the reduction, in our country, of every agricultural product, and the enhancement, by our tariff, of almost all that we use, it will be found we have already paid a full price for this nominal appreciation of money. If invested in stock, does it give a larger interest than it did then? In the purchase of property, though it may get double the quantity by metes and bounds, will it yield a greater revenue, or is the prospective increase in the value of property, in any part of our country, at a given time to come, more than will be its present price with legal interest? Money is in value what it was, though paper is not so plentiful. It is fortunate that paper does not circulate to the same extent that it did twelve years since, by which an artificial value had been given to all kinds of produce and property; but though, by its withdrawal, we have been restored to a wholesome condition, a painful reaction was produced, from which the people of this nation are not yet relieved, far outweighing to them any additional value which the circumstances may seem to have given to money. Sir, money is the same in value that it was then, and will always, in commercial countries dealing extensively with others, be liable to be affected by causes which cannot be foreseen, and the products which it buys and itself reciprocally act upon each other. Things may be less in price, without money being more valuable to a community at large. Money is no more than an exchangeable medium for commerce, forced into use from its being a material more convenient than any other we have, as an index of value for other things; and the fluctuation in the quantity of produce which portions of it will buy at different times, is neither a certain evidence of general prosperity or declension—a proof that it is more or less valuable to the laborer, nor any criterion for altering the allowance of such as are in the public service.

A word, sir, upon the amendment of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT.] It is objectionable, because it will in effect produce the same limitation to the first session of Congress as the original resolution; and, by a comparison of the time of meeting which it proposes, with the ordinary periods, it will produce so little saving, either in time or money, that it may be viewed only as a question of convenience whether Congress shall commence its session in November or December. In my opinion, the present arrangement is more suitable to our employments as a nation. The inclement weather of the North puts a stop to all agricultural field work, and drives its inhabitants to in-door occupation. The professional man retires to his books, to prepare for spring and summer labors; and, in the South and West, from our times of harvest, the planter and farmer need the month of November to make arrangements for the transportation and sale of their produce. At no time can we come to the business of the nation, so little burdened with cares of our own, as that which has been fixed for the beginning of our sessions.

A word more, sir, and I shall have concluded. I know there are gentlemen here with whom I am politically associated, who will vote for this resolution, because they believe the nation already oppressed by too much legislation, and that, by limiting the session, there will be a greater probability of being relieved from much which is intended to bear upon foreign commerce and southern interests. I warn those gentlemen to beware of doing an act which will permit our adversaries to augment our grievances, and, at the same time, to take from us the privilege of complaint, and of exposing their principles. Limit your sessions, without abridging the subjects of your jurisdiction, and the pressure of business will give a plausible excuse for stopping debate. And, from his experience this session, does not the honorable gentleman [Mr. McDUFFIE] know that it will be done? Sir, if my friends, dispirited by frequent discomfiture, believe no good can be done by entering again the battle ground of their distinction, let them remember we need time to undo some of what has been done; that it is by the discussion of our principles in this House, that they are to become triumphant and national. And let them be persuaded that they have recruits here from the people, ready to aid in a renewal of the controversy, and who are not willing to be cut off from sharing the honors of victory or defeat.

Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia, next took the floor; but the hour having expired, the debate was arrested for the day.

BUFFALO AND NEW ORLEANS ROAD.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HAYNES in the chair, and resumed the consideration of a bill making an appropriation for the construction of the road from Buffalo, in New York, to New Orleans, in Louisiana, via Washington city.

Mr. CRAWFORD rose, and remarked that the bill now before the committee was one of very grave character, involving most important considerations of expediency, apart from the constitutional difficulty with which some gentlemen, avowing no disposition to do so, had, involuntarily, he presumed, invested it. The power to construct roads and canals might once perhaps have admitted of great doubt, but [said Mr. C.] I defer to the decision of more experienced and wiser men, whose opinions for the last five and twenty years, expressed in legislative acts, have fixed the construction of the constitution too firmly to be now shaken—upon a basis on which this body constantly acts. Not an appropriation bill passes, that does not, in some shape or other, recognise the principle. A few days ago we acted affirmatively on a bill providing for an expenditure incurred by the removal of obstructions from the channels of several rivers, and within five minutes have approved of one of similar character. Putting aside this question as rem judicatum, as one passed upon, and so considered on almost every side, and not from the alarm which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. P. P. BARBOUR] was so kindly desirous of quieting, let us proceed.

What is the duty of a Government, or, rather, for what is every Government instituted? To promote the happiness of those who establish it, by the proper exercise of all the powers confided. To develop the resources of a country, and of every part of it, by holding out the inducements which facilities of transportation furnish to increased industry in exploring them, the experience of the world has proved to be more effectual than any other policy which can be devised. A nation may flourish in every stage of improvement from adventitious causes—by the misfortunes of others, or some special good fortune that may attend her own condition. Such was our auspicious situation, from the formation of the present constitution until eighteen hundred and sixteen or seventeen: We had just emerged from provincial inferiority—the heavy hand of an oppressive Government had been not long before removed, and we felt the buoyancy and elasticity of youth; the change of our internal and relative political position, and the adoption of our new frame of Government, placed before us an extended and delightful prospect, which was not only enlivened and enriched in all its most beautiful tints, but over which was thrown every charm that could gratify the beholder, by the situation of the Eastern world, whose food we supplied, and whose trade we carried. But, sir, except under these favorable external circumstances, no nation ever did prosper, no nation ever can prosper, nor even then to the extent of which she is capable, that is not supplied with the roads and means of transportation which a discreet and sober judgment shall assign to her condition. It is in vain that your manufacturers exercise their ingenuity and industry; that your farmers, as respectable and honored as any portion of your community, make you and themselves intrinsically richer, by drawing from the earth, annually, wealth which did not before exist, and that your merchants establish themselves as purchasers of their several commodities, if they cannot carry them to market, except at a sacrifice which blunts enterprise.

Not to open these avenues, is to bury the talent entrusted to us. For what has a most indulgent and beneficent Providence spread before us, with the most liberal hand, all the bounties of nature? Is it that we shall use them as they are furnished, or, by the exercise of the intelligence that belongs to us, bring them into the most advantageous and productive activity? To maintain the affirmative of the first branch of the proposition, might accord with the opinions of the individual who opposed the making of a canal, because God had placed a river near its contemplated route, and he thought it would be sinful to aid his works. Not so is my view. I would assist the industry and enterprise of the country, in its various branches. I would lend accommodation to its convenience, and I would, by every means in my power, place her in the best attitude for defence, if hostilities should arise between her and other powers. I would not have a splendid Government, any more than the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. P. P. BARBOUR] but I am in great, very great error, if that which is intended for the benefit of the people—which is designed exclusively for the advancement of their interest, and which is expected, by those who advocate this bill, to contribute largely to it, can make a gorgeous Government. I had supposed there was more of utility than splendor in the scheme; that comfort, competence, and ease would be found in greater abundance in the country it traverses; but I never imagined, until the ingenious gentleman stated it, that the Government would be more imposing. But, sir, if this be splendor, I favor it. I wish to see the country, from Buffalo to New Orleans, gladdened by this channel of communication, which shall enrich the land that it passes through—diffusing pleasure and wealth, and inciting to the industrious production of that which can be advantageously disposed of. Even Virginia, in her four hundred miles that it covers, will yet rejoice, I trust, that this bill has passed—not on a magnificent scale, with triple rows of elms, in imitation of the French minister, but on the moderate plan proposed by a very respectable committee of this House, through its honorable chairman, my colleague and friend, [Mr. HEMPHILL] on a plan destined, I hope, to be approved by the Congress of the United States.

stood, that the conceded power should, in my judgment, be confined to great, leading national objects: that it should not be exerted frequently, or on ordinary occasions, but on those only which would seem to require a great common effort for a great common good. Such I regard the present project to be. Is it expedient? I think so. The seat of the General Government is the heart of the body politic. From it must flow to every part of the country, in peace or in war, the regulations, laws, orders, and instructions it was organized to furnish and give. By a speedy diffusion of intelligence and information among the people of what the Government does or does not do, of the course of policy it adopts or abandons, you can alone preserve attachment to it. That every facility should be afforded for that purpose, is of vital and engrossing interest. And here let me ask, sir, in the language of my friend and immediate colleague, [Mr. RAMSEY] have you a single passage out of Washington provided by the General Government? By what means are you to place the citizens of this very extensive empire upon a footing of equality, so fully and effectually, as by the expeditious dissemination of information? Can those on its remote borders form so correct an opinion of the merits and demerits of their public agents, as those whose locality places them nearer, unless you transmit to them the materials of which alone opinion must be made up? I am acquainted with no arrangement by which those who administer the public affairs can be brought so immediately under the view and observation of their constituents, either for approbation or for censure, as by the rapid diffusion of useful knowledge. This Government depends essentially, both for the most beneficial results and for durability, upon the intelligence and virtue of those who have the happiness to live under it. Give them the first, and the last will be strengthened; and both will be, to the noble structure we have reared, a foundation and support that must secure its perpetuity.

To commence with the northern part of this road: What are its anticipated mail advantages? Very great. The travel from Washington to Buffalo, by way of Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York, is about six hundred and seventy miles. On this route the mail can be carried between the extremes, when steamboats are in operation on a part of it, in six days; at other times, seven days are occupied. Stage lines were established, some two or three years ago, from Harrisburg to the western part of New York, by which the distance on the shortest stage route was reduced to about three hundred and ninety miles, over which the mail is conveyed in seven days. If a road were made from this city to Buffalo, by the nearest practicable route, it could be transported between them in less than four days. (Postmaster General's letter of 28th December, 1827.) What an immense saving of time! Will gentlemen tell me that it is no advantage to have the mail carried in half the time? Is not despatch the life of your post office? Here have we been, during the session, receiving petitions from a very large number of our constituents, larger, probably, by many to one, than those who have expressed their views on any other subject, requesting us to stay the mail only for one day, and that the most holy one; and by our committee we turn a deaf ear to their entreaties, insisting that great inconvenience will result from the delay—that if we grant their request it will be felt throughout all the mail ramifications of our extended domain. For the sake of the argument admit it. How great, then, must be the advantage we would have by gaining half the time; by the transmission of intelligence in four—in less than four—instead of seven days! Will it not pervade, sir, the most remote districts of our northern and northwestern borders? To enlarge upon this topic appears to me to be unnecessary.

Our attention is next drawn to the commercial considerations which bear upon this question. The bed of the road must be carried, for the first one hundred to one hundred and twenty miles north and northwest of this city, through a country fertile and beautiful as the heart of man could desire; a region under the highest cultivation, and studded with the homes of an industrious and happy population. It will afford them a channel of direct communication with the capital. They will have a choice of markets, at which they can dispose of the products of their farms, that embrace all the varieties proper to the climate. It will cross, at various points, the several turnpikes leading to Baltimore and Philadelphia, and will enable many who choose to direct their course towards those cities, to do so with increased ease. In its more western course, it must likewise strike two, at least, of the Pennsylvania canals, and will facilitate an approach to, or departure from, them. Where the country through which it passes is not eminently fertile, it abounds in coal and iron, which will probably make the resources of Pennsylvania, unfolded and opened as they soon will be, greater than those of any of her sister States.

For military purposes, what are its advantages? Many and commanding. As has been wisely said by my very much respected colleague, [Mr. HEMPHILL] the strength of a country rests not so much in the number of its population, as in the facility with which masses of its defenders can be thrown together. This road will not only afford every advantage for sending the earliest instruction to your northern and northwestern frontiers, and enable you, if need be, to transport the munitions of war and provisions, at a small cost, to your army, but it will meet, at every turn, some line of communication from an Atlantic point, which shall be either endangered, or which can furnish information of any enemy that may be on the seaboard. The roads and canals which irrigate and fertilize that whole section of country, do not run parallel with the proposed road, but will be crossed by it at as many centres as this famed city contains. If we had had such a road during the late war, we should have saved more money, several times told, than the entire improvement from Buffalo to New Orleans will cost, if it shall be authorized. So much for the northern end.

Are there sufficient reasons to justify the making of the road from Washington to New Orleans? It appears to me there are. It holds out to you great facilities and increased despatch in the conveyance of the mail. It was carried in December, 1827, (Postmaster General's letter) between the two cities in nineteen days, over twelve hundred and fifty-nine miles, along the metropolitan route—certain improvements in bridges, and the removal of obstructions, it was thought, would enable the Government to transport it in seventeen days, and it was believed a good turnpike, on the shortest line, would put it in the power of the Postmaster General to carry it through in eleven days; add, if you please, three days for difference between the contemplated road and a turnpike, and you have a saving in time of at least three, perhaps five, days. In a commercial point of view, many advantages must result from it. It traverses a country abundant to overflowing in every thing that can contribute to the comfort and enjoyment of life. The surplus products can be carried on it to those streams which it strikes at right angles, and down which they can be cheaply floated to the seaboard, or some intermediate mart. The great Cumberland valley and many parts of the southern country will yet be busy and happy in the establishment of manufactories, to and from which this road will afford facilities for carrying the raw material and the manufactured article. For war, it will enable you to convey your troops and their provisions, not along its whole distance, but, as the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BLAIR] remarked, on particular portions of it, and on all parts of it at different times. Perhaps troops will never be marched from Buffalo to New Orleans, or the reverse, but they will be moved from intermediate points to either, or to Washington: The proposed route is about equidistant from the seaboard and the Mississippi; they will be auxiliary to each other, or, if gentlemen prefer it, I have no objection that the road be considered ancillary to the river.

I may be asked why I favor the western route. And it may be thought, perhaps with some propriety, that as this matter "does not belong to my parish," I should not interfere. Having, however, expressed a preference, I will say why. It lies generally through a better country—will require less bridging, not much more than half that either of the others demands—will not have more than two-thirds as much causeway—and, lastly, although it does not now, will, in my opinion, very soon, and in all time thereafter, have a larger population. At present its white inhabitants exceed in number those of the eastern line, with all its advantage of being dotted with towns and cities, which have given it the name of the metropolitan route.

What are the objections to this bill? They are very numerous, but, in my mind, not well founded. The honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. P. P. BARBOUR] stated, that although the General Government was a great whole, each State, each individual, would feel his own individuality, and pursue his own interest, though willing to do something for the public. I admit it, and hold it to be a strong argument for appropriations, such as that contemplated by the measure under debate. It is, according to the most deliberate judgment I can form, the solemn duty of statesmen, of gentlemen on this floor, to exert themselves to the uttermost, preserving their principles and a rigid regard to duty, to maintain and increase the harmony of the nation. Climate, diversity of habits and pursuits arising out of it, contrariety of interest and difference of sentiment proceeding from these and other causes, open the chasm already too wide. Let it be the pleasing duty of those who are now together, in the enjoyment of the public confidence, to repose upon the integrity and purity of each other, and to make a common effort to smooth the asperities which grow out of our several conditions—to level the inequalities which must be met with on so wide a surface. To contribute, in the smallest degree, to this, the most desirable of all political ends, would give me a pleasure that no other public agency of mine could possibly yield. Is not the bill calculated to aid this consummation? Let us have something in common, and not look with cold and heartless indifference upon this Government, as if we had no interest in it. If we cannot be bound by some cord of regard, let us at least see some evidence that we are connected.

Again, we are informed by the same honorable gentleman, rightly, I think, that the consumers pay the duties on imports; and that, as the money in the public treasury is raised equally off the people, it should be equally distributed, or rather that it should be distributed in the same proportion in which it was contributed. Sir, this looks well in theory, but it cannot be carried into practice. The Government was constituted for the common benefit, and to promote the interest of the whole. Some portions of the empire will require the expenditure of more money than others, and it will not answer to give one district more than it needs, because it contributed it, or another less, because it paid not so much as its necessities require. The harbor of one city may call for an immense expenditure—nature has made another perfect; very large fortifications may be esteemed necessary at one position; as in the gentleman's own State, at Old Point Comfort, or Fortress Monroe, and Castle Calhoun; but who complains of that? No one, that I am aware of; and no one should. I think, therefore, instead of supposing that he and another person were weighing one hundred pounds of gold in separate scales, designing each to contribute equally, and that his partner, by putting his fingers into his (the gentleman's) scale, and taking thence a part of his gold, had behaved unjustly, a more apt illustration of the duty and the justice of the Government might have been found, in likening it to a father, whose sons, having been to different markets, severally brought in their contributions to the common stock, which the old gentleman distributed among the objects of his bounty and affection, (whose industry had furnished the treasure,) not in equal proportions, but according to the wants and necessities of each. Is not this the every day course of parental duty and affection? But the gentleman's argument, if admitted, will not save him. I confess I have not sufficient acumen to perceive its force, but think it proves directly the reverse of that for which it was adduced. The road passes over a section of country that has received little or no part of the public favor. The sums—the vast sums that have flowed into the public coffers since the peace of eighteen hundred and fifteen, amounting to upwards of three hundred millions of dollars, have been expended chiefly on the seaboard; and the interior never will get any of the country's treasure, if you do not allow them internal improvements. So much for the gentleman's equal distribution, or distribution exactly proportioned to contribution!

England, we are informed from the same respectable source, is at this moment retrenching to the utmost, and deafening her King and ministry with applications for relief from wretchedness. Why that country was named, I know not, unless it was for the inference that her present condition might be traced to her manufactories, her roads and canals. If that was the purpose, I take leave to deny the justness of the conclusion. So far from her misery being attributed to her occupations and improvements, she must have long since have sunk without them; they alone have sustained her under a pressure that has been borne until the world is amazed. Her national debt, that great source of her pauperism and wretchedness, has been magnifying for a very long time, but was increased seven or eight fold, by the wars that arose out of the French revolution—conflicts that derived their sharpest acrimony from the alleged secret treaty supposed to have been signed at Pilnitz, by which the parties to it were bound to impose the royal family upon France, and which attempt to interfere with their internal government, the French nation nobly and successfully resisted. To this debt, thus incurred, is mainly to be ascribed her present unfortunate situation.

But this measure, if successful, will have a tendency, say several gentlemen, to keep up a large revenue system. My sentiments on this subject are well known. I trust the present policy will be adhered to—that no repeal of the laws imposing the tariff will take place, until a full and fair experiment has been made; which will result, I doubt not, in establishing the wisdom of the course pursued for the last two years—repealed they shall not be, if my vote, and any little influence I may possess, fairly exerted, can prevent it. Immense interests have been staked on the faith of the Government, and ruin, utter ruin, would involve a large portion of the middle and eastern States, if this faith should be broken. Would honorable gentlemen themselves desire, if their wishes could effect it, the immediate repeal of all duties? Would they not prostrate in one common desolation the manufacturer and the merchant, and, through them, a very great proportion of the whole community? The duties will, therefore, last long enough, at all events, for this road. Why is it, if the tariff operates unequally, if injustice is done to the South, that the opposition I am now combating comes from the complaining quarter? Here is some little atonement—some little boon offered; but it is contemptuously rejected. We ask what we may be allowed to scatter among the very people who, by their representatives, set forth as a grievance that money is exacted from them, the identical money so collected, or a part of it, and the permission is withheld. Can we do more unless we destroy ourselves to gratify others?

The honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] is of opinion that this bill combines many local interests, which he deprecates as a great evil. Pray, is not all legislation of local operation, and the more extensive the more comprehensive? but, then, this produces delusion, the delusion of whole masses of men, and entire sections of country. I wonder if, by possibility, there might not be some delusion on the other side. The gentleman reminds me of the jurymen who differed with his fellows, and, upon being brought into court, said they were the most obstinate eleven men he had ever met with; he could not bring them over to his view of the case.

He speaks of the number of routes that have been surveyed, which is argument against him, as it goes to prove the great anxiety of the public mind on the subject—the great interest that is taken in this road, which we have heard represented as likely to be of no utility if made; not so think those who live near its projected course, and appreciate its value. But the people are deluded—they are blinded and lost to reason, by the offer to spend their own money among them. Where, I would ask, should it be expended, if not among those who own it? If it be a delusion, I fancy it will, unlike most other errors, abide with the people, and continue to close their eyes to what gentlemen are pleased to call their true interest. When you finally select one line, it is said you offend all those who live upon the others, and this is pressed as a good reason for not moving further; does it not occur to gentlemen that the remark, if of force, would put an end to all improvement whatever? Of the many surveys made, or to be made, I would choose the best, and I would say they should be few. I would not, nor will I, vote for all the projects on foot, or which have been reported to this House; nor do I think the public treasury should be burdened with annual appropriations for supporting and keeping in repair any great channel of communication that has been, or hereafter may be, constructed. But this road must be turnpiked, say gentlemen; I do not know what others intend, but I do not look beyond the present bill, nor think of a turnpike. Let however the estimate, mentioned by the honorable member from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK] of twenty-one millions of dollars should alarm, I will say that I understand the road in Ohio, equal to any in the world, to be now constructing for between five and six thousand dollars per mile; and, taking this as our datum, the whole distance from Buffalo to New Orleans would not, even if turnpiked, cost nine millions. The honorable gentleman speaks pleasantly of tapping the treasury, if it be plethoric; admonishes us that it is a dangerous operation, and that it requires a consultation of the seniors—not the bachelors of medicine, but the M. D.'s in politics. I am content to be regarded as a junior, at least for the present; but what if the seniors are timid, or mayhap unskilled, or, with a rare exception or two, adhere to the old practice, rejecting modern improvements as the innovations of heedless and incautious men; insisting that no other guide shall be followed but lectures heard or written, some twenty, or thirty, or forty years ago? Under these circumstances, the office must be assumed by those who may be estimated lightly; nothing else is left for it, they must use the knife, or the patient will die.

The last argument I shall notice, and it is one which all the honorable gentlemen who have spoken against the bill have urged, is, that they wish the public debt paid before we embark in the project. This bill, sir, interferes not with its discharge; if it did, I should be the last man to advocate it. What does the bill provide? The first sections enact "that the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, three disinterested citizens of the United States, to lay out a road from Buffalo, in the State of New York, passing by the seat of the General Government, in the District of Columbia, to the city of New-Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, whose duty it shall be, or a majority of them, to examine the ground, and lay out said road," &c. It is provided in the second section "that the said road shall be laid out four rods in width, and designated on each side by a distinguishable mark on a tree, or by the erection of a stake or monument, sufficiently conspicuous, at every quarter of a mile of the distance, where the road pursues a straight course, and on each side where an angle occurs in its course."

The third section is as follows: "That the said commissioners, after they have laid out the said road, shall present to the President an accurate plan of the same, with its several courses and distances in each State, accompanied by a written report of their proceedings, describing the marks and monuments by which the road is designated, and the face of the country through which it passes, and the roads, or parts of roads, if any, in the course of the road so laid out by this act, which, in their opinion, shall need no alteration, which said roads, or parts thereof, so finished, shall remain unaffected by this act."

It is made the duty of the commissioners, by the fourth section, to "report to the President an estimate of the expenses of the said road, which, in their opinion, will be necessary for its formation, graduation, and final completion, on the most approved plan, without the application of stone or gravel, except where they shall be found indispensably necessary to its use; and if the same does not on an average exceed the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, including necessary bridges and causeways, per mile, the President is hereby authorized to take prompt and effectual measures to cause said road to be made throughout the whole distance."

It is believed that the preparatory steps by the commissioners, of surveying, laying out, and marking the road, and making a detailed report of their proceedings, cannot be taken in less than two, perhaps three years; and that during this period an expense will not be incurred that shall exceed ten thousand dollars per annum; and that afterwards, if the contingency happens that shall make it the duty of the President to commence the construction of the road, not more than four, or perhaps five hundred thousand dollars will be required annually.

Let us now ascertain the state of the public debt, its exact amount, and the probable time of its extinguishment.

Deduct as above, according to estimate,	12,000,000 00

Leaving a balance of 7,718,667 83 of the public debt on the first day of January, 1834, at which time there will be in the treasury between three and four millions of dollars, beyond all ineffective funds that are there, which may be placed at one million, about which sum they are; and the United States will be indebted, except as above, owner of seven millions of United States' Bank stock; nor will the balance be so great as I have made it, for all the debt (except the three per cent. stock) is supposed, for convenience sake, to be at six per cent. interest, when, in reality, twelve million seven hundred and three thousand ninety-eight dollars and sixty cents carry but five per cent. and thirteen million seven hundred and sixty-six thousand seven hundred dollars and fourteen cents draw only four and one-half per cent. Indeed, the debt may be regarded as fully discharged when we shall have reached within seven millions of its apparent amount; for to that extent it was incurred by subscription for United States' Bank stock, which the Government still holds. Not more than twenty thousand dollars can be wanted for surveys and laying out the road before the spring of 1832, nor perhaps more than thirty thousand dollars until 1833, for it cannot be begun to be opened until it is all laid out, so that it may be seen what the average cost will be; which, if it shall exceed fifteen hundred dollars per mile, will prevent the President from proceeding. This sum will not beggar the treasury. At either of the above times, the reduction of the debt will be such, that the sum heretofore paid for interest will go a considerable way to bear the expenses of the road. And, in January, 1834, it will be paid off, with the exception of a fraction. Any thing to be apprehended from the alleged interference with the payment of the public debt is fanciful. This bill, if it shall become a law, will not have that effect.

The honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] tells us that the State Governments were made for internal and municipal purposes, and the General Government for external purposes. Not so exactly. But I do not recur to this matter to quarrel with him about his division of powers, but to say, with the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. P. P. BARBOUR] that I would not take from this Government one, even the smallest and most inconsiderable of its powers. I will add, for myself, I would not bestow upon it one jot of authority beyond what rightfully belongs to it. But it does seem to me that the fashionable doctrine of jealousy of the General Government, and the danger suggested that it will swallow up State power, is chimerical. Who compose this Government? We are ourselves its most efficient branch. Where are all our strongest political attachments? In the several States, and I honor the sentiment. What sustains us here? The belief that we stand well at home. Take from any gentleman his State support, and will he have influence in this House? I think not. What inducement can there be to strengthen the hands of the General Government? None that I can perceive; and these seats change occupants too often to allow even a corrupt man to hope for any personal advantage from so doing. Each Government, General and State, can only perform its functions within its designated sphere. There may they each long happily move, nourishing and cherishing, and fostering and securing, by their light and influence, the free institutions of our country! I am, indeed, with the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK] for the Union, and, as its devoted friend, opposed to all doctrines which have the slightest tendency to make the most deplorable of all events familiar to us. I cannot bring my mind to adopt the idea that a State has a right to abrogate a law of this Government. It is an opinion fraught with the worst consequences, and leading to the most lamentable issue. Are not, I ask gentlemen, our fortunes freighted in the same vessel? The tempest which overwhelms one, will assuredly involve others; and, when this gallant barque shall be stranded, if stranded it must be, he who will have the fortune to seize a plank, by which he can reach the land, will find himself on a shore not worth inhabiting.

Mr. STANDIFER said, he hoped the committee would not think he was trespassing on its patience, whilst he attempted, in his own way, to give his views on the important subject before the committee. But, sir, [said Mr. S.] you will readily account for the embarrassment under which I labor, when I inform you that I was raised to the plough, at a time, and under circumstances, which prevented my getting any but the most limited education. My embarrassment is increased; also, from the unfortunate difference of opinion which prevails in the delegation from my own State, with all of whom my intercourse has been friendly. But, whatever may be the difficulties with which I have to meet, I am determined, when I see a subject under discussion which involves the best interests of my constituents, and the nation at large, to represent the views of that generous and enlightened people who sent me here, and with whom, when at home, every thing dear to me is to be found. I mean to give my full support to this bill, and wish to allow my colleagues and all others the same privilege of acting freely that I take myself. I know this is not the course of all the members of this House; but I hope I may be allowed to say that my two worthy colleagues, (BLAIR and ISACKS) who spoke on the same side of this question with me, and myself, live in the mountain region, where we breathe liberal air. We do not set ourselves up for little captains to lead others on; we aim at no such unenviable distinction. We are perfectly willing that they should think and act for themselves, and we will leave it to the proper tribunal to decide between us. Neither of us will hold up the constitution to shelter ourselves from responsibility, and save us from the people at the ballot boxes.

I will say for the worthy gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BARBOUR] that he has, in opposing this bill, which is my favorite one, acted with his usual fairness and candor. He has argued upon the ground of expediency alone, and I give him credit for it: for who, that would be thought sincere, could oppose this bill on constitutional grounds, when it is pretty well understood here that two-thirds of this House are satisfied of the existence of the power of Congress to make internal improvements? I know that some of my colleagues will bear me out in saying, that, on my way to Congress in 1823, I expressed myself in favor of the system of internal improvements, and, after taking my seat, voted under the influence of that belief; and I tell my worthy colleague [Mr. POLK] who last spoke, that that opinion remains unchanged by any thing that I heard from him in the course of his remarks.

This road is one of the first importance to the Government in three points of view: military purposes, mail transportation, and last, though not least, commercial.

Speaking of it as a military road, I must call in to my aid plain common sense, as I am not possessed of much book information. My view of the United States in its warlike preparations is, that it may be compared to the encampment of an army in an enemy's country, when commanded by a skilful general. That encampment is in a hollow square, keeping in the centre a portion of his best troops, in order, if attacked on any side, to throw this reserved force to the place of attack. Now, the United States has frontiers around all the States except Kentucky and Tennessee: they are in the centre of this great encampment, and ready to be thrown to the defence of the line attacked. Will you, then, refuse to give them a road to go upon to fight, not for their own personal safety, but that of their country? They are safe if you leave them to defend themselves, for their frontier and seaboard neighbors must be cut down to reach them: but they do not wait for danger to themselves—they volunteer, and bare their bosoms to the bayonet of the enemy for their exposed neighbors, and surely it must be important to make them good roads.

The mouth of the Mississippi is very important, and may be said to be the key of the whole Western country. Suppose that a foreign foe should take possession of it, and lock up its mouth, it would strike at the interest of nine of our States and one Territory. Mobile is still more indefensible than New Orleans, and depends upon East Tennessee for succor. Georgia will have to look to her own frontier, and will not be able to assist. It is, therefore, all-important to make this road, which runs three hundred miles through Tennessee, and crosses the Tombigbee, in Alabama, below the mouth of the Black Warrior river, where steamboats run, and troops and provisions could be carried on this road to that point, and then sent down to Mobile. Sir, the people of the lower country do not raise provisions to support an army—hardly for themselves; for, like all others, they raise that from which they can make most, and it so happens that that is cotton and sugar. East Tennessee, through which this road is to run, is the place from whence their supply must come, as well of provisions as men; and I have tilled the lands of that valley long enough to know, experimentally, that if you give us the channel upon which to send the provisions, we can raise them.

This road, if made, passes through the country which was the scene of suffering during the late war. Perhaps, from my participation in those times, I feel more on the subject than I otherwise would. I cannot, whatever others may do, forget the difficulties and troubles of that day, and much of it arose from the want of such a road as the bill now proposes to make. I saw, on the line of this road, your sick and diseased soldiers, who were fighting for your country, wading through mud and water, whilst the measles and other diseases were fastened upon them. On our return from the Horse-shoe to Fort Williams, we had to carry our sick and wounded, some on horseback, and others on biers, by their brother soldiers. From Fort Jackson to Fort Williams it fell to my lot to be one of the officers of the rear guard; our duty was to keep the men before us, and leave none behind. From hunger, sickness, and fatigue, they kept falling back, until they far exceeded the number of the guard; some had eat nothing for four or five days, and they literally gave up to die, and sought every opportunity to dodge the guard and hide behind logs and brush, and risk the savages in preference to the fatigue of travel, under the prospect of starvation. I am confident in the opinion that no man living, save the very distinguished general who had the command, could have kept in subjection men in their condition. He was kind and tender to them, and treated them as a parent would his children; he gave his own horses to the sick soldiers, and took to the mud and water with the rest; but those who were inclined to be disobedient he forced into obedience. Who, sir, were these soldiers that endured all this suffering? They were neither enlisted nor hired men; they were the respectable freemen of Tennessee, many from my own district, who volunteered, and left their wives and children as widows and orphans, to defend the liberties of the country. But you starved them in war for the want of a road to carry them provisions; you diseased them by subjecting them to trudge through mud, and wade waters, for the want of a road; and now your country's flag is floating in peace, and you are willing, if you reject this bill, to let them again endure the like afflictions. Let me tell you, this road is more needed than many of your other preparations for defence.

It has been my happy lot to live among the mountain boys, as they are sometimes called. I have been with them in the field of battle in one war, and I can assure you, if the servants of the people will do their duty, and give to us roads so that we can travel to the points of danger, you never will again see the smoke of an enemy's fire upon the walls of this capitol. The people to be benefited by this road are in a situation to ask little from the Government, but they ask you to prepare the means of defence before another war may overtake you, and they, for the want of them, be again exposed to suffer sickness and famine. The utility of this road for mail purposes does not seem very clear to some of its opponents. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CARSON] says, that upon this road to Nashville we now have six mails a week, and on his but one, therefore there is no need for this road for mail purposes. If the gentleman means that going and returning should each be counted, then we have six mails to that place; but, counting in the same way, I could make twice a week upon his route. The growing importance of all that new and advancing country, and its increase of population, renders it probable that the time is close at hand, when the necessity for a daily mail on that route will arise. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBORA] admitted, as I thought all would, the importance of this road in that point of view. When the cost of mail transportation is now looked at upon that route, can it be possible that there is any one who would not agree to the benefits to flow from making this road as a mere post road, and the advantages to the citizens who live upon it? But I will now pass to the benefit which can be felt, and properly weighed, by the farmers of our country. I mean that of aiding trade and intercourse. Take a view of this road and the country through which it passes: It falls into the valley of Virginia, west of the mountains, and traverses that valley until it intersects the ridges at the head of the Roanoke, thence to the head of Holston, through one of the best grazing countries in the Union, and passing through the whole extent of East Tennessee. For several hundred miles on that way the lands are rich, and present the most inviting prospects to the farmer and grazier, but unfortunately must depend upon land transportation for the means of interchange of their products with other more favored quarters. I said that I was a farmer, yes, a practical farmer, and I know how to sympathize with that class. I know what it is to labor throughout the summer in the burning sun, and have on hand throughout the fall and winter the product of your labor, if not spoiling on your hand, lying uncalled for, for the want of outlets to market. The farmer is the class for whom your legislation should mainly provide; they till the earth and feed the country; yes, we who are now the great men of the nation, legislating in this splendid hall, were sent here by them, and they are now feeding us by the sweat of their brows. They have been oppressed and borne down in the country from which I come, on account of the channel in which their money has heretofore been appropriated by this body. I do not understand gentlemen when they talk about the revenue being raised in the great cities or seaports; my experience teaches me that the consumer pays this revenue, and my constituents pay their proportion; and how has it gone since the establishment of the Government? Upon tide water. Has any thing gone to the quarter through which this road is asked to be made? No, not the first dollar.

My colleague [Mr. POLK] cautions us against this system of internal improvements, because it is unequal and unjust. I tell him that which has been pursued is the unequal and unjust system; and this is the only one that our people, who live off tide water, can ever expect to be benefited from. I tell my colleague that the farmers of Tennessee will inquire more strictly into the correctness of our votes, than our fine speeches; they will rise in their majesty, and put down those politicians who will not represent their interests truly; and whilst he is giving cautions, he must pardon me for taking the liberty of giving him mine, take care that he represents the class of which I have just spoken.

I know that most of the people in the section of country from whence I come, are aware of the importance to them of connecting, by canal or railroad, the waters of the Tennessee with the Coosa, and in that manner gain an important outlet for their produce, and, in my opinion, that would be of more local benefit than this road; but, sir, the interest of the country requires that both should be done—make good roads, open your rivers; then your farmers will be stimulated to industry; all men need something to stimulate them, even the members on this floor—I do not mean, to try for places on this floor, that is already sufficiently strong; I mean to do their duty when they get here. I confess that I have sometimes thought that some of the people's servants forgot that they had masters; indeed, I very much fear that the result of this vote will tend to confirm that belief. I have this measure much at heart. Sir, it comes home in its benefits to the poor and needy; the very day-laborer is to find a place to reap the reward of his industry. I am, therefore, the more importunate. I never could see the reason why improvements could be constitutionally made on tide water; and the moment you left it, the constitution was too narrow to cover such work. This seems to be the modern doctrine, and though it suits some learned and wise men, it will neither suit me nor the people I represent; and I think some other gentlemen of this House will find, also, that those who swing the mail and axe will not be so well pleased with speeches filled with constitutional law as common sense voting, bringing home to them benefits and blessings which they can feel and realize. I trust in God that they will rise, and force their servants so to read the constitution as to include the neglected parts of this Union, for which we now ask this reasonable measure.

I have not had much experience in legislation, but I have been here long enough to know that tide water has been the spoiled child of this Government. I see on your table, and on passage, bills to open mouths of rivers, build sea-walls, improve harbors, and various other things, to which I hear no man object; but when we from the other side of the ridge ask for something to be done to benefit the Union at large, and our constituents in particular, then the constitution adopted for the whole United States is too narrow to reach us, and some of our folk join in saying, if we stretch it from tide water it will tear. Indeed, it does seem to me that some gentlemen think that constitution, commerce, and every thing stops with tide water. They might as well try to convince me that a goose, swimming in tide water, turns to a terrapin when it gets above, as that commerce ceases to be commerce when it is put into a boat or wagon. Sir, this may be sound argument with hair-splitting politicians, but it would be laughed at by our common ploughboys. If the good people of Tennessee can be blinded by reasoning which tends to license the expenditure of their moneys for all the sea-coast projects, and nothing for defensive means amongst them, I shall confess that my colleague [Mr. POLK] is representing their wishes, though I never shall believe it to be their interests.

I have but little knowledge of the constitutional law, but I can understand plain English, and the constitution reads thus: Congress shall have power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." This means commerce carried on between different States, just like commerce with foreign nations, and the same can be done for both, unless the modern notion shall prevail, that there is no commerce off the tide water to regulate.

On the plan which I have adopted, the neglected portions of our country would be improved, and life and spirit given to the husbandman. The farmer could find a ready market for the products of his industry, life and energy would take the place of indolence and sloth; the farmer would then whistle after his plough, and the benefits would be felt throughout society; the cheerful wife, with her prattling infants, the pride and ornament of our country, would join their husbands and fathers, and would pronounce a blessing upon the politicians who were instrumental in conferring this good.

I have heard the sufferings and sorrows of our revolutionary worthies pathetically described by gentlemen on this floor, with which I have been edified and charmed; but, sir, when I am about to get the information on that subject from the most impressive source, I will go to the actor himself. I have heard the tale of their sufferings from themselves; how they marked with their bloody feet the frozen earth, and endured all that could be imposed upon them to purchase for us this Government, which is certainly the best upon the earth. They enriched it for us with their own blood; and shall we, like drones, misimprove the means which have been put in our power to benefit ourselves and posterity? Shall we skim the surface of this delightful country, and render it barren and waste? No, we would be unworthy of being called the descendants of ancestors so brave and noble. Let us put forth our hands and improve it, and give to its high-minded inhabitants all the facilities in our power, by constructing for them roads and canals, and improving their rivers; then shall we merit the name of representatives of a free and enlightened people. Pursuing this system, you would bind together the North and the South, and prevent jealousy and distrust, which is now but too apparent. Then you would hear nothing said about States flying off from their sisters, and rebelling against the Union. All would be bound together in bonds of harmony and peace; and when our posterity came into our places, they would have the pleasing reflection that they too had cause for holding in affectionate remembrance those who had preserved, in health and vigor, their beloved country.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of Massachusetts, said, that, having given notice, some time since, that he would move an amendment of the bill now before the committee, so as to extend the road proposed from Buffalo to Lake Champlain, in Vermont, and thence to Boston, in Massachusetts, he deemed it his duty to assign his reasons for supporting the bill, provided the amendment should be adopted.

Without the amendment, [said Mr. R.] this bill proposes the construction of a national road from Buffalo, in the State of New York, passing by the seat of Government, to New Orleans. According to the estimate, it will be fifteen hundred miles in length, and will pass through parts of nine States of this Union. The population of the States through which it is to pass, in 1820, was about six millions. It was my intention to show, at this time, the claims of New York and of the Eastern States to an extension of this road. But, sir, by the state of the question I am precluded from doing this, since there has been a motion to strike out the first section of the bill. I shall, if permitted, take an opportunity, at some future time, to state more directly and fully my reasons for the amendment I propose.

The question, whether the power to construct the proposed road is delegated to Congress by the constitution, appears to be waived. I understood the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. P. P. BARBOUR] as distinctly abandoning the ground of unconstitutionality as the ground of his objections to the bill.

[The gentleman states that he was misunderstood on this point.]

The measure proposed by the bill I consider as of great importance, as it will be one of a decisive character to settle the long contested question, whether this Government will persevere in the system of internal improvements, or whether it will abandon this system as inexpedient. The constitutionality and policy of the system are subjects on which I have bestowed some inquiry, and some serious reflection. Others having declined a discussion of the question of constitutionality, I will not trouble the committee with my views of it. I will attempt to show that the measure proposed by the bill, if amended, is expedient, because it will conduce to the general welfare of the country.

The proposed national road is part of a system of internal improvements. This system has been, for many years, going forward. It is now twenty-four years since this Government appropriated thirty thousand dollars for the construction of the Cumberland road. It is twenty-four years since the Government appropriated twenty-eight thousand dollars for opening a road from the frontier of Georgia to New Orleans, and from the river Mississippi to the Ohio; and from Nashville, in Tennessee, to Natchez, in the Mississippi Territory. It is twenty-one years since this Government appropriated twenty-five thousand dollars to extend the canal of Carondelet, leading from Lake Pontchartrain to New Orleans. It is twelve years since this Government appropriated, for the construction of the Cumberland road, above three hundred thousand dollars. By what authority, sir, have these appropriations been made? They were appropriations for neither military roads nor post roads, which come within what are called the specified powers of the constitution. No, sir, if based on any power, they were based on the specified power delegated to Congress by the eighth section of the constitution—the power “to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States.” And now, sir, after a series of legislative acts, commenced twenty-four years since, and an expenditure of nearly fourteen millions of dollars, applied without any regard to principles of equal distribution among the several States and Territories, is this system to stop? The system cannot stop here without great injustice to a number of States in this Union.

By a report made to the Senate during the present session of Congress, by the Secretary of the Treasury, it appears that, for purposes of education, and the construction of roads and canals within and leading to a number of States and Territories, from the adoption of the constitution to the 24th December, 1828, the following appropriations have been made:

To Maine, - - - - -	$9,500
To New York, - - - - -	4,156
To Tennessee, - - - - -	254,000
To Arkansas, - - - - -	45,000
To Michigan, - - - - -	45,000
To Florida, - - - - -	83,417
To Ohio, - - - - -	2,527,404
To Illinois, - - - - -	1,725,959
To Indiana, - - - - -	1,513,161
To Missouri, - - - - -	1,462,471
To Mississippi, - - - - -	600,667

To Alabama, - - - - -	1,534,727
To Louisiana, - - - - -	1,166,361

In addition to these appropriations, the Government has been authorized to aid, by subscription, the following works:

Delaware and Chesapeake canal - - -	300,000
Ohio and Chesapeake do. - - -	10,000
Dismal Swamp do. - - -	150,000
Louisville and Portland do. - - -	90,000
Cumberland road - - -	2,230,903
Western and Southwestern State roads - - -	76,959

$13,838,886

These appropriations have been in lands at the minimum price, in two and three per cent. funds and in money. No part of this sum, it appears, has been applied to Vermont, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Connecticut, or Massachusetts. A number of other States, in December, 1828, had received no appropriations for similar purposes. The appropriations for Maine and New York are mere fractions.

From what sources have the appropriations in money been derived? In 1828, the revenue accruing on the importation of goods in the States through which it is proposed the national road shall be constructed, did not exceed six millions of dollars. In the same year, the revenue accruing on the importation of goods into New York and the New England States, amounted to about twenty-one millions of dollars. Admit that this amount of duties which is paid into the treasury is paid by the consumers, and according to this rule the people of New York and of the New England States pay a full proportion of it. Why should they not share an equal part in the public improvements constructed by the authority of the General Government?

It is said that the people living in the Atlantic States have received their portion of the aid of Government, in appropriations for the erection of light-houses, and in improving their harbors. But there are facilities for commerce, which vastly more than repay their cost by the revenue they bring into the national treasury. If the Atlantic States be charged with these improvements, then they ought to have more credit for the duties they collect. Sir, in setting up a claim to the extension of this road into the Eastern States, I have no direct interest, as I should have in case it was proposed to extend it through the district I represent. If extended to Boston, it will come within about ten miles of that district. If the proposed road even crossed a navigable river running through Plymouth district, I should consider it of no trifling value. Wherever great roads cross navigable waters, or where there is water power, there is a place of business. In those places hundreds and thousands of our industrious inhabitants are collected. There is a market for the produce of the farmer. There is employment for the mechanic. There the value of the land rises rapidly.

The national road proposed by this bill, if the amendment be adopted, will do something towards equalizing this system. It will extend some benefits of internal improvement to the inhabitants of the interior of this country, through an extent of nearly two thousand miles, besides the benefits it will extend by an increased activity of business and commerce, from the points on the numerous rivers this road will cross, to the great marts of trade and commerce along our whole coast, from North to South. This plan has in it something approaching nearer the principle of regard to the people of the Union, than any other that has appeared under the name of internal improvements.

But this system has been opposed by some of the States, and by some of our statesmen, entitled to great respect. The constitutionality of the power of Congress to continue this system, I consider as virtually decided by the public voice, until the decision shall be reversed by a direct appeal, either to the Supreme Court of the United States, or to the people of the United States. I hold that it is not competent for either the constituted authorities, or the people of any individual State, to decide upon this question.

On this great and long agitated question, the will of the majority of the people of the United States, through their representatives, has been repeatedly and most decidedly expressed. The members of this House are not representatives of State sovereignties, but of the people of the United States. The will of the majority in this House I consider in no other light than as the will of the majority of the people of the United States. If in any department of this Government, or in any sense, State sovereignties are represented, it is in the Senate of the United States. This question of constitutional power, then, has been repeatedly decided by majorities of the State sovereignties. When the will of the majority has been fairly and fully expressed, I hold myself bound, as a supporter of the constitution, and by all the principles on which a republic or a democratic form of government is predicated, to obey that will. Any other course would seem to me to lead to anarchy, and to the most disastrous consequences. These, in my view, are principles essential to the safety and welfare of this republic. Whoever may embrace or abandon them, I shall not abandon them. Opprobrious names will not alienate me from them. Even if my own judgment were against the proposed measure, as unconstitutional, when the voice of the constituted authorities of my country has often, and through a succession of years, declared an opposite judgment, would it become me pertinaciously to oppose that expression of the public will? Obedience to that will, when expressed in constitutional forms, becomes a duty. If, against the decisions of Congress, I perseveringly oppose my own will or judgment as an inflexible arbiter, do I not plainly indicate what I would do if I had power? In what should I differ from a despot? Can a representative of the people, consistently with his duty, by his opposition to a system of measures, preclude them from participating in the benefits of that system, to which, by the will of the majority, they are entitled? Surely, in such case, he stands opposed to their participation in the general welfare. I doubt whether the people will long be satisfied with a system that allows them no participation in its benefits.

Will this proposed road conduce to the general welfare? If any road or canal, or the removal of any obstructions to the navigation of our rivers, be conducive to the general welfare, it will not be denied that this road will be so.

The fact has been adverted to, and is too important to be forgotten, that Presidents Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and I believe all our Presidents with hardly an exception, have repeatedly and earnestly recommended to Congress the construction of roads and canals; or, in case their power was doubted, that measures should be adopted by Congress to procure an alteration of the constitution for that purpose. In this one point, all our Presidents, without exception, have agreed; that is, that a system of internal improvements would be highly beneficial to this country. If they had apprehended danger to individual States, or to the Union, from such a system, would they have recommended it? They evidently saw no dangerous tendency to consolidation. They saw no serious objection against confiding to the General Government the power to construct internal improvements. They concurred in opinion, on this point, with all the ablest and most approved writers on political economy. Malthus has this remark, with particular reference to England: "That if all the roads and canals of the country were broken up, and the means of distributing its produce were essentially impeded, the whole value of the produce would greatly fall. Upon the same principle, if the means of distributing the produce of the country were still further facilitated, and if the adaptation of it to the wants, tastes, and powers of the consumers were more complete than at present, there can be no doubt that a great increase in the value of the whole produce would follow." This writer further adds, that "before the introduction of good roads and canals in England, the prices of produce in many country districts were extremely low, compared with the same kind of produce in the London markets. After the means of distribution were facilitated, the price of country produce, and of some sorts of London produce which were sent into the country in exchange for it, rose, and rose in a greater degree than the country produce fell in the London markets; and consequently the value of the whole produce, or the supplies of London and the country together, was greatly increased; and while encouragement was thus given to the employment of a greater quantity of capital by the extension of demand, the temporary rise of profits, occasioned by the extension, would greatly contribute to furnish the additional capital." Page 321.

It must be seen, at a glance, that the natural effect of such improvements would be the enhancement of the value of produce, and of all other kinds of property—an effect highly favorable to those classes engaged in callings of industry, or in trade and commerce, or to the class in debt. It is clearly beyond dispute, that the fall of the nominal value of produce, of land, and all property in trade, must be ruinous to the holders. In a young and enterprising nation, this class of citizens is of course numerous. A wise Government will not disregard the interests of a class so important to the welfare of the whole, whether in peace or war. Another writer on political economy, (Mr. Say,) than whom there is no better authority on these subjects, remarks thus:

"But although the public can scarcely be itself a successful producer, it can at any rate give a powerful stimulus to individual productive energy, by well planned, well conducted, and well supported public works, particularly roads, canals, and harbors. Facility of communication assists production, exactly in the same way as the machinery that multiplies manufactured products abridges the labor of production. It is a means of furnishing the same product at less expense, which has exactly the same effect as raising a greater product with the same expense. If we take into account the immense quantity of goods conveyed upon the roads of a rich and populous empire, from the commonest vegetables brought daily to market up to the rarest imported luxuries poured into its harbors from every part of the globe, and thence diffused by means of land carriage over the whole face of the territory, we shall readily perceive the inestimable economy of good roads in the charges of production. The saving in carriage amounts to the whole value the article has derived gratuitously from nature, if, without good roads, it could not be had at all. Were it possible to transplant from the mountain to the plain the beautiful forests that flourish and rot neglected upon the inaccessible sides of the Alps and Pyrenees, the value of these forests would be an entirely new creation of value to mankind, a clear gain of revenue both to the landholder and the consumer also." P. 207-8.

The same author adds the following:

"Roads and canals are costly public works, even in countries where they are under judicious and economical management. Yet, probably, in most cases, the benefits they afford to the community far exceed the charges. Were we to calculate what would be the charge of carriage upon all the articles and commodities that now pass along any road in the course of a year, if the road did not exist, and compare it with the utmost charge, under present circumstances, the whole difference that would appear will be so much gain to the consumers of all those articles, and so much positive and clear nett profit to the community." Vol. ii, p. 229.

Since the general peace in Europe, a large portion of the people of this country have been suffering under heavy embarrassment, in consequence of having contracted debts when the nominal value of all property was at a high rate. This embarrassment is the necessary effect of the general depression of the nominal value of property. It has borne most severely on the inhabitants in the interior of our country, who have a few facilities to obtain a market for their produce to pay their debts; and of course they cease, to a great extent, to be purchasers of the products of the industry and enterprise of others. Malthus lays down this sound proposition—that “whenever the produce of a country, estimated in the labor which it will command, falls in value, it is evident that with it the power and will to purchase the same quantity of labor must be diminished, and the effect we demand for an increase of produce must, for a time, be checked.” P. 32.

Facilities for transportation, then, are facilities for production. What gives to the great State of New York, and to her city of that name, their pre-eminence in this Union? Sir, it is their enterprise by means of the facilities for transportation they have created and extended—facilities for internal commerce. Without these, their external commerce would rapidly decline. And, sir, I hope the enlightened delegation from that State will not oppose the attempt of the General Government to do for the Union what she has so wisely and successfully done for herself. Much as she has done, the interior of that State would be greatly improved by more good roads, and the value of her own canals would be augmented. But gentlemen seem to be alarmed at this proposed exercise of power by the General Government, as tending to a consolidation of the powers of the State Governments into one sovereignty. I have not been able to discover this tendency.

But, sir, I have seen cause for the most solemn alarm at the apprehension of an opposite tendency—a tendency to insubordination and disunion, with all their attendant horrors. The period is but just passed, when the evident weakness of the bonds of this Union, and the want of national sympathy and national character, filled the hearts of the most devoted and intelligent friends of the Union with deep consternation. Had the period of trial been prolonged, no man can calculate what might have been the consequences. Now, sir, is the favorable time to strengthen the bonds of the Union, by interests that will identify us as one people; that each citizen in either extreme of this Union may feel that in each citizen in the opposite extreme he has a brother. Will the construction of a road encroach upon State sovereignties? Will they contend for the exclusive right to promote their own interests?

The power of the General Government to construct a road in any individual State, I consider as not necessarily a supreme power, but as a concurrent power. Hence there is no cause for alarm to State authorities. The power of Congress to construct roads in an individual State, implies no denial of power to that State to construct roads. Much of the legislation of Congress, and of the several States, has been concurrent legislation. The militia laws of the United States, and of the several States, are acts of concurrent legislation. By concurrent legislation I do not mean that the action of one party is necessary to the action of the other, as in the case of two branches of the same legislature. The power I speak of is, the power which either the General Government or a State Government may exercise without encroaching upon the proper right of the other. It is a power that belongs not exclusively to either. If the distinguished statesmen whose names have been mentioned, who have received the homage of all hearts, had imagined that a system of internal improvements would lead to consolidation, or to an undue ascendancy of the General over the State Governments, they never would have recommended that system.

If any men ever lived for the cause of liberty and their country, this meed belongs to them. Are we wiser than they were? Are we more patriotic? Do we better understand the policy of free government than they understood it? There is no system of policy that the General Government can ever pursue, without giving offence to some parts of the Union. I would have the individual States retain and exercise every particle of their rightful power. But, sir, I maintain that allegiance to the Union is essential to the preservation of the liberties of all the individual States. Mr. Madison remarks on this principle of paramount power, which is distinctly asserted in the constitution of the United States, that if this had not been adopted, “the world would have seen, for the first time, a system of government founded on an inversion of the fundamental principles of all government; it would have seen the authority of the whole society every where subordinate to the authority of the parts; it would have seen a monster, in which the head was under the direction of the members.”—Fed. No. 44, p. 286.

It must ever be painful to the friends of the Union on such occasions as the construction of a road, the passage of a tariff act, or even of a law declaring war, to hear the language of revolt from any portion of the citizens. The following remarks by Mr. Madison in the forty-fifth number of the Federalist, are too pertinent and monitory to be omitted here:

“If the Union, (he says) as has been shown, be essential to the security of the people of America against foreign danger; if it be essential to their security against contentions and wars among the different States; if it be essential to guard them against the violent and oppressive factions which embitter the blessings of liberty, and against those military establishments which must gradually poison its very fountain; if, in a word, the Union be essential to the happiness of the people of America, is it not preposterous to urge as an objection to a Government, without which the objects of the Union cannot be attained, that such a Government may derogate from the importance of the Governments of the individual States?”

“Was, then, the American revolution effected, was the American confederacy formed, was the precious blood of thousands spilt, and the hard earned substance of millions lavished—not that the people of America should enjoy peace, liberty, and safety; but that the Governments of the individual States, that particular municipal establishments, might enjoy a certain extent of power, and be arrayed with certain dignities and attributes of sovereignty? We have heard of the impious doctrine in the old world, that the people were made for kings, not kings for the people. Is the same doctrine to be revived in the new, in another shape, that the solid happiness of the people is to be sacrificed to the views of political institutions of a different form? It is too early for politicians to presume on our forgetting that the public good, the real welfare of the people, is the supreme object to be pursued, and that no form of government whatever has any other value than as it may be fitted for the attainment of this object. Were the plan of the convention (that formed our present constitution) adverse to the public happiness, my voice would be, reject the plan. In like manner, as far as the sovereignty of the States cannot be reconciled to the happiness of the people, the voice of every good citizen must be, let the former be sacrificed to the latter.”

The same counsels were repeated by the illustrious and venerated father of his country, in the parting blessing he pronounced on his retirement from the Presidency.

In my opinion, sir, whatever may be said or done by political aspirants to the contrary, the people, and a large majority of them, too, will sustain the General Government in measures to strengthen the bonds of the Union. They have no pleasure in contemplating that either they or their children may be involved in strifes between State sovereignties, or in civil war from any cause.

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

From some quarters in this House, it has been said that the money to construct this road ought not to be taken from the treasury; that it would be better to repeal the tariff, to abolish the system of duties, and let the people keep their money in their own pockets. By such a course, sir, the Union itself would soon be abandoned. Instead of the present burdens, each State, if she would have commerce, must maintain her own navy. If she would guard her rights, she must support her own armies. The great States would soon conquer the small States, and then would result a consolidation of most fearful character. Would it be wise to abolish the revenue system, and cut off the resources that replenish the treasury? Soon would our navy be reduced, and our commerce every where would become the prey of freebooters. War, or disgrace and ruin, must follow. Sir, if the duties be too high, let them be reduced, but let not the General Government be stripped of its sinews to save a little money in the pockets of the people.

During Mr. Jefferson's administration, in one of his messages to Congress, he took into consideration the question of the expediency of abolishing a part of the revenue. He came to this conclusion, which I will give in his own words. "Patriotism would certainly prefer the continuance of impost, and its application to the great purposes of public education, roads, rivers, canals, and such other objects of public improvement as it may be thought proper to add to the constitutional enumeration of federal powers."

In reviewing the history of this Government during nearly half the period of its existence, and the principles and measures which have been warmly advocated by the wisest and most distinguished of its founders, I come to the conclusion that the system of internal improvements is destined to go forward, and that fidelity to my constituents, and to "the general welfare," demands my efforts, though humble, to equalize the benefits of it as nearly as practicable to all parts of the country.

In this system I consider the people of the United States as having a more direct and important interest than in any other that can be devised, excepting that of education, which may have its benefits to every family and every individual.

Is there any thing of imposing splendor in the plan of a free road, extending a distance of two thousand miles through the interior of this country? From one end to the other, where now are fens, and caverns, and forests, will be a highway for the march of civilization, and of the prosperity of the people; an extended line of communication to the eye of the patriot and the philanthropist, beautifully studded with flourishing villages and towns. To a vast number of our citizens it will hold up new encouragements and new means to throw off their almost hopeless embarrassments, new encouragements and means to support schools and seminaries for the education of their youth, and in numerous ways to add to the general wealth and prosperity of our country.

Does this proposed measure threaten to the country an oppressive burden? If it were so, I would not advocate it. This road may cost three, or even six millions of dollars. During a number of years past, after disbursing the ordinary expenses for the support of Government, and the appropriations, a balance has been left in the treasury of more than three millions of dollars, and amounting, in some instances, to more than six millions of dollars. The duties on several articles of necessity may then be reduced, and, in a short time, the public debt will have been discharged, and the revenue will be equal to all probable demands upon the Government. In a few years the appropriations for the payment of military pensions must almost entirely cease.

Sir, the revenue, amounting to twenty-six or twenty-eight millions of dollars, is drawn from the people of the interior as well as from the rest. For the improvement of that part of the country, let a few millions go back to reward their labor in the construction of the proposed road. It will not be lost to the country nor to the Government. The true capital of a country consists not in money, but in its amount of productive industry. Good roads are of more value to the country than money in either the pockets of the people or in the national treasury. Malthus justly remarks, that, "amongst abundance of other causes of the misery and weakness of the countries subjected to the Ottoman dominion, it cannot be doubted that one of the principal is the vast quantity of capital remaining in a state of inactivity." Vol. ii, p. 87.

Construct this national road, and, from the eastern extremity of our Atlantic coast, through the interior of the country, to the Mississippi, there will soon be a line of villages and towns of greater value to the Union than would be a chain of mountains of the richest ore. When this road is completed, if the prosperity of the country continues, let there be branches extended from this road into other sections of the Union. By a policy like this, the citizens of this republic may be more firmly attached to their Government, and better satisfied that its designs are

"Lofty and pure, and meant for general good."

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] is alarmed at the cost of this road. If the road be extended as proposed by the amendment I intend to offer, according to the estimate of the committee who reported the bill, it will cost three millions of dollars. The gentleman from Tennessee says seven millions. The truth may prove to be between the extremes.

In the treasury, on the first of January, 1830, was a balance of six million six hundred and sixty-eight thousand two hundred and eighty-six dollars, a surplus beyond what the service of that year required. On the 1st of January, 1829, there was a surplus of five million nine hundred and seventy-two thousand four hundred and thirty-five dollars not required for the service of that year. The estimated balance in the year 1830 falls somewhat below five millions of dollars. This, I have no doubt, is a very safe calculation. The amount of the public debt redeemable is rapidly diminishing. The amount paid in 1828 was above twelve millions of dollars. Nearly the same amount of public debt was paid in 1829. But the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that the amount of public debt redeemable is rapidly sinking. The amount redeemable in 1830 is set at eight million seventeen thousand six hundred and ninety-five dollars. The amount of public debt to be paid, that is, to fulfil the engagements of the Government,

For 1831, is estimated at	$7,705,960
For 1834, at	5,720,948

Thus the gradual diminution of the public debt, as redeemable, would leave a sum sufficient to build, every year, a road such as this bill proposes. But those sums stated by the Secretary will not discharge the whole debt. The Secretary of the Treasury proposes the sum of twelve millions to be paid annually. This, he says, will complete "the payment of the whole public debt within the year 1834, without applying the bank shares." Why, then, this alarm at a proposition to construct a road that will cost three, or even six, millions of dollars?

Another objection. This road will be a subject of controversy. Will this be a good reason against the measure? Every measure requiring appropriations is contested. It will ever be so. In all parts of our country, in every town and district where there are roads, there are controversies. And, generally, where are the most controversies, there are the best roads.

The opposition to this bill has been powerful and ingenious, but, to my mind, far from being convincing. I hope the bill, in an amended form, may pass—that the road may be truly national, or, I would rather say, republican in its character, equalizing and extending its benefits as far as practicable. For the permanent benefit of so great a portion of the population of the United States, in my judgment there is no instance in which the money of the treasury has ever been better applied. In no instance have the people of the interior of this country, to an equal extent, received from the many millions paid by them and expended, benefits so substantial as is proposed by this bill. It is on this ground, and for reasons I have now offered, I support it. I ask only that it may have a national character, or at least that it may have something of the proportions of a system adapted to the claims of the country. For appropriations to carry forward internal improvements in various parts of the Union, other than the eastern States, I have uniformly voted since I have had the honor of a seat here. For the part of the Union from which I come, I should be false to my trust if I did not claim a share in the benefits of this system. If this claim be not allowed, I shall consider myself under no obligation to vote for the bill. If it be allowed, I shall hold myself bound to vote for it. This course I have determined on for myself, as fair and consistent, and no more than just to my constituents and to the eastern section of this Union.

Note by Mr. R.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR has subjoined to his speech on the proposed national road, a note, containing some statements of the revenue derived from the New York canals, and of the balance against them in expenses. He shows that the interest on the original cost of the canals, and the expenses for superintendence, repairs, &c. in 1826, exceeded the amount of revenue accruing from them in the sum of four hundred and six thousand one hundred and forty-three dollars and seven cents. Is it inferrible from this fact that the canals are unprofitable to the State of New York? I put this question to the gentleman as a fair one. I am not aware that the gentleman could have had any other object in his note, than to lead the public to this inference. But is this inference authorized by the premises? Would the gentleman deny that, by the facilities created by the canals, the amount of millions of dollars in the products of the State is annually transported to market? It may be confidently asserted that the facilities for obtaining a market actually increase to an almost incredible degree the products of a country. If the question rest on the principles of loss and gain, then the canals are profitable to the State. They give a spring to industry and enterprise, and greatly augment the power of production. This to any people is wealth, and the procuring cause of their prosperity and their happiness. On what principle are county or State roads constructed? Are they constructed for purposes of public revenue? Surely not. In towns or counties all the citizens are taxed for the purpose of making and repairing one or more principal roads passing through them. The principal road does not go by every man's dwelling; but all are taxed for roads, which some of the citizens seldom or never pass. By a good road through the centre of a town or county, the value of every estate in that town or county is augmented. Yet it is impossible, in the nature of things, that all the citizens in a town, county, or State, should derive equal advantages from the principal roads. To resist the construction of roads because the facilities afforded by them would be unequal, would be entirely preposterous. Would the author of the note insist that appropriations ought not to be made except for purposes of revenue? This doctrine would abolish, not only our roads and canals, whether constructed by towns or States, but the whole system of public schools and colleges wherever they exist. They yield no revenue into the treasury; but they yield that which is infinitely more valuable to communities—intelligence, the blessings of civilization, the thousand varied delights of social intercourse. If the value of the rights and liberties enjoyed by the people of a republic consists in every citizen's keeping his dollars and cents in his own pocket, whilst those around him are illiterate, idle, and denied the facilities for convenient intercourse, a republic has no charms for my mind. The character of a people under its influence must sink into a state of imbecility and degradation. In many parts of this country, good roads cannot for a long time be obtained, unless the General Government constructs them, or they are constructed by what are called private corporations, with power to tax every passenger. It is incumbent on the friends of liberty to consider well the probable consequences that may result from placing the great roads of this country under the control of such corporations. The gentleman from Virginia might be pointed to a bridge corporation, that, on the ground of its pretended vested rights, to the subversion of the rights of the public, have wrung from a great and enterprising community a vast amount of their hard earnings. This was the necessary consequence of neglect on the part of the public authority to make provision at the public expense for facilities demanded for the convenience of that community. There is no portion of a community exposed to suffer more than the agricultural, by the want of facilities to transport their produce to market. Why is corn worth only from twelve and a half to twenty-five cents per bushel in the interior of Virginia, and at the same moment worth from fifty to seventy-five cents per bushel in Boston? The want of facilities for transportation accounts for this difference of from one hundred to five hundred per cent. This is an illustration which, with many others, puts to a severe test the notions of political economy advanced by the very able and eloquent member from Virginia in his speech against the proposed national road.

Mr. CROCKETT, of Tennessee, submitted an amendment, providing that the road should run from the city of Washington, in a direct route, to Memphis, on the Mississippi river, in the western district of Tennessee.

In support of his amendment, Mr. CROCKETT said, he was truly sorry, under existing circumstances, to trouble the committee with any remarks upon the subject, especially as a considerable portion of time had already been consumed by the Representatives from his State, no less than four gentlemen from Tennessee having addressed the committee, [Messrs. BLAIR, ISACKS, POLK, and STANDIFER] all of whom [said Mr. C.] are much better qualified to give light on this subject than myself.

When [he continued] I consider the few opportunities which I have had to obtain information on this important topic, I shrink at the idea of addressing so intelligent a body as this, upon matters relating to it. My lips would be sealed in silence, were I not fully convinced that there has been, in some instances, a partial and improper legislation resorted to during the present session. I was elected from the western district of Tennessee, after declaring myself a friend to this measure; and I came here quite hot for the road—yes, the fever was upon me; but I confess I am getting quite cool on the subject of expending money for the gratification of certain gentlemen who happen to have different views from those I entertain. Let us inquire where this money comes from. It will be found that even our poor citizens have to contribute towards the supply. I have not forgotten how I first found my way to this House; I pledged myself to the good people who sent me here, that I would oppose certain tariff measures, and strive to remove the duties upon salt, sugar, coffee, and other articles, which the poor, as well as the rich, are, from necessity compelled to consume. The duties on these articles are felt to be oppressive by my fellow-citizens; and, as long as I can raise my voice, I will oppose the odious system which sanctions them.

Those who sustain the Government, and furnish the means, have, by the illiberality of their servants, been kept in ignorance of the true cause of some of their sufferings. These servants, after the people entrust them with their confidence, too often forget the interest of their employers, and are led away by some designing gentlemen, who, to gratify some wild notion, are almost willing to enslave the poorer class at least. I am one of those who are called self-taught men; by the kindness of my neighbors, and some exertion of my own, I have been raised from obscurity without an education. I am therefore compelled to address the committee in the language of a farmer, which, I hope, will be understood. I do not mean to oppose internal improvements—my votes on that subject will show that I am an internal improvement man, though I cannot go, as the Kentuckian says, “the whole hog.” I will only go as far as the situation of the country will admit, so far as not to oppress. I will not say that I will vote against the bill under all circumstances, yet, at this moment, I consider it a wild notion to carry the road to the extent contemplated, from Buffalo to this city, and from this to New Orleans. Adopt my amendment, and you will shorten the distance five hundred miles, which will save, in the outset, upwards of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars to the country. Is not this worthy the consideration of the committee? Besides, it would, in a measure, be useless to open the road as contemplated by the bill. I recollect there was a road opened by the army, from the lower end of the Muscle shoals, on the Tennessee river, to Lake Pontchartrain, and thence to New Orleans, and now it is grown up, except about one hundred and twenty miles, so that it is impassable; this is according to information I have received from gentlemen who are acquainted with the road.

From East Tennessee to New Orleans it must be upwards of eight hundred miles; from that place to Memphis, I mean from where the road would pass, between two and three hundred. I am well acquainted with the local situation of East Tennessee, and do not doubt that it would be of great use to make a good road from Memphis to this city. The contemplated road is to commence at Buffalo, come to this city, and go thence to New Orleans. But suppose we should say it were best to begin at Memphis, and come to this place? Will this be opposed? Will the rule not work both ways? If not, it is a bad concern. I am astonished that certain of our eastern friends have become so kind to us. They are quite willing to aid in distributing a portion of the national funds among us of the West. This was not so once. And, if I am not deceived, their present kindness is merely a bait to cover the hook which is intended to haul in the western and southern people; and when we are hooked over the barb, we will have to yield. Their policy reminds me of a certain man in the State of Ohio, who, having caught a racoon, placed it in a bag, and, as he was on his way home, he met a neighbor, who was anxious to know what he had in his bag. He was told to put his hand in and feel, and in doing so he was bit through the fingers; he then asked what it was, and was told that it was only a bite. I fear that our good eastern friends have a hook and a bite for us; and, if we are once fastened, it will close the concern. We may then despair of paying the national debt; we may bid farewell to all other internal improvements; and, finally, we may bid farewell to all hopes of ever reducing duties on any thing. This is honestly my opinion; and again I say, I cannot consent to “go the whole hog.” But I will go as far as Memphis. There let this great road strike the Mississippi, where the steamboats are passing every hour in the day and night; where you can board a steamboat, and, in seven or eight days, go to New Orleans and back; where there is no obstruction at any time of the year. I would thank any man to show this committee the use of a road which will run parallel with the Mississippi for five or six hundred miles. Will any man say that the road would be preferred to the river either for transportation or travelling? No, sir. Then, is not your project useless, and will it not prove an improper expenditure of the public funds to attempt to carry the road beyond Memphis? New Orleans has local advantages which nothing can take from her; it cannot injure her to have the road terminate at Memphis; and if the road should so terminate, it would be on the direct route from this city to the province of Texas, which I hope will one day belong to the United States, and that at no great distance of time.

These considerations, I think, are entitled to the notice of the committee. If we must burden the people by a great expenditure, let us endeavor to do it with a view to the general good of the country. As to the defence of the country, every man must know that the valley of the Mississippi can produce a sufficient number of troops to meet any enemy who may have the audacity or vanity to attack our western frontiers or New Orleans—that noted battle ground, where, a few years since, we made the most powerful enemy on earth tremble; where the proud troops of England, headed by their haughty Lord Pakenham, so soon became tired of our present Chief Magistrate and his brave little band. We are at present much stronger than during the last war; and if we desire to transport an army to New Orleans, or any thing else, nature has furnished us with the best road in the world, the importance of which we have once experienced. Should it ever happen that your brave soldiers, who fought so gallantly at Bladensburg, should be called on to render us assistance, I should be in favor of their taking a water passage at Memphis; a ride on the water, and a pleasant nap or two, might recruit their strength, and sustain their natural bravery. I do not anticipate that those heroes will ever be called on to protect us; if there is a call, it will be on the other side; and it is now to be regretted that you had not been aided here by a few Kentucky and Tennessee boys, in your brave exertions to prevent the disgraceful burning of the capitol.

In the district which I represent, there are eighteen counties, in the whole of which there is not a spot of ground twenty-five miles from a navigable stream; and, for my part, I would much rather see the public money expended in clearing out those rivers, than in opening roads. By the bill, fifteen hundred dollars per mile is to be expended. This, I fear, would be but an entering wedge. But we will suppose the road to be fifteen hundred miles in length; at this rate it would cost two million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. But I believe the distance to be farther than gentlemen have calculated, and the expense will be greater.

There is another objection to carrying the road to the extent contemplated by the bill. I think many gentlemen have a very erroneous idea about the nature of the country through which they mean to make the road; they, perhaps, do not know that a considerable portion of it will pass through a low, flat, and marshy country, entirely destitute of rock, gravel, or stone. These low grounds are, in many instances, a perfect swamp; and I cannot be convinced, by any gentleman, that a mud road can be of any use after it is made. Gentlemen are much mistaken if they think the country bordering on the Mississippi to be like this. My opinion is, that if you were to have the road thrown up as contemplated by the bill, it would be impassable the whole of the winter season; neither wagons nor horses could travel on it during the time when it would be most wanted. If an attack is made on New Orleans, it will be in the winter, because troops, on account of liability to sickness, will not be taken there during the summer; and in the winter your road would be of no use. The Mississippi gives to New Orleans the advantage over any other point on the continent, so far as regards the facility with which she can be furnished with a force and the materials of war. At a few days' notice, a sufficient force can be collected at that place, to contend with any foe; but I do not expect that we shall ever again be called on to defend that point.

I am reminded that I have, in several of my speeches to my constituents, given it as my opinion that General Jackson would diminish the national debt faster than any President who has preceded him. I would be pleased to see him effect what I have anticipated; and I think it would be equally pleasing to the country at large. We boast of our freedom; let us also place ourselves in a state in which we can boast of our unembarrassed situation. I am one of those who feel willing to give the present administration a fair opportunity to pay all the public debts, if possible, during its existence. I wish not to embarrass it by erecting large public expenditures—let it have a chance to do its best. I heard a few days since on this floor, that we were about to bankrupt the nation by bestowing a portion of the public funds upon the remaining few of that glorious band of revolutionary worthies, whose blood and toil have purchased for us our boasted liberties; who have been knocking at the door of Congress so long, that but a meagre group remain—the rest having tottered to their graves. If we wait a little longer, the few left will also be out of the reach of our slow charity. Yet gentlemen will talk of bankrupting the nation, when these aged heroes, who gained our independence, extend their hands; and still find excuses for large expenditures, the expediency of which is doubtful. My vote will always be given for the aid of our revolutionary heroes, in preference to your Buffalo road, or any other road.

To be honest, I must lay this matter before the people in a plain manner. I must say that there is but one reason by which I could justify myself for voting for the bill. It is this: I discover a determination to squander the public funds in some way; and, therefore, I should strive to "come in for snacks." There is a bill on your table which will take from your treasury about six hundred thousand dollars for erecting light-houses, and making surveys along the seaboard. Some money, certainly, ought to be distributed to the West; and, to effect this, I must vote for the road bill. I have seen three attempts made, during this session, to reduce duties, and all to no effect. If, then, high duties are to be kept up, should I not try to extend a portion of their avails to the people of the West, who have to pay their proportion? I would much rather, however, let the people keep the money in their own pockets, than to have it expended in paying high salaries to the men who gather the money into the treasury, and in paying ourselves high wages for squandering it to the four winds. These are evils which should be remedied; a host of those who subsist on treasury pay should be dismissed, or their wages lessened; and much of the money which is now required for our various appropriations, should be left in the pockets of the people. This doctrine will suit our western and southern people, but it may not be acceptable to some eastern gentlemen, who are so anxious to encourage manufactures of all kinds at any sacrifice. It is my firm belief that our eastern brethren wish to place us of the South and West in such a dilemma, that we shall be compelled to keep up the duties to their highest extent. They well know that, if we commence this work, fifty millions of dollars will be asked to complete it. If we but once commence, they will have us bound to maintain a high tariff for many years; and I would not be surprised if we should finally be obliged to resort to a system of direct taxation. This will be a tough morsel for the people in my part of the country to swallow. I hope never to see it offered to them—but I confess I am getting somewhat alarmed.

I came here as much authorized to vote for this measure as any man in Congress. I had expressed my willingness to support the measure to all my constituents; but its expediency, at this time, I must confess, appears to me extremely doubtful. I do not hesitate at all on account of scruples as to the rightful power of Congress—having always voted for internal improvements—and I will even support this bill if you will adopt my amendment, and carry the road direct to Memphis. By this, Memphis would soon become an important point; and certainly the other route can be of no essential benefit to New Orleans, that I can discover.

I have endeavored to be candid in giving my views on the subject. I thought it right to give a fair statement of facts. Gentlemen may now think that I am pledged to vote against the bill, but I wish not to be misunderstood. I repeat, that I will vote for the bill with my amendment. And if you will take into consideration the fact, that the Legislature of Tennessee have directed their Senators and Representatives here, to ask the Government to subscribe half a million of dollars to make a turnpike road from the Virginia line to Memphis, and that the road contemplated in the bill, if carried to Memphis, will supersede the one which the Tennessee Legislature has in view, I think you will see the importance of the amendment, which, if adopted, will secure my support of the bill; but no consideration will induce me to vote for the southern route.

With these views I will submit the question to the committee, to whom I return my thanks for their politeness.

Mr. CHILTON gave his reasons against the measure, although friendly to the system of internal improvement.

The debate was continued by Messrs. COKE, CARSON, CRAIG, of Virginia, SPEIGHT, PETTIS, and BARRINGER; but, before a vote was taken on the final question,

The committee rose, and reported progress.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 31, 1830.

PAY OF MEMBERS.

The House then resumed the consideration of the following resolution, offered by Mr. McDUFFIE:

Resolved, That the Committee on Retrenchment be instructed to report a bill providing that whenever the first session of Congress shall continue for a longer period than one hundred and twenty days, the pay of the members shall be reduced to two dollars per day from and after the termination of the said one hundred and twenty days; and that whenever the second session of Congress shall continue for a longer period than ninety days, the pay of the members shall be reduced to two dollars per day from and after the termination of the said ninety days."

The question being on the motion of Mr. EVERETT to amend, by striking out the whole resolution after the word Resolved, and inserting the following words:

"That provision ought to be made, by law, that the first session of Congress shall be limited to the 15th day of April; and that the second session of Congress shall commence on the first Monday of November, except when otherwise provided by law."

Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia, spoke at some length, in opposition to the resolution. He said the object of the gentleman from South Carolina, who had introduced the resolution, seemed to him to be the application of a forfeiture of the pay of members for the purpose of curtailing the length of the session of Congress. It also contemplated an indirect reduction of the per diem allowance of members. He confidently believed it was no part of the policy of that gentleman (Mr. McDUFFIE) to seek popularity by his proposition; but he believed him mistaken in relation to the effect which would result from its adoption. He believed its effect would be to leave the business of legislation, or throw it into the hands of less competent incumbents. It went upon the hypothesis that one hundred days were sufficient for the transaction of the public business. To this he could not agree; its admission would be to pass condemnation upon their predecessors. The last five sessions of Congress had averaged one hundred and sixty seven days; and all experience proved that one hundred and seventy days, per session, were necessary. It should be considered that the business of Congress was continually increasing, on account of the great national questions arising before them—the pension system, the internal improvement system, &c.

Mr. S. said, he did not believe it was the wish of the people that their representatives should legislate for them without pay after they have been in session one hundred and twenty days, should they find it necessary to remain longer. He also contended that, should this proposition be adopted, the members in ordinary circumstances, who represented the true interests of the people, would be compelled, in justice to their own interest, to go home as soon as their pay was reduced; and there would consequently be none but the aristocracy left to do the business of legislation. He held it bad policy to render the representatives of the people at all dependant by a curtailment of their pay. It drove them to seek relief in Executive patronage; and he could refer to hundreds who had gone into post offices, Indian agencies, &c.; and he deemed this an evidence that they were insufficiently provided for. Mr. S. said, if the pay of other officers of Government were reduced in the same ratio, he would consent to reduce the pay of members to six dollars a day; but not otherwise.

Mr. S. then went into an examination of the business which has been done this session, in comparison with that transacted during former sessions. He concluded by remarking that he believed the only remedy for the evil complained of, was to be found in short speeches and long days' sessions; and he moved an amendment to the amendment, providing that, during the remainder of the session, a motion to adjourn should not be in order until half past four o'clock.

This proposition, involving an amendment of the rules of the House, and consequently requiring to be laid one day on the table, was decided by the Speaker not to be in order.

Mr. SPEIGHT said, he had hoped that, when this subject was first brought forward by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. McDUFFIE] it would have met with little or no objection. He thought the evil complained of was one obviously plain to the view of any person; and, he would venture to say, if gentleman in this House were disposed to shut them up, and refuse to apply the remedy, the people of the country would not long submit to the impositions that were practised on them. Mr. S. said, he had scarcely heard a single gentleman open his mouth in this debate, who had not conceded the point that much time was unnecessarily consumed here in legislation. Yet, when a remedy is proposed, there is such an apparent sensitiveness manifested, as almost to preclude the possibility of even acting on the subject, much more of effecting any thing like a remedy. Sir, the further this debate has progressed, the more I have been convinced there is not the least shadow of hope of effecting any thing like retrenchment in this House. We hear it resounded from all sides, that the effect of this resolution will be to cast an imputation on our own conduct. That it is impliedly saying, we do not render an equivalent for the time we consume here in legislation. Sir, I care not what the imputation might be, I am convinced something ought to be done to stop the progress of an evil which, in its tendency, threatens evils of no ordinary magnitude.

He would repeat again, that he cared not what might be the effect it might have on public opinion; he asserted much unnecessary time was consumed here. Our sessions are too long; and, sir, without intending to cast imputation on the character of any gentleman, my own opinion is, if our wages were curtailed, it would shorten the sessions. Sir, do you confine Congress within its legitimate sphere, and three months in each year is more than sufficient for the legislation of this country. Pass a law commensurate with this resolution, let it become the law of the land that the first session of each Congress shall be limited to four months, and beyond which the pay of members shall not exceed two dollars per day; and, sir, my impression is, there would not be many days consumed after the four months expired. Considerable pains [said Mr. S.] has been taken by the gentlemen opposed to this resolution, to show that the present session will not exceed those heretofore, on account of time and expense. We have been told that every long session has lasted five months; and, as a matter of course, this must do so too. This, sir, is the very reason why I am for the new order of things. Sir, "old things are to be done away, and all things are to become new." These are the hallowed days of "retrenchment and reform;" and, for the very reasons which gentlemen oppose the resolution, he would support it. The people expect at our hands a correction of all those abuses which have crept into the Government; and he could assure the House, that there was none which they were more disposed to work at, than the one now complained of. Sir, if this abuse of trust—this profligate waste of public money, has existed coeval with the formation of this Government, it is high time the evil was arrested; "now is the accepted time, and day of salvation." It is high time, indeed, that the laborer should be made to render an equivalent for his hire. He did not mean to impugn the members of Congress who had preceded him, but he would say, if he were to judge of the past by the present, abuses had existed. We sir, commenced our session on the 7th day of December; almost four months have elapsed, and what have we done? If there is a bill which has been passed of a public nature, save a few appropriations, they have escaped my memory. And, sir, how many private ones have we passed? Some forty or fifty; and here, sir, is our indefatigable exertion which gentlemen boast of. Sir, I will state one fact which, in my opinion, carries condemnation with it. During the first month, and until after the Christmas holidays, we met at twelve, and adjourned between two and three o'clock, and, every week, adjourn over from Thursday till Monday. Two months, sir, of the first of this session were spent without doing any thing but undergoing the mere formalities of meeting and adjourning. These are some of the evils which the gentleman, from South Carolina proposes to remedy. And yet we are gravely told by gentlemen, that to pass this resolution would imply censure on our own conduct. Sir, for one, I am willing to risk it. If public servants fail to do their master's will, they deserve punishment. He wondered that gentlemen, in the scope of their extraordinary imaginations, had not thought of another censure, the fatal and pernicious consequences of which, in his opinion, were as much to be dreaded as the one before mentioned. It is this, there is an old adage, which said, "touch a galled horse, and he will flinch." Now, sir, [said he] what will be the imaginations of our constituents, when they come to hear that there is so much sensitiveness exercised about reducing the pay of members? Why, sir, they will suppose, that, indeed, with us, the public good is a matter but of secondary consideration; and the opinion will at least be as national to suppose that we came here for pecuniary considerations, as that the adoption of this resolution implies a censure on our conduct. Sir, it is true as gospel, that none under heaven are so apt to feel the lash of censure as those who are guilty. Sir, far be it from me to impute dishonorable motives to any member of this House, I am only speaking of the effect the course of gentlemen will have on public opinion. Sir, I am truly sorry that gentlemen have thought proper to oppose this resolution with such violence. The opinions of Mr. Jefferson have been quoted by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH.] It is said that he recommended long sessions and short speeches. Mr. S. said he thought the gentleman from Virginia was amongst the last who should complain of long speeches. When the Register of Debates for this session shall be published, the gentleman will not be behind in size or number. The fact was, this session, it had been long speeches and short session, and so it would continue to be unless something was done to check the evil; for if we are to judge from the former conduct evinced in the debates, this is to be a speaking session. On account of some strange fatality or other, we are doomed to do nothing this session. Sir, my honest opinion is, that unless some such measure as the one proposed by the resolution or amendment is adopted, we shall always labor under the difficulty we do now. Gentlemen had rallied out against the original resolution, because it would deprive them of a month to stay here. Why, sir, if the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT] should be adopted, in the two years we should stay as long as we do now. The amendment proposes to limit the long session to four months, and that the short session shall commence the 1st of November; thus allowing, in the two years, eight months for legislation—one-third of our time; and I have no hesitation in saying that that is two months more than we should, in justice to the country, appropriate. Sir, my own opinion is, that three months is long enough for each session, and will afford ample time for the legislation of this country. Considerable had been said during this debate about the compensation of members. Sir, I am of the same opinion now that I was when this subject was before the House in the fore part of the session. Six dollars per day is enough for any man to receive for his services. But he had not understood that this was the object of the gentleman from South Carolina, but to shorten the session; and, if we staid longer than the time presented in the resolution, to reduce it to two dollars per day. Now, sir, suppose the long session to last six months; why, by the alteration proposed, each member would receive six dollars per day on an average, which, in his opinion, would be sufficient to compensate any man for his services. He continued, he was sorry to hear one objection which was raised to the passage of the resolution. It was this, that its effect would strike at the root of the great plans of internal improvement and the protection of home industry. In conclusion, he would answer that by saying, that recent demonstrations of sentiment in this House had evinced that whatever was left undone, the tariff and appropriations would be attended to—any proposition which takes money out of the treasury will be attended to.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, understood the object of the resolution to be the correction of a moral evil, the existence of which was evident. He thought it would be a reflection on the House to contend that it could not transact all the essential business which came before it in four months. The number of bills which were passed at the long sessions, he believed, did not exceed those passed at the short sessions. He referred to the haste with which bills were urged through on the last ten or twelve days of the session. Of this system of legislation he contended there was no necessity, as bills could as well be passed expeditiously in the middle of the session as at its close. He warned new members that they would witness the same scene that old ones had become accustomed to. He believed that the first month of the session, on account of the holidays, was rendered nearly or quite useless; and if the session was to be shortened, it should be by meeting on the first Monday in January, instead of the first Monday in December. The rules of the House did not properly regulate its proceedings. They continued to make the bills the order of the day for to-morrow, while that to-morrow never came. The resolution which they were now discussing, for instance, still occupied the hour devoted to resolutions, to the exclusion of all other business. The judiciary bill had been thrown aside for so long a period, that he really had forgotten what question was in order on its discussion. This, too, [said Mr. S.] is the day on which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] was to have introduced his bill upon the subject of our Indian relations. Mr. S. concluded by expressing his conviction that, if gentlemen would come to the resolution to cut short these interminable debates, lop off the first month of the session, assemble on the first Monday in January, and look forward to the first of May as the desirable period to return to their domestic affairs, the public business would be more faithfully performed, and the deprecatived evil corrected.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, he agreed with his colleague [Mr. STORRS] that the proper mode of shortening the session was to take from the first part of it; but he could not join in the charge which had so frequently been made against this House, particularly of a want of energy and industry. He would defy any member, no matter how long he might have held a seat on that floor, to point to any former session when twenty and thirty bills had been passed in a day in the middle of a session, as was the case on Friday and Saturday last. It seemed to be the particular desire of some members most unjustifiably to find fault with this Congress in distinction of all others. While he was up, he would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT] to modify his amendment so as to fix the termination of the first session, hereafter, at the 15th of April; which was accepted.

Mr. EVERETT accepted the modification.

The previous question was then demanded, and the House ordered the main question to be put.

The main question, being on the passage of the resolution, was then put, and decided in the negative as follows:

TOPOGRAPHICAL SURVEYS.

The bill making appropriations for certain surveys, &c. was then taken up for a third reading.

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved to amend the bill in the clause appropriating money for surveys, by adding a proviso, that the sum appropriated should be expended on works heretofore directed, or which may be directed, by either House of Congress.

Topographical Surveys.

Mr. CLAY expressed a hope that the limitation would not be adopted, and asked for the yeas and nays on the question.

At the suggestion of Mr. McDUFFIE, Mr. CLAY withdrew his call for the yeas and nays, which was immediately renewed by Mr. WICKLIFFE.

The yeas and nays were then ordered.

Mr. ELLSWORTH expressed his hope that the amendment would not be adopted. He reminded the House that it had been customary to pass an appropriation of this kind annually, and he desired that it be applied on the usual principle—that the same discretion which had been hitherto given to the proper department in the disbursement of this money, should still be given to them. He argued against the proposed change as inexpedient, unjust, and unreasonable.

Mr. McDUFFIE repeated the objections he had urged against this limitation at the last session, when a similar proposition was negatived by a vote of four to one. If this limitation should be adopted, every member will have his own peculiar project carried through, or no propositions will pass. Complaint had been made that the works begun were not national, yet it was proposed to compel the Government to complete them instead of taking up others which might be national. It was therefore an unreasonable proposition, and he hoped it would not be adopted.

Mr. WICKLIFFE defended his amendment, on the ground generally of the abuse which the present mode led to, the unimportant nature of the works which it enabled members to be procured to be undertaken, &c.

Mr. MARTIN stated, that, although opposed to the system, he was still more opposed to the amendment, in its present form. If the system was to be continued, he was for leaving its exercise where it was now, to the Executive, and to keep this House as clear as possible of the contention and the agitation which it was calculated to produce here. He then moved to amend the amendment, by striking out "or such as may hereafter be directed by either House of Congress."

Mr. ELLSWORTH thought this proposition was unacceptable. It seemed to contemplate that whenever a proposition for any appropriation for any particular work is made, the subject is to undergo a discussion in this House; and members are to be called on to decide, with the superficial knowledge they must be supposed to possess, on the preference of making a survey for a route here, over that for a route there. He hoped, therefore, that the amendment would not prevail.

Mr. TREZVANT made some remarks against the commitment of a discretion to the departments as to the direction of any surveys. He wished to confine the appropriation to such surveys as have been commenced, and that the House should afterwards decide on the propriety of new ones. He argued at some length in explanation of his views, and hoped the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina would not be adopted.

Mr. TEST here called for the previous question, but the call was not seconded.

Mr. MARTIN explained his own views, so as to remove a misconception which he thought seemed to prevail as to his course.

Mr. HALL opposed the whole system, the amendment, as well as the bill itself. If he took the amendment of Mr. MARTIN, the remainder of Mr. WICKLIFFE's amendment would contain enough to involve all his principles. He could vote for none of the questions proposed.

Mr. MERCER suggested that many surveys had been ordered by Congress, which have not yet been commenced, and the effect of the amendment would be to relieve the Executive of all responsibility whatever.

Mr. TREZVANT said a few words in explanation. Mr. TUCKER moved to strike out the enacting words, and called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

At the suggestion of Mr. McDUFFIE, Mr. TUCKER withdrew his motion to amend.

The amendment moved by Mr. MARTIN to the amendment was then negatived.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR suggested a modification of the amendment so as to strike out the words "either House of," so as to read—shall be directed by Congress.

Mr. WICKLIFFE declined to accept the modification.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR then moved his proposition as an amendment.

Mr. DRAYON stated that his opinion had always been that the act of 1824, authorizing this expenditure for surveys, was unconstitutional. He consequently was opposed to all appropriations for these objects; but he was in favor of the amendment for reasons he stated—the chief of which was, that it would tend to prevent abuses in the execution of the act, and contending that works beginning and ending in the same State could not be deemed national, but many such under the present system had been undertaken.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR enforced the propriety of the amendment he had offered. The vote of this House is the vote of the representatives of the people, while that of the Senate is the vote of the representatives of the States; and he wished to unite both. He declared himself utterly opposed to the whole system, and every scheme, survey, and appropriation under it.

Mr. MERCER advocated the power of the Government to make these surveys, and the practice which had prevailed under that power, denying peremptorily that it had led to any abuses, although the allegation was so often repeated, and arguing that a work commencing and ending in a State might be, and often was, strictly national; many cases of which he cited: amongst others, he maintained that if a line of canals from Maine to Georgia was a national work, any part of that line, however small, is national. The whole work cannot be completed at once; it must be constructed in detail, and in parts. The Buffalo and New Orleans road he considered as national, whether it was cut up in decimal parts, or viewed as a whole. He said he had carefully investigated the practice of the department, and he believed it to be free from abuse. Even in a case which he had four years ago considered the most doubtful, he had subsequently satisfied himself that there was no ground for doubt. To objections on the score of local interests being too influential, he replied that in time of war it was as important a power which regulated the direction of an army, as that which gives the direction of a road. The western part of the State of New York had entirely sprung up under the fostering influence of the late war, as millions had been expended there in consequence of the march of troops there. Yet no one contended that, in that case, the Government should be controlled, lest the local interests of one section should be preferred to those of another.

Mr. AMBROSE SPENCER stated that the question as to the power of the Government to make these surveys was settled by the act of 1824, and that it was useless now to make it a subject of discussion. He was opposed to imposing upon the present administration a limitation which had not been imposed on their predecessors. He declared himself adverse to the amendment to the amendment, as well as to the amendment. He expressed his concurrence in the views which had fallen from the last speaker, and controverted the idea that works confined entirely to particular States were necessarily not national, cases of which he cited.

Mr. IRWIN, of Pennsylvania, expressed his hope that both the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, and that of the gentleman from Virginia, would be rejected.

Mr. MALLARY contended that it was due to the President, who is at the head of the military force, to give to him an entire command over those works which are connected with the military defence of the country. He could, in the exercise of that power, lead to more full and more satisfactory results than we can ever be brought to by listening to the contending claims of conflicting interests in the House. There was no reason for imposing this limitation on the present Executive.

Mr. BARRINGER said, the adoption of the amendment could only lead to a multiplication of surveys; and he argued briefly to show the inexpediency of the amendments. Deeming it useless, however, to consume more time in debate, he demanded the previous question—yeas, 66. The number was insufficient.

Mr. TUCKER asked for the yeas and nays on the amendment of Mr. BARBOUR, but they were refused.

The amendment to the amendment was then negatived: yeas, 72—nays, 96.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. WICKLIFFE, and decided in the negative: yeas, 75—nays, 111.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked for the yeas and nays on the third reading of the bill, which were ordered, and were as follows: yeas, 121—nays, 64.

FORTIFICATIONS, BARRACKS, &c.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole. Mr. WICKLIFFE in the chair, on the bill making appropriations for expenditures in the Engineer, Ordnance, and Quartermaster's Departments.

Mr. DRAYTON moved to insert an appropriation of forty-seven thousand dollars, for the completion of the military road in the State of Maine; which motion was explained by Mr. D., and was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DRAYTON, also, (made as well as the preceding by direction of the Military Committee,) an appropriation of ten thousand two hundred dollars was inserted, for the erection of barracks at Fortress Monroe.

Mr. VERPLANCK moved to strike out the appropriation of twenty thousand two hundred dollars, for the purchase of five and a half acres of land, adjoining the armory at Springfield, in Massachusetts, deeming the price extravagant.

The motion was opposed by Mr. DRAYTON and Mr. BATES, the latter of whom stated facts to show that the price was moderate, considering the general prices and value of land in that village; and the motion was negatived.

Mr. MARTIN made an ineffectual motion to strike out the appropriation of sixteen thousand dollars for a fire-proof armory at Springfield.

A motion was made by Mr. McDUFFIE to strike out an appropriation of five thousand dollars for an acre of land adjoining the armory at Harper's ferry, deeming the price an imposition, which he, for one, would not submit to. That he would rather, if the land was indispensable, resort to the power of the Government to have the land valued and condemned, but he would do without it sooner than submit to such an imposition.

Mr. DRAYTON explained, that the land had on it various wooden buildings, which rented for above three hundred dollars a year, were occupied as grog-shops, and were resorted to by negroes by day and night. These were the reasons which induced a majority of the Committee on Military Affairs to withdraw their original objection to the appropriation.

Mr. MERCER also opposed the motion, and stated, in addition, the value of property at Harper's ferry, from its peculiar situation, to show that the price was not extravagant.

The amendment was agreed to—yeas, 100.

Mr. DRAYTON then moved to insert a clause, making an appropriation of twelve hundred and fifty dollars for the purchase of one-quarter of an acre of the land. The motion was negatived.

There was a discussion also on a motion by Mr. McCOY to strike out the appropriation for arming fortifications, which adds one hundred and fifty thousand dollars per annum to the usual sum of one hundred thousand dollars which is annually appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. DRAYTON explained the necessity for this appropriation.

Mr. MERCER also made some observations on the necessity for the adoption of the original item in the bill. He argued to show the necessity of accelerating the preparations for arming the fortifications now rapidly approaching to completion. It would be better to blow them up than leave them unarmed, to the possibility of their being seized by an enemy, armed, and turned against us.

Mr. BUCHANAN opposed the original motion, and supported the amendment, on the ground that it was an unusual mode of legislation to introduce a new and important appropriation into a bill embracing appropriations only for carrying into effect the settled policy and authorized objects of the Government; and that this rapid arming of our fortifications must render necessary an increase of our standing army.

After an explanation from Mr. DRAYTON, the amendment was agreed to: yeas, 58—nays, 36.

Mr. DRAYTON then moved to insert an appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars.

This motion was opposed by Mr. McCOY and Mr. BUCHANAN, and was supported by Mr. DRAYTON and Mr. MERCER, and was finally negatived: yeas, 63—nays, 67.

Mr. DRAYTON then moved to fill the blank with sixty thousand dollars; which motion was also negatived.

Mr. CROCKETT moved to strike out the item of appropriation for erecting workshops at West Point, two thousand five hundred dollars, which was rejected—yeas, 51.

Mr. SEVIER moved to amend the bill by adding an appropriation for a military road from Arkansas to Missouri; which motion was negatived.

Mr. McDUFFIE moved an amendment, appropriating six hundred dollars for a lithographic press, &c. for the use of the topographical bureau in the War Department; which was likewise negatived.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill and amendments.

THURSDAY, APRIL 1, 1830.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The resolution for setting apart one day in each alternate week for the consideration of business concerning the District of Columbia, moved some days ago, was taken up for consideration.

Mr. POWERS, chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, rose, and rapidly sketched off the reforms wanted in the legislation of Congress for this District. He stated, in few words, the object of each of the bills which have been reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, reviewing them in succession, viz. the bill providing for the appointment of commissioners to revise the laws generally; the bill for putting the penitentiary principle in operation in our criminal laws; the bill authorizing the election, by the people of the District, of a Delegate to Congress; and the bill for such reorganization of the courts of justice, as the committee think to be immediately necessary. All these seemed to him to be matters of pressing necessity, and such as Congress were bound to attend to at the present session. Under these circumstances, as this separate Government of this District, having no government but Congress, had not, so far, at this session, occupied one moment of the time of the House, the committee did not think it unreasonable that two days in each month should be devoted to the concerns of the District.

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

[H. of R.]

If the House should adjourn at the time now proposed, it would, under such a rule, have given but three days of its time to these important concerns. Three days, it was believed, would be sufficient, in this session, if properly used, for the transaction of all its important concerns. Unless some portion of the time of the House was thus set apart, it was doubtful whether a single measure, out of the important ones proposed, would be acted upon at all during the session. He concluded by expressing the hope that, under these views of the subject, the House would consent to the proposition.

Mr. PETTIS said, he was as well disposed towards the people of this District as any member in the House, but he was opposed to this partial legislation. One-twelfth part of the time of the House was asked, at this pressing part of the session, and to the exclusion of all other business, to act on bills introduced by the committee for the benefit of the District of Columbia alone. This Mr. P. could not consent to. He was [he said] somewhat peculiarly situated. For several years there had been no legislation here for Missouri at all; the business of that State had been overlooked, and he had hoped to get something done this session; but the manner in which the business of the House was performed weakened his hopes, and, if the proposition to give a twelfth of its time to District concerns prevailed, the chance would be still more diminished. We go on, [said Mr. P.] day after day, ploughing with the buffalo, to the neglect of all other business; and if the bills introduced by the gentleman [Mr. POWERS] were to have the preference he required, each of which would take much time, little else would be done. He moved to lay the resolution on the table, but withdrew his motion at the request of

Mr. INGERSOLL, who said he was formerly a member of the District Committee, and, when the affairs of that District were before the House, he could not keep his seat without attempting to show its condition, and the necessity of some legislation for it. This spot, [he said] over which Congress possessed exclusive legislation, had had no legislation for twenty-five years. There was no spot within the whole Union, within which legislation was so necessary as these ten miles square. The penal laws remained the same as they were thirty years ago, and the report which had just been read at the clerk's table, showed that, like the laws of Draco, they were written in blood. So crying was this neglect, and so great the necessity of reform, that four years ago Congress ordered the erection of a penitentiary, which had been completed at a cost of one hundred thousand dollars, but as yet it was useless—no law had been passed to give it effect. The Committee on the District had labored diligently to remedy this and the other evils under which the people labored, and they deserved the thanks of Congress, and of the country, for their assiduity. At the last session, he, as a member of that committee, had labored with his colleagues in maturing a system for ameliorating the penal laws here, but, though a bill was reported, they were never able to get it up. Mr. I. dwelt on the anomalous and cruel nature of the laws which prevail in the District—remaining destitute of those improvements which have been made in those of the States around, because there has been no legislation for the District. They are just as they were thirty years ago at the time of the cession. One fact he cited as an instance: Kidnapping is not an offence in the District; stealing a slave is, under the old law; but stealing a free man is not punishable. He also referred to the evils of the slave trade as carried on through the District. A bill was once reported to abate this evil, but Congress could never be got to take it up. He hoped the time asked for the affairs of the District would be granted, and this mass of corruption be swept off.

Mr. PETTIS then renewed his motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. INGERSOLL demanded the yeas and nays. They were taken accordingly, and were, yeas, 47—nays, 120.

Here the hour elapsed, and Mr. MALLARY moved to suspend the rule, but the House refused.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HAYNES in the chair, and took up the bill for the construction of the

BUFFALO AND NEW ORLEANS ROAD.

Mr. COKE, of Virginia, delivered his views in opposition to the bill.

Mr. IRWIN, of Pennsylvania, said, that the remarks which had been made by several gentlemen who had taken part in the debate, had induced him to depart from a resolution he had formed, of merely giving a silent vote in favor of the bill. But [said Mr. I.] as I am not willing that any portion of the people of my native State shall remain under the imputation of being influenced solely by local considerations, regardless of principle and the true interests of the country, in the support which they or their representatives give to the bill, I will ask the indulgence of the committee while I submit some of the views which have been impressed on my mind in relation to it. The constitutional question, which has been so frequently discussed in this House on former occasions, it is not my intention to notice. I consider it deliberately established by successive acts of legislation for a series of years, and by public opinion, by which I do not wish to be understood to mean the opinion of a single congressional district, nor of a State, but that great and abiding opinion of a majority of the people of most of the States of the Union, repeatedly expressed after long deliberation, resulting in a settled conviction that the constitution has given to Congress full and complete control over the subject, limited only by their discretion, in legislating for the public welfare. Here it should be suffered to rest, for the mind of man cannot give it any additional light. It has been said, sir, that, at a former session of Congress, it was only designed to make a national road from this city to New Orleans, but that the friends of the measure, despairing of being able to pass the bill in that shape, determined to enlist other interests, and that the sectional feelings of the people of the interior of Pennsylvania could be brought into action, by extending the road through that State to Buffalo. It was not left merely to inference, but it was broadly asserted that the approbation of the people of Pennsylvania to the measure could be obtained in no other way, and that the national interests would be the least part of their concern. The assertion is unfounded; I trust I may be excused for saying that no part of this Union is less affected by sectional considerations, more patriotic, or more truly devoted to the welfare of their country, than are the people of Pennsylvania. They were among the first to maintain the true doctrine of our republican institutions; they cherish them as the means of individual happiness and national prosperity, and they will struggle long before they will suffer them to be impaired by refined and narrow constructions. The power to make roads and canals for national purposes, they have asserted to belong to this Government in their assemblies to discuss the question, by legislative enactments, and by the votes of their representatives on this floor. For no selfish purpose, sir, but because they believed, and still believe, that the prosperity of the country, if not its very existence, depends upon the exercise of this power. That State has never asked from Congress any thing for works of internal improvement, although she was the first to embark extensively in them; she relied on her own resources, and has expended more money on roads, bridges, and canals, than any other State in this Union. When it is recollected that she has been second only to another State in her contributions to the national revenue; that she has asked for nothing, and got nothing, for works of a local character; when she has pressed upon this Government the necessity of appropriating money for internal improvements of national importance, there will be no room to conclude that her people are influenced by sectional considerations. No, her support to these measures has a nobler origin; deeply impressed with the importance of this Union to their safety and happiness, and believing that its preservation depends mainly upon its facilities for internal commerce, they will always be found in favor of any means by which objects so desirable can be best accomplished. Yet I claim for them no virtue that is not common to their fellow-citizens of other States: for I must believe that the account which some of the gentlemen have given of the means by which certain people have been brought to advocate the bill before us, is drawn from the imagination. True, you find in every community a few who are lost to all sense of public virtue, and whose sordid passions prepare them for corrupt practices. But that any considerable portion of the people, whose districts, as has been said, have no sooner presented to them the golden bait, than they abandon fixed principles, and adopt new doctrines, and that these feelings are communicated to their representatives on this floor, who are moved and governed by them, is what I am not willing to credit. Such suggestions, made in this body, with no better foundation for them than exists, lead to the most injurious consequences. If opinions on constitutional questions are to be bought; if men have become so flexible as to be swayed only by motives which address themselves to their private interests, what security is there for the continuance of our republican institutions? Our whole political edifice rests upon the virtue and intelligence of the people; and, if it be once admitted that all questions of constitutional power may be settled by an appeal to the base and sordid passions of our nature, we shall find, like the foolish man, that we have built our house in the sand, and that in some party tempest it will fall to pieces. But these pictures of supposed changes of opinion have been drawn from the fancy. The great mass of the people; whose interests were to be effected by internal improvements, could not have been informed of any constitutional impediments; and, if they searched to satisfy themselves, they did not find any. In no condition of life are men prone to trouble themselves about matters which do not immediately affect them, particularly such as require labor to understand. But a spirit of enterprise begets a disposition to inquire, and that generally results in the expression of opinions which many mistake for new doctrines in opposition to those which were supposed to prevail. This is the most rational solution for the continued increase of the friends of internal improvement, without imputing to any portion of our people dereliction of principle. To show that the conferring of benefits cannot, in the least, influence members on this floor, when opposed to constitutional scruples or views of expediency, we have the declarations of several gentlemen from Virginia who have taken part in this debate in opposition to the bill. They have said that, if the road were to pass through their farms, they would oppose it; nay, one of them has gone so far as to say, while he complained of the unequal distribution of the public revenues which the system of internal improvement gave rise to, that the rights of his State were violated by an appropriation of money to a company which that State had incorporated for making the Dismal Swamp canal. Can we want stronger evidence of a disinterested spirit which would reject the paternal hand of the Government, which was extended only to confer among its people its benefits and its bounties? If so, there are kindred feelings, I am told, further south, and that at this session we shall have full proof of it. But it is unnecessary to add more to contradict assertions unsupported by evidence.

H. of R.]

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

Virginia, [Mr. BARBOUR] who opened the debate in opposition to the bill, I was forcibly struck with the contrast which they presented to the sound doctrines of the old Virginia school. The Washingtons, the Jeffersons, and the Madisons—the fathers of the republic: While their lessons of political wisdom took deep and permanent root in Pennsylvania, and in most of the States of this Union, they have been fated to be despised and rejected by the modern politicians of the ancient dominion. As early as 1790, President Washington, in fulfilling the constitutional injunction to recommend to Congress such measures as he should judge necessary and expedient, says, “that the safety and interest of the people require that they should promote such manufactures as tend to render them independent of others for essential, particularly military supplies,” and “of giving effectual encouragement as well to the introduction of new and useful inventions from abroad, as to the exertions of skill and genius in producing them at home; and of facilitating the intercourse between distant parts of our country.” Mr. Jefferson, in an unpublished letter to a near relative of my friend and colleague, [Mr. LEPPER], dated in January, 1809, says that he “had lately inculcated the encouragement of manufactures, to the extent of our own consumption at least, on all articles of which we raise the raw material;” that “its enemies say that the iron which we make must not be wrought here into ploughs, axes, hoes, &c. in order that the ship owner may have the profit of carrying it to Europe, and bringing it back in a manufactured form; as if, after manufacturing our own raw materials for our own use, there should not be a surplus produce sufficient to employ a due proportion of navigation in carrying it to market, and exchanging it for those articles of which we have not the raw material.” In 1815, the same gentleman, in substance, repeats the same opinions. Sir, I hope to be pardoned for noticing a subject in this debate which does not legitimately belong to it; but the example was shown by several of the gentlemen who have spoken on the other side. In truth, the enemies of the protecting system in this House have, on several occasions, however unwarranted by the subject in discussion, indulged themselves in no measured language in denouncing the existing tariff. There seems to be a morbid sensibility in the minds of members from the South, on this question, which, at least in my hearing, has hitherto prevented a dispassionate examination of it. Fortunately for its friends, experience has proved that a wiser act was never passed. Our latest advices from abroad have informed us that in every part of Europe active measures are in operation for the protection of their domestic industry. Had we done nothing, therefore, to countervail foreign commercial regulations, our condition would have been worse than colonial vassalage. Gentlemen, in depicting the effects of the tariff policy, have been misled by imaginary evils, for the sake of maintaining favorite theories; we know enough of human nature to be convinced that the pride of opinion, like the pride of authorship, is often the ruling passion, and that, rather than abandon dogmas which men have cherished and maintained from youth to age, they would see the fairest portions of our land visited with decay, ruin, and desolation. To what extravagant lengths have their metaphysical refinements upon constitutional power arrived? They say that we are not authorized to provide for the safety of our navy and mercantile marine, in entering our harbors, by the erection of light-houses, beacons, piers, &c., nor to build safe and commodious harbors for them; that we have no power to promote education, literature, and science, by the appropriation of public money; that we cannot apply the public funds to relieve individual calamity; that we cannot protect our domestic manufactures by impost duties; and, finally, that we have no authority to expend any part of the national treasure in making roads and canals, nor even a right to aid, by appropriations, companies incorporated by a State! Of what value would our Government be to us, stripped of these powers? I am free to declare that it would not answer the great purposes for which it was instituted, that it would be unworthy the affections of the American people, and that the sooner it was dissolved the better.

Permit me, now, to turn the attention of the committee to a better commentary upon the power of this Government to construct roads for national purposes, than all the refined arguments we have heard from the other side. It has not been, I believe, before noticed since the session it was introduced into Congress. It must be taken, considering the source from which it emanated, as conclusive on the constitutional question. In February, 1796, Mr. Madison introduced a resolution in the House of Representatives for the appointment of a committee to report a bill authorizing the President of the United States to cause to be examined, and, where necessary, to be surveyed, the general route most proper for the transportation of the mail between Maine and Georgia, with an estimate of the expense of making said road. On the third of May of the same year, Mr. Madison presented the following bill, which afterwards passed the House without a division:

"Be it enacted, &c. That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be examined, and, where necessary, to be surveyed, the routes most proper for the transportation of the mail between the following places, to wit: Portland, in Maine; Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Wilmington, Baltimore, City of Washington, Alexandria, Fredericksburg, Richmond, Raleigh, Louisville, and Savannah, in Georgia; and that he cause a report of such examination and survey to be laid before Congress, together with an estimate of the expense necessary for rendering said routes the established routes for the transportation of the mail."

The second section appropriates five thousand dollars for defraying the expenses of the examinations and surveys.

It will be seen, sir, that this bill not only provides for surveying the route of a road from one extreme of the then Union to the other, passing through all its principal cities and towns, but it requires an estimate of the expense to be made for rendering the routes mentioned the established routes for the transportation of the mail. It contemplates, in clear language, the construction or making of post roads under the authority of Congress. Let me now ask whether the warmest advocate for internal improvement ever insisted on a greater latitude of constructive power of the constitution than is contained in the principle of this bill. It not only goes the full length of all that we now contend for, but it sustains every position which has been disputed in this House heretofore. It authorizes surveys and the making of roads, and it assumes jurisdiction without the consent of the States. When we consider that this extensive project was introduced but a short time after the adoption of the constitution, and by a man who was chiefly instrumental in its creation, who labored to defend it with as much zeal and ability as any who lived, that it was adopted by a body, without a division, who probably better understood the extent of the powers intended to be granted than any which has succeeded it, will it be believed that it contained an assumption of powers not granted, and that it violated the rights of the States? It has been reserved for politicians of the present day to make this discovery—men, whose ingenuity and eloquence we may admire, but whose nice and subtle distinctions, mystifications, and abstractions, cannot be easily understood by those who pretend to nothing more than plain common sense. For us, who desire nothing more than that the resources of our country shall be developed and brought into full activity, we are content to follow the path which the statesmen of the revolution have sketched, convinced that, by steadily pursuing it, we shall best attain the objects of the social compact.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR] says that the bill under consideration contains a new principle, not known before in this House, and that we are about to take "a new latitude and departure." He considered the Cumberland road as affording no precedent, because it was the result of an agreement between the States of which the Northwestern Territory was composed, and this Government, by which two per cent. arising from the sales of the public lands was to be employed in making roads leading to and through those States. Yet it will be recollected that the gentleman distinctly admitted a position taken by my friend and colleague, [Mr. HEMPHILL] that the consent of the States was not to be regarded, as they could not confer any power on Congress, except in the cases mentioned in the constitution, and that every other compact between them was a nullity. With this admission, I cannot understand how he can attach any importance to the agreement respecting the Cumberland road. By his own showing, it is evident that this Government did not derive its right from that source. How, then, does this bill differ from the bill authorizing the construction of the Cumberland road? and how does it differ from Mr. Madison's bill? But the gentleman, while he professes to be fully aware of the value of good roads and canals, contends not only that the power to make them does not belong to this Government, but that it ought not to belong to it—that they had better be left to the enterprise of individuals or to the States. The gentleman will find but few to go with him on that broad ground, even in his own State. It will be recollected that when the attention of Congress was called to this subject by Mr. Monroe and others, while they admitted that the right already existed to appropriate money in aid of incorporated companies, denied that it extended further; but as it was deemed of essential importance to the welfare of the people that roads and canals should be constructed under the authority of this Government, they strongly recommended an amendment of the constitution, so that it should be expressly granted.

It was apparent that great national works, extending to remote parts of this Union, could not be executed by companies or by States, even if their resources were adequate to them; that rival interests existed every where, each State exerting itself to divert commerce to its own commercial emporium, or to some other point least advantageous to its neighbor State. And even in case of the union of two or more States for this purpose, the common good of the whole Union would be the least object of their thoughts; nay, routes might be chosen positively injurious to the whole. It might happen, too, that distant streams and States could be united by roads and canals, by which, from peculiar localities, the greater part of each State through which they were designed to pass, would not feel interested, rather looking upon injury than benefit as the result, while to the nation at large the connexion would be of the highest importance. For these and other reasons which might be mentioned, no opinion appeared to be better founded than Mr. Monroe's, that the power to make roads and canals, with jurisdiction over them, should reside in the Government. But the gentleman from Virginia has come to a different conclusion, and seems alarmed at the consequences of encroaching upon State rights, and the accumulation of power in the General Government. To me, [said Mr. I.] this feverish excitement about State rights and Executive patronage seems altogether chimerical. Look into the papers published, and to the speeches made in certain conventions before the adoption of the constitution, and you will find the same evil forebodings, and the same alarming apprehensions. And yet we have gone on prosperously in peace, and successfully in war, for more than forty years, without one of those being impaired. How, indeed, could it be otherwise, when every member of this Government, except such as compose the judiciary, returns at short intervals to his respective State? The members of Congress, in which reside all the high powers of sovereignty, bring with them here—State attachments and State pride; they act under a sense of high responsibility to their constituents and to their State; they remain here but for a few months, return, and mix with their fellow-citizens; with them every motive conspires to urge them to resist, not to suffer, an invasion of State rights. Usage and public opinion has limited the term of the Executive to eight years, at the expiration of which he returns to his State. Your judges are scattered over the Union, citizens of their respective States. All of them, presidents, legislators, and judges, have their families, friends, endearments, and attachments in their respective States—their homes—where they find their earthly resting places. Gentlemen talk of our National and State Governments, as if the former were a distinct people, to whom certain powers were conceded, but, not content with their enjoyment, are constantly aiming to enlarge them at the expense of the rights of the latter. But view them as the same people, a portion of whom at stated periods exercise certain delegated trusts which a common feeling of interest urges them to restrict rather than enlarge, and the suggestion will cease to have any force. Equally illusory are the fears of Executive patronage, which the gentleman from Virginia so strongly deprecated. It is common to speak of this; but I ask for proof of its having been exerted under any administration, and, if exerted, with what effect? Do your officers of the army and navy interfere in elections? or have you seen the judges of your courts canvassing for votes to subserve the purposes of the Executive? The most powerful motives that could animate the human heart, existed to sustain the administrations of the elder and younger Adams; but with what effect? What did patronage do in these cases? Sir, it is a mere phantom, which has no terrors for a free and vigilant people. Take one of the eight thousand postmasters that the gentleman from Virginia has spoken of, and see what influence he is able to exercise in any city or town. It will be found, in most instances, that the person so situated can effect less, at any election, than if he had not an office. There is a watchful jealousy among the people, which repels any undue or even active exertions of men in official stations to control or sway the elections. We have nothing to fear from them. As to the unequal distribution of the revenue, which, it is said, the system of internal improvement gives rise to, I answer, that the same may be said of every other branch of public expenditure: fortifications are erected on our coasts and frontiers most exposed to attacks; light-houses, breakwaters, &c. on the sea coast. These, and many other works, do not immediately benefit the interior; but in these and all other erections and improvements, regard is had to the general welfare. Whatever gives life and vigor to the whole system, must be beneficial to its parts; in like manner, the healthful action of the heart communicates its tone to the extremities. We have been told, too, that, by the reduction of duties upon tea and coffee, and certain luxuries of life which do not interfere with our domestic industry, as is proposed by a bill on our table, the revenue will be so much reduced as to leave no surplus beyond the ordinary demands of the Government. But it should be considered that the bills alluded to are prospective in their operation; and even if it were otherwise, I do not apprehend any very great diminution from the proposed measures. The great increase of population must create a proportionate demand. In aid of this, there is a law of political economy which is universally true, that the capacity to buy, from the comparative cheapness of the commodity, increases its consumption; in other words, the reduction of a duty will, in a corresponding ratio, increase the demand. After paying all the ordinary expenses of Government for the current year, and applying eleven million five hundred thousand dollars to the public debt, the Secretary of the Treasury estimates that there will be a balance in the treasury on the first day of January, 1831, of four million four hundred and ninety-four thousand five hundred and forty-five dollars. It is, therefore, apparent that two millions of dollars may, with perfect safety, be applied annually to internal improvements, leaving enough from all the sources of revenue, and the operation of the sinking fund, to extinguish the debt in five years. My constituents have no immediate interest in the road mentioned in the bill; from the nearest part of my district it is at least one hundred and eighty miles. But I advocate it because it is part of a great system which I consider this Government under the most solemn obligations bound to persevere in. The road, from this city to New Orleans, is not a new project; it was earnestly brought into view by Mr. Calhoun in 1818, in support of a bill which he introduced into Congress, to set apart, and pledge as a fund for internal improvement, the bonus and United States' share of the dividends of the National Bank. In a report which the same gentleman made while Secretary of War, it is noticed as one of the prominent national objects, and it has never since been lost sight of by the Committees on Internal Improvements of this House. By cherishing a spirit of concession, and merging all minor considerations in the great one of making a beginning upon the principle contained in the bill, its friends cannot fail to effect its passage. When we reflect upon the amazing extent of our country, the diversity of interests and occupations of its inhabitants, and examine the barriers which its geographical features present to direct and easy intercourse, we must come to the conclusion that it is impossible to bind the different parts together in any other manner than by good roads and canals extending from the centre to the extremities of the Union. By these means we shall be able to preserve the sympathies of our nature, which distance is too apt to sunder.

But we will realize their advantages chiefly during war, when the Government is compelled to rely for most of its revenue upon a system of internal taxation, its ordinary fiscal resources being in a great measure cut off. The effect of this system is to drain the interior of the country of its currency, and to direct it to the seaboard, or to places where troops are collected for the defence of exposed situations on the frontiers. It will be recollected that no part of the interior of the United States was, during the late war, exempted from this evil; it operated peculiarly hard in the western part of Pennsylvania; specie in fact disappeared, and a miserable paper currency was substituted for it, flooding the country, and, with its natural tendency for depreciation, ruining thousands of the best part of our population—the farmers, the honest yeomanry of the country, who, in such a state of things, are always the greatest sufferers. It is the part of prudence to guard, as far as practicable, against a recurrence of so much suffering and calamity. We cannot, it is true, prevent the drain of our currency, that is the inevitable effect of direct taxation; but we can, in a great degree, mitigate its effects, by giving to our people cheap and easy means of transporting their produce and stock to market; to that market where troops may be assembled, and where there is the greatest public expenditure. If you deny them these means, you expose them to incalculable injuries, it will be impossible to satisfy the tax gatherer; judgments and executions will speedily follow; but all are nearly in the same situation; and where are the purchasers to be found? The earnings of years of honest industry will be swept off in a moment, for a sum sometimes insufficient to pay the cost of collection—always vastly disproportioned to the value of the property, either to enrich the cunning speculator, or to add to the already overgrown wealth of some nabob, or to increase the public lands and stock to remain unproductive, until better times shall enable them to sell for sums equal to their claims. A Government expressly instituted to promote the happiness and welfare of all its citizens, should provide in a time of peace, when its resources are abundant, against such ruinous consequences. In this way it will best secure the lasting attachment of the people.

The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. COKE] in speaking of the probable expense of the proposed road, said that the Cumberland road cost the Government fifteen thousand dollars per mile. He has fallen into an error. The whole distance of the road is one hundred and thirty-five miles; its aggregate cost one million seven hundred and two thousand three hundred and ninety-five dollars, which is equal to twelve thousand six hundred and ten dollars a mile. At a proper time, I will, I trust, be able to show to the House that no sum of money of equal amount has ever been expended with greater advantage to the country. But it is proper to say that at the time this road was commenced, this Government had no experience in the business, few possessed the requisite skill for it; then, and for many years afterwards, provisions were dear, and the wages of labor near one hundred per cent. beyond its present amount. What added greatly to the cost of this road, is the number of bridges, some of which are built in a style of superior and expensive workmanship, exhibiting monuments of architectural skill not surpassed in any part of the Union. The continuation of the Cumberland road from Wheeling to Zanesville, which is made upon the McAdam plan, and is said to be the best road in the United States, cost, I am informed, about six thousand dollars a mile. But the expenditure upon works of this nature is of secondary consequence. If a harbor is found necessary for the safety and convenience of our shipping, if a fortification is wanting for our defence, the expense of constructing them would not be regarded. There is a paramount duty which the Government owes to its citizens, compared to which, gold and silver should weigh but as dust in the balance. They claim from it protection at any price; and they ask the same measure of justice, I will not call it liberality, in making such improvements as the situation of the country admits of and requires, which State and individual enterprise is unequal to, and which are strictly of a national character.

The perseverance in this system of internal improvements, it has been said, will give rise to a claim of jurisdiction by the United States over the roads they make, which will end in the erection of toll-gates, and the enforcing of penalties not by State authority. Claiming, as I do, for this Government, the right to make roads and canals without the consent of the States, it must follow that, after they are constructed, it has a complete right to preserve them by such means as it chooses to select. If I am right in assuming, for I have already said that I do not mean to argue it, that the constitution has given to Congress the principal power, the incident must follow; nor is it at all probable that any injurious consequences are likely to arise from the exercise of it. The authority to establish post offices and post roads impliedly confers the right to protect the transportation of the mail by the imposing of penalties. For this purpose, various laws have been passed, and punishments have been inflicted, without any complaint from a State, and, as I trust, without injury to it. Nor would any greater evil happen by punishing a man in the United States' courts for an injury done to the road. Offences of this kind would be of rare occurrence: when it was known that the presence of vigilant gatekeepers would probably prevent escape, and that speedy punishment would inevitably follow, little mischief would be done. There is scarcely an instance of an indictment in our State courts for injuries done to roads belonging to corporations, and the reason that prevents their occurrence would apply to a road laid out under the authority of the United States. Besides, there could be no valid objection to conferring jurisdiction on the State courts to punish transgressors. Congress gave them power to entertain suits, to collect the internal revenue, and to enforce penalties under a clause in the constitution, declaring it the supreme law of the land, and that the judges of the State courts should be bound thereby. This power, I admit, was by some of the States disputed; but surely it would be going too far to say that evils were likely to arise from the exercise of it. And if there should be a disposition in any State to refuse the jurisdiction, offenders would have no right to complain if they were sent to the United States' courts for trial. Seldom, indeed, would there be occasion for such a proceeding; but if a case should arise, demanding it, is it likely the criminal would talk of its hardship? And, if not, who would be quixotic enough to complain for him? The jurisdiction of the United States over their roads, whether they should exert it by direct appropriations to keep them in repair, or by the erection of toll-gates, cannot be a cause of the least apprehension to the States, no more than they now feel from the punishment of a mail robber. It is impossible that injury can arise from it.

The gentlemen from Virginia who have spoken on the other side of the question, have indulged themselves in a warmth of feeling and an asperity of remark not warranted, in my judgment, by the occasion. If the purposes of the bill should be answered, or if the system, of which it is part, should be pursued, the design is of the most laudable character, and entitled to no common praise; the end, the development of national resources, the promotion of social intercourse, the diffusion of substantial benefits—in a word, the prosperity of the confederacy. Yet it has been received as if some signal calamity was about to be inflicted, carrying in its train famine and pestilence and desolation. Are they afraid that the march of the system will realize all we hope and all we predict for it; and that "their occupation will be gone?" If, sir, I mistake not the "signs of the times," a great revolution is going on in public opinion, in the South, on this question; and the day is not very remote, when Virginia will concede to this Government all that the most sanguine friends of internal improvement could desire. One of her distinguished statesmen, now a member of this House, has for years devoted his time and talents to the cause. Every day furnishes new evidence that his patriotic fellow-citizens are yielding the prejudices that would lock up the bounties which a beneficent Providence has so profusely scattered over our land. He merits the lasting gratitude of his countrymen, the richest reward of a public benefactor.

The productions of our country, which soil and climate have already made so various, are becoming daily more diversified, ensuring, at no distant day, a home supply of most of the luxuries as well as the necessities of life. An important advantage which this view of our condition and prospects gives rise to, is, that the different parts of our Union will be made dependant on each other—an invariable effect of mutual wants. Nothing, therefore, demands from us higher regard or more deliberate consideration, than the means of uniting our whole people into one great commercial family.

But it is unnecessary to dwell longer upon the beneficial consequences of an extended system of internal improvements; they must be familiar to the members of this committee. I have endeavored to avoid noticing the points which have been urged by others in support of the bill; and having reason to fear that the committee is already fatigued by a long discussion, I will conclude with thanking them for their attention.

Mr. MONELL next rose. He said he had waited until this late period of the debate on the bill, in the hope and expectation that some one of his colleagues, more competent than himself, would give to the committee the views which he knew a large majority of the delegation of New York, in unison with himself, entertained upon this question. No one [said Mr. M.] has felt disposed to do so; and as I cannot consent that the vote on this bill should be taken without the expression of an opinion from the State I have the honor, in part, to represent, I have, reluctantly, obtruded myself upon the attention of the committee.

As I am the warm friend of internal improvement by the States, and have, at all times, and on all occasions, whether in public or private life, supported every measure which I believed would benefit the citizens of my native State, it is necessary that I should give the reasons that will influence my vote on the present bill. Sir, the State of New York, unaided by the General Government, has advanced far in this system. She has connected her northern and western lakes with the majestic Hudson, and I trust will continue to progress until she extends its blessings to every portion of her citizens. Although she has advanced far, and elevated her character to a prominent station among her sister States, she has not done half that the wants of her citizens require, or the means she possesses will authorize. My immediate constituents are now anxiously looking to their legislature for that justice they believe themselves entitled to—an improvement along their lovely valley, which will place them on the level with other portions of the State. I trust they will not be disappointed.

Soon after this nation passed through a second war of independence with honor and renown, the State of New York, suffering as she had in that contest in blood and treasure, and believing herself entitled to the favorable notice of Congress, from the aid and support she had given to strengthen the arm of the General Government, applied for aid to enable her to prosecute the great works of internal improvement she had long conceived, but which were retarded by the breaking out and continuing of that war. What was she told by this Government? Although her good and faithful service was admitted, her losses and privations appreciated, yet it was unconstitutional to aid in the construction of roads and canals. She submitted to the decision; and, nothing daunted, rested upon her own resources to accomplish that which her citizens had willed should be accomplished. For one, I rejoice that she is not indebted to this Government for aid. By your refusal, the resources of the State have been developed; the patriotism of the people exhibited; the sound hearts and willing hands of her citizens enlisted to elevate her character, and place her upon an eminence that her extensive possessions and fertile soil intended she should assume.

What was unconstitutional when New York applied for aid, has, by the change of time and of men, become constitutional now. By the construction given to the constitution by modern statesmen, all power is vested in this Government. The doctrines contended for in former days are exploded, new ones have taken their place; and, under them, this Government is extending its influence over every part and portion of what was once considered independent State sovereignty: the rights of the States are merged in this grand consolidated Government. I will not enter into the discussion of the abstract constitutional right of this Government to make roads and canals in the several States, without the consent of the States or the people. It has been assumed and exercised so often, that, until some express provision to the contrary shall be made in the constitution, it is worse than useless to question the power. The advocates of the right do not claim it by express grant, but by implication and construction of different parts of that instrument. It is claimed under the power to provide for the common defence and general welfare; under the power to regulate commerce among the several States, and with the Indian tribes; under the power to establish post offices and post roads. I have always doubted whether this Government, under any or all of these powers, could exercise the right of making roads and canals.

On more occasions than one, have I listened to the arguments of the ablest men of the nation, on this much disputed, nice question of constitutional law. Although I will not discuss the question of abstract right, I may be permitted to deny the expediency of its exercise by this Government. The exercise of this, and all other constructive rights, claimed by this Government, should be narrowly watched by the representatives of the people. Our duty to our States and our constituents requires it at our hands; and yet it appears to me, that, when we assemble here as the Congress of the United States, we forget home—we forget State rights, and lose State feeling. Our whole thoughts are directed to the mighty power of this all absorbing and controlling Government, regardless of the feelings of our constituents, or interests of the States; we exercise not only all the powers given to us by express grant, but every other which, by implication or construction, can be tortured into a right. I beseech gentlemen to pause and reflect. If this Government does possess the power contended for by its advocates, let it be discretely exercised, and only on acknowledged great national objects.

Under the power to regulate commerce among the several States, and to lay imposts and duties, this Government assumed the right to compel the canal boats on the New York canals to pay transit duty. In 1824 or 1825, orders were issued by the Treasury Department to the collector at Buffalo, to enforce the collection of duties. I well remember the feeling created in New York; her citizens, from one end of the State to the other, were prepared to resist what was considered as an encroachment upon State rights; even her legislative halls resounded with the language of resistance, and a perseverance at that time, on the part of this Government, would have brought that State in direct collision with the General Government. Strong protests were entered by the representatives in Congress, from New York, against the assumed power, and great exertions were made by the Governor of the State to procure a withdrawal of the order. It was countermanded, but the right to enforce the collection of duties was not surrendered; it was suspended for the time being, to be enforced whenever the will of this Government shall direct. You have established your ports of entry in every part of her State—at Buffalo, Rochester, Sackett's Harbor, and I know not how many other places—upon every stream and rivulet—upon tide waters and inland lakes—in every city and town that you please to consider commercial; swarms of officers, to execute the laws and collect the revenue, are stationed among the people. Under the power to regulate commerce, and lay imposts and duties, you claim, and may, at some future day, enforce, the power to collect duties on every canal made by State authority; and what is to prevent you? The broad and unlimited construction of constitutional power claimed, will cover every act of oppression, and usurpation of State rights; thus gradually, but certainly, will every vestige of State rights and State interests be swallowed up by the constructive powers of the General Government. Under the power to lay imposts and duties, to regulate commerce, and to promote the general welfare, the whole revenue of State canals may be claimed. Now your treasury is full, and it is not needed; but let war exhaust it, let commerce be impaired, or, what is most probable, your funds squandered in visionary schemes of internal improvement, and the particular welfare of the States must surrender to the general welfare of this Government. The States must stand in the relation to the United States that individuals do to the States—bound to yield a portion of what they have for the general welfare. Sources of revenue, which they fondly hoped would support their own Governments, and enable them to extend the blessings of internal improvement by their own authority to every portion of their citizens, will be diverted from their proper channels, and poured into the treasury of this Government. Can New York, consistent with her honor or her interests, submit to such degradation? Is Pennsylvania, with her numerous canals, prepared to surrender all to this Government? I trust not. Sir, where is the remedy? I answer here, in this hall. We must halt in our course—we must confine this Government within its primeval legitimate bounds—we must restore it to the powers that were exercised under it in the days of Jefferson's administration.

It is contended that the power to construct roads and canals is given by the clause in the constitution authorizing Congress to establish post offices and post roads. Great pains have been taken to give us the definition of the word establish. Dictionaries have been consulted—Walker, Ainsworth, and others. It is defined to mean “to erect, to make,” &c. We have heard labored arguments to show us, because the meaning of the word establish is defined to be “to make,” that Congress has the power to make post roads. Sir, I will not say that these words may not be tortured into such construction, nor offer any argument on the constitutionality of the doctrine. Yet I must be permitted to doubt that any such power, under these words, was intended by the framers of the constitution to be given to Congress. The plain and obvious meaning of that clause is that which is yearly exercised by Congress—the establishment of post routes on roads erected and made by the people, and on which, for public convenience, it is thought necessary to transport the mail. In the remarks I have made, I have endeavored to show to the committee the inexpediency of Congress exercising all the powers which, by construction or implication, are claimed as belonging to this Government; and particularly as such exercise affects the rights and interests of the States. As a further illustration of my views, I will suppose my colleague, who resides at Buffalo, to offer to this House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Buffalo to Albany, by the way of the Erie canal.”

It is referred to the committee, at the head of which is the honorable gentleman from Kentucky. Congress having the right to establish post offices and post roads, and waters navigable, or made navigable, being considered highways, the reasoning follows the premises, that Congress has the power to establish a mail route upon the Erie canal. It has been decided that the Hudson river is an arm of the sea, and jurisdiction has been so far extended over the waters of New York, as to establish ports of entry on the western lakes, the Erie canal connecting the tide waters of the Hudson with the waters of Lake Erie; it, therefore, becomes necessary that commerce should be carried on between the States. A law is passed, in obedience to the resolution; and a boat is started at Albany, on the tide waters, with the “United States’ mail,” in capitals, upon her stern. She approaches the first lock, and is hailed “what boat is that?” “The Congress of the United States.” “Who is her commander?” “General Welfare.” “What is the object of her voyage?” “Regulating commerce among the several States and with the Indian tribes, transporting the United States’ mail, and conveying troops to the northern lakes.” The collector would say, this canal is the property of the State of New York; it was made by the exertions of her own citizens without any foreign aid, and you cannot pass without the payment of toll. To which “General Welfare” would reply that Congress has power to regulate commerce and establish post offices and post roads; a post route has been established on this canal, and you will not presume to interrupt the United States’ mail. The people of New York look to the law for protection and decision of all disputed claims. On the return of “General Welfare,” he is arrested in our State courts. I will not trouble the committee with a long detail; the State courts decide in favor of the toll gatherer; it is carried up to the Supreme Court of the United States. I need not give you the decision. When did State decisions or State rights succeed in opposition to the laws of Congress, or the constructive powers of this Government? Let Kentucky, Ohio, New York, and other States answer.

I am opposed to the exercise by Congress of this disputed right on another ground: it is unequal and unjust in its operation. During the last year, disregarding fractions, there was received into your treasury twenty-four millions of dollars; for all the ordinary purposes of Government, twelve millions are sufficient; and, with proper economy, that sum need not be expended. You have then a surplus fund of twelve millions beyond the amount required for the expenses of Government, to be scrambled for in this hall, and expended, according to present doctrines, in internal improvement. You have two hundred and thirteen members from the States, and three delegates from territories; divide this amount into two hundred and thirteen districts, and you will give annually to each congressional district fifty-six thousand dollars. By this division, New York, with her thirty-four members, would be entitled annually to two millions of dollars. Pennsylvania, with her twenty-four members, to one million four hundred and forty-four thousand. Virginia, with her twenty-two members, to one million two hundred and thirty-two thousand. Will any course of legislation here give to these States a fair proportion of the surplus funds by way of internal improvement? Certainly not. This miserable pittance to New York, of a road from Buffalo to the State line of Pennsylvania, is but a sorry return for the four millions she pays annually into your treasury. As it is the first, so for many years it will be the last boon that will be offered for her two millions annual surplus in your treasury.

Give to New York, to be applied by her legislature, one-half of her just proportion of this surplus fund. Let it be placed in the treasury of her own State, and in ten years she will extend the blessings of her own system of improvement to every village and hamlet in her State, and gladden the hearts of her people; it will be expended in useful works, in national objects, and promote the general welfare of the people.

I come now to the question of the utility of this gigantic project of a grand land communication from Buffalo to New Orleans, and must say that, to my mind, it is the most extravagant and visionary one that ever was presented to the deliberate judgment of a representative assembly. It is to be made through the interior of the country, fifteen hundred miles in length, and from its commencement at Buffalo, the first seaboard, the first commercial place it touches is the city of Washington, a distance of some four hundred miles. Can many men believe that the trade from Buffalo, or any part of New York, will be diverted from the city of New York by this road? or will Pennsylvania or Maryland prefer Washington for a market to their own Philadelphia and Baltimore? Look to the improvements of New York, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, their railroads and canals, and the most visionary must be satisfied that this contemplated road cannot be used for commercial purposes. It is said, by its friends, that it will be useful in time of war to march troops to the frontiers. I trust we shall not need it for that purpose for many years to come; and if we should, New York desires troops from Washington to defend her frontier. No, sir, there is no beneficial purpose for which this road can be used; it will be a lasting monument of a nation's folly, and receive the worst curse which an Irishman can bestow upon his enemy—the grass will grow upon its surface. Again. What is to become of the road after it is made? Do you intend to place toll gates upon it? That power has not yet been assumed upon your Cumberland road. But suppose you should assume jurisdiction over State soil, and scatter your toll gatherers over the States; what will you receive? Not one per cent. You cannot keep it in repair by tolls. What next? The Government must appropriate, annually, one million of dollars to repair it. By the bill fifteen hundred dollars per mile are appropriated; but no friend of it will pretend that is all that will be asked. Let the faith of the nation be pledged for its construction, and you will be required, annually, to appropriate money for its completion, until it will cost as many thousands as hundreds are now asked. Will the States, through which it passes, take it off your hands, and keep it in repair? No. The States know it will not yield revenue sufficient to do so. They will tell you it is your own sickly bantling, and your faith is pledged to support it.

It has been said out of this hall, that this is a part of the "American system;" and I have been urged, as a friend to that system, to support this bill. It is called the pioneer bill, in the train of which numerous others are to follow.

If by the "American system" is meant a system of laws which shall be for the benefit of the American people, and, as nearly as may be, operate equally and justly, then am I its friend and advocate; but if by the system is meant that I am bound to support every wild and visionary road project that the imaginations of gentlemen here or elsewhere may present to the consideration of Congress, I must be permitted to dissent, and enter my protest. As a member of the Committee on Manufactures, I cordially agree to the resolution submitted to the House, "that it was inexpedient at this time to revise the tariff law of 1828." I then believed, and now believe, that justice to the manufacturers and sound policy required the suppression of further legislation at this time. These are, however, articles which have become necessities of life from their common use, such as tea, coffee, silk, &c., which are not grown or manufactured in this country, or, if so, to a very limited extent, and not interfering with the domestic industry of the nation. By reducing the duties on the articles I have mentioned, you will relieve the people from several millions of indirect taxation, and retain in your treasury more than sufficient to meet the current expenses of the Government.

There are two situations in which Governments, like individuals, are frequently unjust: in adversity, with a heavy debt hanging over them, and in prosperity, suddenly and unexpectedly acquired; in the one case, pressed to discharge claims out of their power to meet; they prevaricate, and refuse justice when it is due; in the other, their funds are profusely squandered and their money lavished upon unimportant and useless objects. The latter is the present situation of this Government. You have an overflowing treasury, and you know not what to do with your surplus funds. Now, sir, as I am one of those who do not consider a national debt to be a national blessing, I propose to discharge your national debt—pay off every shilling—take up the last bond; it will be the brightest star in the galaxy of your renown. Exhibit to the world the bright example of a nation, not sixty years old, having passed through two expensive and lengthy wars, and free of debt. When that shall be accomplished, (and we are assured it will be in a few years,) our manufacturers will have acquired strength sufficient to compete with their foreign opponents, and will themselves unite in the propriety of a gradual but certain reduction of duties until the revenue shall only be equal to the necessities of the Government, and the people relieved from heavy burdens.

Mr. ANGEL said it was with great diffidence he rose to address the committee. It was his first attempt to speak upon that floor, and it was with much difficulty he had raised his courage to the speaking point. We have been several days [said Mr. A.] engaged in the discussion of this bill. I have listened with strict and painful attention to the arguments urged in favor of its passage. I have witnessed, with astonishment and with alarm, the ardent zeal with which its friends are hurried forward. Reluctant as I have been to engage in this discussion, I could not sit here quietly, and in silence see the screws turned upon the people. I could not see burdens unjustly and unwarrantably imposed upon my constituents, without protesting against it.

I consider this system of legislation cruel, unjust, and oppressive. I consider it as fraught with the most dangerous tendency, and as leading to the most disastrous consequences. My feelings are such, that I cannot repress them when I see the fruits of honest industry about to be coined into dollars and cents, and squandered by a profigate hand upon projects which are useless and idle. I have prepared an amendment to this bill, which I intend to offer at a proper time, if the motion to strike out the first section does not prevail. If gentlemen are determined to force the bill through, right or wrong—if they are determined to plunder the treasury, and pursue a course of public rapine, I feel anxious that the State of New York should not participate in the disgrace. I believe this is the first attempt of this Government to force her system of road-making into that State. The small section of this road which is to be located within her limits, appears to be intended as an offer of earnest-money, to bind her to the unhallowed compact. I protest against the whole system, and particularly against this attempt to contaminate that State. Should this bill pass in its present shape, I should consider the intrusion into our territory as a bane to our prosperity, a poison to our happiness, and the destruction of our tranquility. As soon as an opportunity shall offer, I will move to amend the bill by striking out the words "Buffalo, in the State of New York," and inserting "the northern boundary of the State of Pennsylvania." This amendment would exclude New York from the bill and from its contamination. We ask not, nor do we need, your aid in the construction of our roads and canals. We desire you to confine yourself to your proper sphere of legislation, and not to interfere with the internal regulations of our State. We will willingly and cheerfully pay all the taxes and bear all the burdens which you may constitutionally impose upon us; we will not rebel—we will raise no insurrection—we will not threaten a dissolution of the Union; but when you oppress us by your unjust, unauthorized, and partial legislation, we will tell you of it. We will boldly and fearlessly protest against your encroachments, and we will not withhold our remonstrances when you extend the arm of oppression over us. We will tell you of our wrongs; as an independent State, we will assert our rights; and we will never hang about your halls of legislation, in the character of supplicants and beggars, watching for the crumbs that may fall from your table.

Following the example of gentlemen who have preceded me in opposition to this bill, I will refrain from discussing the constitutional power of this Government over the subject of internal improvement. The arguments upon that subject have been worn thread-bare; they have been again and again repeated; the subject has been exhausted in the hands of able men, and I feel myself incompetent to shed additional light upon the question. The omission to discuss the constitutional question in this debate appears to have been assumed by the friends of the bill as the giving of a cognovit to their claim of constitutional power. Sir, I wish those gentlemen expressly to understand me as not yielding my assent to their constitutional doctrines. I wish them to understand that I sign no cognovit to their unfounded claim, but that I insist that if this bill becomes a law, that law will be the offspring of usurped authority.

Gentlemen have said that Congress, by its enactments, has settled the constitutional power of the Government in relation to internal improvements. Can Congress confer a new power? Can Congress rule the constitution? That instrument was designed to control the powers of Congress. Can one act of usurpation be pleaded as authority to justify the commission of another? No. The constitution remains what it was in the beginning—it is the same now that it was at the time of its ratification by the States. It remains unaltered, nor can it be altered but by the consent of three-fourths of the States. For that instrument I entertain the highest veneration. I will not suffer myself to trample upon its authority. Each infraction of its provisions by Congress is a signal for the downfall of our liberties.

This bill is entitled “a bill for constructing a road from Buffalo, in the State of New York, by the way of Washington, to the city of New Orleans.” When I look into the provisions of this bill—when I see the stretch of authority there attempted—when I consider the profligate expenditure of money it proposes—when I reflect upon the burden it casts upon the people—when I view its partiality, its cruelty, its injustice, and its usurpation, and compare all with the constitutional powers of this Government, the title strikes me as being inappropriate. The title is wrong. It should be entitled “a bill to construct a road from the liberties of the country, by the way of Washington, to despotism.”

It is not a road which the interest of the country calls for; the public good does not require it. Gentlemen have said it was necessary for the safe and easy transportation of the mail, for the marching of troops, for commercial intercourse, for the advancement of national prosperity, and the promotion of the general welfare; but when you contrast its advantages with the principles upon which it is to be constructed, with the cost of its construction and perpetual repairs, it looks more like a road to ruin than a road to ease and safety. I have an abhorrence to this species of legislation that I cannot overcome; it has grown out of long reflection and a careful consideration of the subject. Its tendency is pernicious; it begets collision and strife; it produces heart-burning and ill blood between different States and sections of the Union. These effects do and will unavoidably attend it. If, in estimating the consequences, I have come to an erroneous conclusion, I have to regret it. The correctness of my conclusion appears to be supported by the sensitiveness manifested by gentlemen in this House whenever this subject is agitated. Do we not see the warmth of feeling and heat of temper it elicits? Its discussion calls up the image of discord, and exhibits an acrimony of feeling and temper, which spends itself in accusing invective and keen reply. It should be our business here to harmonize, and not to distract; we should avoid those subjects which set in motion the discordant feelings of sectional interests. It should be our aim to strengthen the cord of union, and, by a kind and conciliating exercise of our legislative functions, secure the confidence and attachment of the people and of the States.

Partial appropriations beget jealousy and distrust, and destroy confidence in Government. The people will not rest quietly under oppression, when they see the fruit of their hard earnings bestowed upon objects in which they have no interest, and which are in themselves worse than useless. They will complain; their attachments will be alienated, and the federal power become odious.

This bill appropriates fifteen hundred dollars per mile for the construction of this road; the length of the road is great enough to swell the sum appropriated to two million five hundred thousand dollars. This is but the beginning of the expenditure. This sum bears about the same proportion to the ultimate cost of construction, repairs, &c. when the whole shall be completed, as the title page of a book does to the whole volume. This two and a half millions is but a single instalment, the payment of which is to be repeated year after year, by appropriation after appropriation, through a series of years, to terminate the Lord knows where. I have not heard it contended, even by the friends of the bill, that the proposed appropriation will cover the cost of the work. From the description given of the country over which the road is to pass, the streams that intersect its course, the swamps and the quagmires which lie in its way, it is evident that the cost per mile will far exceed the sum per mile expended upon the Cumberland road. The length of the Cumberland road now completed falls short of one-sixth the distance embraced by the road under consideration, and our statutes tell us that upwards of three millions have been expended upon that work.

This two and a half millions is to be taken from the avails of the revenue. Nearly one-half the revenue is collected at the city of New York: the citizens of that State, by the consumption of articles subject to duties, pay about one-sixth part of the whole revenue. The appropriation in the bill will impose a tax of at least four hundred thousand dollars upon the State of New York, which must be taken from the pockets of her citizens. The fruit of their labor, under the screwing operations of this Government, must be taken from them, and expended upon this sublime and magnificent road; a road which they will never travel, and which, whilst it forms a drain upon their purses, will never return a farthing into them. The passage of this bill will say to the citizens of New York, “pay four hundred thousand dollars as a tribute to our power, and prepare yourselves to meet future exactions of a similar character, when we see fit to make them.”

The sum to be extracted from the State of New York, by this single appropriation, is sufficient in amount to enable that State, could she control it, to accomplish some of her most useful and favorite plans of internal improvement, and this is to be bartered away for a few miles of a great national road, cutting through a corner of her territory.

Let any gentleman look, for a moment, at the operation of this scheme, and then tell me whether he will have the hardihood to ask a New Yorker to vote for this bill. No, sir, I will not violate the public trust reposed in me: I will not prostitute my vote to the surrendering of the rights of the State. I will resist this attempt to force the shackles upon her. Were this a work of utility, and did there exist a reasonable prospect of its advancing the general welfare, the hardship would not be so great; but I repeat what my colleague [Mr. MOWELL] has said, the project is wild, visionary, idle, and useless.

A few years ago, the State of New York applied to this Government for assistance in constructing her canal. Her then contemplated work was of a national character; it was no less than the connecting, by a navigable communication, of the waters of the great western lakes with the Hudson river, and uniting navigable waters extending from the Atlantic two thousand miles into the interior. What was your answer to this application? Notwithstanding the important link this work was to form, notwithstanding the increase of commerce it was to create, and notwithstanding the vast facilities it was to afford, you, in your wake and other operations, told her that you had not the constitutional power to appropriate the funds of the nation to purposes of internal improvement. New York was satisfied with your answer; she neither murmured nor complained. She had too much patriotism, and too just a sense of your limited authority, to press you to a violation of that sacred compact which forms our bond of union. Taking you at your word, she believed you had decided in good faith upon her application, and she believed that your decision would stand as a controlling precedent in all similar cases. Upon the faith of this understanding, she resorted to her own energies, and, through a wise, prudent, and persevering policy, she has accomplished her grand design, and astonished the world by her success. She has taxed herself for this improvement: her own resources have met the current expense, and this Government has not been annoyed by beggarly applications for her relief. Whilst she has been expending twenty millions of dollars for these objects, and resting upon her own means to extinguish the cost, you have been lavishing the national funds upon interior projects in other sections of the Union; the utility of all of which combined, will not compare with what she has effected.

Since the wisdom of this Government has fathomed the depths of its power, reversed its solemn decision, and entered the field of internal improvement, New York has been undergoing a double taxation. She has met the demands for her own improvements, and been cruelly compelled to pay for the one-sixth of yours. Accumulating burdens oppress her; she finds her hands tied, and her treasury exhausted. She is compelled to impose a direct tax upon her citizens, to meet the current expenses of her Government, and to suspend the prosecution of some of her most favorite works. In this embarrassing state of her finances, and whilst deploring her want of means necessary for the further prosecution of her favorite plans; you threaten, in addition to your former exactions, to rifle her of four hundred thousand dollars by this bill, and to perpetuate your oppression.

Sir, I hope the motion to strike out the first section of this bill will prevail: if it does not, I will offer the amendment I mentioned, at the earliest opportunity.

As a representative from the State of New York, I protest against the power of this Government to pass this bill into a law. I protest against its partiality, and against its prodigal waste of the public treasure. New York has patiently and quietly borne all the burdens you have cast upon her. Her attachment to the Union forbids the thought of estranging herself from you. She asks you to return to those principles which governed your councils in deciding her application.

If you have a surplus in your treasury, she asks you to apply it to the payment of your national debt, and when that shall have been done, if a surplus still remain, she asks you for a just and equal distribution.

Should you refuse this request, and continue your present system of legislation, regardless of her rights, to say the least of it, she will take it most unkindly.

Mr. PETTIS now withdrew the motion which he made some days ago, to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, having at first made it to enable gentlemen to discuss the general merits, free of the amendments proposed.

Mr. CRAIG, of Virginia, regretted that the motion was withdrawn, as he thought it desirable to see whether there was a majority for the bill, before the amendments were taken up.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, renewed the motion to strike out the enacting clause, and proceeded to offer his reasons for being opposed to this bill, although now and always an advocate of the constitutional power of internal improvement.

Mr. BOULDIN said, he had no prepared speech to make on the subject; he had no note of what had been said on it by others; but the deep interest felt by those who sent me here, [said Mr. B.] in the question now under consideration—an interest felt by them in common with all the growers of cotton, rice, and tobacco, in this Union, forbids that I should give, entirely, a silent vote. The evils, both moral and political, which must and will arise from carrying the principle of this into practical effect, from executing a general scheme of internal improvement, have been set forth so clearly by my colleague, [Mr. BARNUM] the inexpediency of the proposed measure proved by arguments so strong and clear, that nothing would be needed to exemplify, extend, or apply his views, were I able to execute such a task. And as it regards the road now proposed, from Buffalo, by the way of Washington, to New Orleans, if any thing had been wanting to prove its utility, I had almost said its absurdity, when compared with its cost, the same has been most amply supplied by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. STORRS] who, though a friend to the principle of the bill, proves that the measure itself is any thing else rather than wisdom. I have but a single additional view of this case to present to this committee. Sir, my constituents, together with the growers of two-thirds of the whole exports of this Union, have regarded and do regard the proceedings of the present Congress with much anxiety. Upon their minds, the conviction that an unequal share of the public burdens are laid on them, is deep rooted; it is an opinion fixed as fate, it has been well and long examined; every fact and circumstance belonging to it have been viewed and reviewed, patiently and diligently, and have been presented, here and elsewhere, in a light so clear, that, as it appears to me, nothing but the potent effect of fear or supposed interest could prevent the majority (to whom I now address myself) from seeing it as it is. And though I may be truly told that interest has as binding an effect on one side as the other, the very fact that we are arranged on different sides, according to our general occupations, proves the unequal operation of our present revenue laws. The majority, I know, call the protecting duties the American system, and say it is good; and for them, it may seem so. I shall not enter the lists against their formed, their nourished opinions, based as they are on apparent interest; it would be a hopeless task indeed. But I may, I think, safely ask this committee to believe, that, in the opinion of the whole southern country, (except the sugar planters,) they are unequally taxed; and I said that the movements of this Congress were regarded by them with deep solicitude; they looked, sir, with anxiety for the President's message; they had no right to expect from him an abandonment of the tariff principle; they knew, when they voted for him, that his opinions were with the majority on that point; they, therefore, did not expect him to recommend a system of taxation, by which they would be required to pay no more than their equal share of the public burdens; but they did expect him to recommend a modification of the present law on that subject; they were not disappointed: they had a right to demand of him, and of you, that in this modification their interests should be regarded. Yes, sir, and that their opinions, too, should have their due weight; here, sir, the message is also as it should be: for the sake of harmony in our national councils, an abandonment of the scheme of internal improvement is distinctly recommended. But the indications of the temper of the House on those two points are calculated to increase the anxiety of the South to produce alarm in their minds. A bill to modify the tariff in the spirit of the message, was reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. It was kicked out with indignity by this House, and by most of the same votes; a most alarming liberality in appropriations is observable. Shall the entire payment of the public debt give us no relief? I beg the committee to pause, and think of this matter; we have no hope for justice, we look not for equality of taxation. This inequality we have borne, and (to be applied to the necessary expenses of Government) we will bear it so long as it is tolerable: nor will I attempt to mark the limits to which Virginia will go. Whatsoever can be done by heroic fortitude, all that can be dictated by love of this Union, by her clear perception of her deep interest in it, will be done. But, I pray you, do not declare to her that the present inequality of taxation shall not only remain, as it respects the proportions, but shall be kept up, as it regards also its amount. It is not sufficient to answer that this inequality is imaginary. The legislators of this land cannot wisely, they cannot safely, disregard the deliberate, settled opinions of the growers of two-thirds of its exports. This interest is too powerful in wealth, numbers and talents, to be thus treated. I ask not, I do not insinuate, that the decision of this question is to be left to them. No, sir, this whole subject is to be weighed and decided by the majority, who feel not the interest, and partake not of the opinions of the population alluded to. I ask that majority, in framing their own opinions, to spread out this whole country before their mind's eye. You know that sore restlessness exists, if you will not, and think you cannot appease it. It is unwise, it is unsafe, to increase it. The arguments which the committee have heard from others, prove clearly that this road could get but few votes in its favor, upon a simple comparison of public and general utility with its cost. The abstract principle of internal improvement with its connexion with the American system (as it is called) is to carry the bill, if carried at all. Should this bill pass, I should regard it as conclusive, that the purpose of this Government, to keep the present grinding oppression of the South up to its present amount, is fixed. I have an awful feeling on this point. I know well the opinions of my own constituents, and we all know that one common feeling, on this subject, pervades the whole southern country. They cannot, for one moment, be duped into the belief that the inequality they are subjected to, is, under any circumstances, to be made to them by the disbursements of the Government. The best, the most they could hope for, under the operation of this internal improvement system, is an effect sometimes seen in the conduct of a speculator, who, finding that the stock on hand has fallen in price, goes on purchasing on a falling market, whereby he lowers the average, but increases his loss. So long, therefore, as the southern country pays two dollars tax for every one dollar of that tax that is paid into the treasury, will it be plain to them that, even on an equal application of the revenue to all parts of the Union, they will be losers one hundred per cent.; but they know they are to lose more. They have no warrant for the belief, that those who now see not that they are unequally taxed, will ever be less unequal in the application of the proceeds. Should any thing be done in their country, under the name of internal improvement, they well do know that, for every dollar thus received, they will pay five; and, from the manner such works must and will be executed, their own contributions to the particular work itself will exceed its value. But, sir, if this bill passes, they see not in it a disposition to give them one dollar in five of their own money. They cannot regard the money as appropriated to open the road. No, sir; they will believe that the road is to be opened to appropriate the money. I shall say nothing of the want of lawful power which should now hold our hand. Reasons, good, for declining to argue that question here, were stated in the opening of the debate. But the deep, the settled opinion of the South, that they are oppressed, becomes a matter of more serious consequences, when you take into view their equally settled opinion, that the oppression arises from the exertion of unauthorized power in the manner the taxes are laid. This mode of continuing these taxes, or increasing them, is also by them regarded as unconstitutional. The state of feeling and of opinion thus entertained by the South, I wish taken up and considered as a substantive argument in itself, unconnected with the idea of its being well or ill founded. You cannot say it is capricious; you cannot say it is entitled to no respect; the opinion has been long fixed, it is identified with the soil; it is now, and always has been, the deliberate conviction of many of the clearest heads and soundest hearts of this or any other country. It pervades a large, a powerful section of country, marked out by natural boundaries. The lawgiver who acts in contempt or disregard of opinions, thus situated, acts unwisely; he treads on danger's giddy brink. Mr. Jefferson is often cited as authority here on all sides; the fixed opinion of New England caused him to give up the embargo. The opinion of Massachusetts was not more firmly or warmly set against the embargo, than is that of the whole South against the tariff, and this mode of continuing or increasing it. Our federative system is supposed to be wisely contrived to secure as much of energy as is consistent with the preservation of liberty; but, sir, the lawgiver who acts on these States as one compact whole, and regards not the opinions, nay, the prejudices of large compact minorities, knows nothing of the spirit in which the constitution was formed, or the practical administration by which our Union, under it, can be preserved.

Mr. W. B. SHEPARD said, he did not rise at that late hour, with any desire of entering fully into the discussion of the subject before the committee. I have [said Mr. S.] no such uncharitable intention; I merely wish to explain the reasons why I should give the vote I intend to do on this occasion. And this, sir, would be unnecessary; but, representing the section of country, and holding the opinions which I do, my motives might otherwise be misunderstood. Perhaps in the course of my observations I may be induced to take a short excursion along this road, with the view of picking up a few stragglers by the way side. This subject has been discussed upon two grounds—its constitutionality and its utility. I had hoped, sir, after the abandonment of the constitutional ground of objection by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, we should have taken the question as settled, that the General Government have the right to prosecute works of improvement within the bounds of the several States.

[Here Mr. BARBOUR interrupted Mr. S., and denied he had abandoned that ground.]

I have no intention of roaming over the numerous reasons why the General Government has this power; but would merely observe, that it is very surprising to see gentlemen denying this power, who admit other constructions of a more evil or dangerous tendency. It is the practice of those who advocate this restrictive construction of the constitution, to appeal to Mr. Jefferson as to a pure fountain of truth, undefiled; they catch at the slightest word which has fallen from him, and regard it as an incontrovertible political axiom. And yet, sir, the most remarkable instance of constructive power ever assumed by this Government was under his administration, and by his recommendation. I mean the purchase of Louisiana. I would ask those who rely on this authority for the correct construction of the constitution, to show me the clause which gave the power of purchasing Louisiana to the General Government; and, if they cannot find it expressed totidem verbis, will they stand up on this floor and condemn that purchase? Will they condemn an act which brought a new world into existence, and opened the fertile and prosperous West to the industry and enterprise of our fellow-citizens? I mention this fact, with no intention of derogating from the well-earned fame of Mr. Jefferson, but as an instance of his practical construction of the constitution. If his opinion changed, I know of no reason why we should wander, even with the divine Plato. It is unnecessary to go very remotely back for precedents of constructive powers—we can find them sufficiently numerous by daily observation in this House. It has not been many days since we construed two "little words" into a statute of Virginia, in order to eject one member from his seat, and put another one in it. And for this we had the efficient aid of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, who spoke so feelingly against this bill. I followed his example; for I thought his construction the right one, although the reasons for it would not be entirely satisfactory to a plain man, who understands words by their apparent meanings. The truth is, the constitution of the United States was intended to save the country from misery and anarchy. It is a grant of enumerated powers; powers which could not be very rigidly or strictly defined. The wants of a great and growing nation could not be anticipated or imagined; and so long as the exercise of those powers tends to the general welfare and prosperity, they answer the great end for which they were designed. It is immaterial what set of politicians are called to the administration of this Government—they will find themselves compelled to adopt the construction now contended for:

Pensions.

Upon any other, the Government may reel on its feeble existence for a few years, and finally be dissolved by its own weakness. We have heard allusions made, in the course of this debate, to those persons who desire a great and splendid Government. If by a splendid Government gentlemen mean a Government which carries its blessings into the remotest corners of its dominions, which peoples its forests with a living and industrious multitude, which is hailed with gratitude and joy in the remotest log house beyond the mountains, I am, sir, for a splendid Government. I would rejoice to see the day when the name of an American citizen, like that of the ancient Roman, would be a protection on every sea, and a terror to tyrants on every land. But if nothing more is meant than a continual playing with the passions and prejudices of the people, for the offices of the Government, the less we have of such splendor the better. To be happy and free, we must be great. By greatness I do not mean the voluptuous splendor of an eastern monarch, a mere sensual enjoyment, the indolence of one, maintained by the sacrifice of millions; I mean that greatness which demands and obtains the respect of the world; which ensures to the poorest citizen of the community personal security, the means of obtaining plenty, and a fair field for the exercise of all the energies of his nature. The most melancholy forebodings have been indulged in, should we continue to progress with this system of opening roads, making canals, and deepening harbors. The fate of Rome has been brought before us, and painted in vivid colors; her passion for splendor has been assigned as the legitimate cause of her degradation and misery. Rome was a nation of warriors; her splendid ways were constructed to transport her conquering legions to enslave nations; she lived by the plunder of the world; despising commerce and the pursuits of civil life, she had no occupation but that of war. The comparison, therefore, is not sustained; our roads are intended to draw closer the bond of union; to drive, by a nearer and more familiar intercourse, barbarism and hostile feelings from among us; to unite us, by the closest of all ties, the tie of interest. But, sir, should this devout end not be obtained, should the sun of our horizon run his ecliptic course through as brilliant a galaxy as that of ancient Rome, and finally set in as mild a splendor as that of modern Italy, the land of science and of glory, this would be better, far better, than twenty-four petty, jarring, independent tribes, the natural and inevitable result of the opposite doctrine. In the one case, we may leave something for the study and admiration of mankind; in the other, a great deal for his scorn and contempt. Equally unfortunate, in my estimation, was the allusion made to the present condition of England. Her immense debt, which weighs so heavily upon the industry of her people, was not incurred by making roads or cutting canals, but in unnecessary wars; so far from it, that the very existence of that country is now to be attributed to its high state of improvement, to the facility of intercourse through every section, by means of which the industry of every part of the population is wafted to every quarter of the world. By means of the twenty-five or thirty canals uniting the eastern with the western section of England, the spirit and intelligence of the capital is conveyed in a fruitful stream throughout the kingdom. We have seen England, with a population of ten or fifteen millions, maintaining a firm and invincible front against hostile Europe. We have seen her warring in every hemisphere, the last refuge and only hope of free principles in the old world!

To what are we to attribute this indomitable spirit? And whence did she draw the treasure to sustain this protracted struggle? Her people, on beholding the land of their birth rendered a garden, and endeared by their industry, would have died sooner than have permitted the spoiler to have entered their territory. In the course of this debate, we have heard the remark of a celebrated British orator,

"that the power of the crown had increased, was increasing, and ought to be diminished," applied to this Government. This may be true, sir, but there is no evidence of it. To ascertain if there is a probable foundation for the remark, let us look at the occurrences of the last few years. We have seen an administration hurled from its seat by a spontaneous burst of the popular voice; not because the constitution had been violated, nor because the liberty of any one had been assailed, but from a bare suspicion that unfairness had been used in preventing the will of the majority. And although, now, no honorable man believes there was any corruption in the choice, though the charge has been consigned to the "kennel of forgotten calumnies," the bare existence of this circumstance is proof of the uncontrolled and uncontrollable power of the people in the administration of this Government. Does not this House daily exhibit that they are tremblingly alive to the opinion of their constituents? That the slightest murmur of disapprobation at home sounds like thunder in their ears? How, then, can we imagine the power of the Government is increasing? Are we prepared to adopt the nullifying notions that seem to have struck so forcibly the imaginations of some of our politicians? I hope not; I do not despair of the republic, but have great confidence in the permanence of our institutions. And, although I differ widely with many of the opponents of this bill, I cannot vote for it. I do not think the expediency or necessity of a road from Buffalo to New Orleans has been shown to the House. I have no doubt that the General Government has the power to execute the work; but I cannot consent to expend so large a sum of money as this road will require, for an object the utility of which is so doubtful. I will not repeat the arguments which have just fallen from the honorable gentleman from New York; to my mind they are perfectly satisfactory of the inexpediency of this measure.

Mr. RAMSEY, of Pennsylvania, spoke in explanation of his former remarks, referred to by some gentlemen.

Mr. CARSON replied to some of the remarks of his colleague, Mr. SHEPARD.

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved that the committee rise, and report the bill, with the view of refusing leave to sit again, and discussing the amendment in the House; but

The CHAIR pronounced the motion out of order.

Mr. STORRS replied to some remarks of Mr. RAMSEY, in reference to his course on this bill; and, after some further explanation between Mr. SHEPARD and Mr. CARSON,

The committee rose, on motion of Mr. ARCHER.

FRIDAY, APRIL 2, 1830.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution, proposing to set apart every other Thursday for such legislation as may be necessary for the District of Columbia.

After a good deal of debate on the part of Messrs. SPEIGHT and P. P. BARBOUR, against the resolution, and Messrs. MALLARY, DAVIS, and INGERSOLL, in its favor, and an ineffectual attempt of Mr. BARBOUR to lay it on the table, the resolution was adopted—yeas, 86, nays, 75—so modified as to commence next Thursday.

SATURDAY, APRIL 3, 1830.

PENSIONS.

The House took up the following resolution, reported by Mr. BATES, from the Committee on Military Pensions.

"Resolved, That the Committee on Military Pensions be instructed, agreeably to the President's recommendation in his message of the sixth of December last, to revise the pension law, for the purpose of extending its benefits to every soldier who aided in establishing our liberties, and who is unable to maintain himself in comfort, and to report to the House a bill for that purpose. And, also, that said

Pensions.

committee be further instructed, agreeably to said recommendation, to report a bill for the relief of all those who were, during the last war, disabled from supporting themselves by manual labor."

Mr. BATES said, the applications for pensions are numerous, which do not come within the range of the provisions of the pension laws, and for which provision ought to be made, if made at all, by a general law, and not by special acts. In order to take the judgment of the House upon the propriety of passing such general law, the committee thought it best to present the question in the form of a resolution, that it might be stripped of the embarrassments and refuges which the details of a bill create; and he supposed it would be expected of him in a few words to call the attention of the House to its import and general bearing.

The resolution [he said] embodies precisely the recommendation of the President in his message at the opening of the present session of Congress, no more, no less. It involves two propositions, the one relating to the soldiers of the revolution, the other to the invalids of the last war. The first proposition is to extend the benefits of the existing law to "every soldier of the revolution who aided in achieving our liberties, and who is unable to maintain himself in comfort." To extend the existing pension law—the act of 1828, so far as it relates to the officers, was founded on compact; and, so far as respects the soldiers, it gives pensions only to those who served to the close of the war, &c., without any reference to their ability or inability to support themselves; and has, therefore, no application to the subject in hand. The law of 1818 gives a pension to those of the continental establishment, who, at one period of the war, or, in the language of the act, "at any period of the war, served for the term of nine months or longer," and who were in such circumstances as to need, &c. Under the construction which has been given to this act, those whose enlistment was for a shorter term than nine months, whatever might have been their term of service, are excluded, and those, also, who enlisted for nine months, and by captivity were prevented from serving in the army. For these two classes provision has been made by the bill that has gone to the Senate; and which, by great grace and favor, has reached the honor of a second reading, upon a call of yeas and nays, by a vote of nineteen to seventeen. Mr. B. said he congratulated the House upon this occasion. It might grow to be of some importance in this Government, for the bill of the last Congress did not arrive even to that honor. Do what you will to these old soldiers, but hear them. And if they are not to be heard, let this House be heard in their behalf, at least with the usual forms of respect and attention. The resolution, therefore, only covers, beyond, the cases of those who, under different enlistments, served nine months, or, under one or more enlistments, a shorter term than nine months.

There was another class of troops, now known as State troops, eleven regiments, or rather battalions, for they consisted of but five hundred men each, who are also provided for by the bill now in the Senate, leaving those only to be embraced by the resolution, who served for a shorter time than nine months, or nine months at different times.

The third class consists of the militia and volunteers, who, at all times, were useful, and, on many occasions, saw very hard service.

The proposition, then, is to give relief to all the soldiers of the revolution, whether continental, State, militia, or volunteer, who are unable to maintain themselves in comfort, as a national memorial, and testimonial of our gratitude and justice, of their merit and worth, and of the glorious results of their services—a full pension to those who served nine months, and a pro rata pension to those who served less. This, however, to be fixed in the details of the bill as may be thought proper.

The second proposition is to give a pension to those "who were during the last war disabled from supporting themselves by manual labor?" Those who were disabled by known wounds are now provided for, leaving only those for the resolution to act upon who were disabled by other means, such as hardships, exposures, &c. &c.

Thus far for the import of the resolution. As to its bearing upon the treasury, if it should be consummated into a law, the committee, aware that they would be called upon to state the number of soldiers it would embrace, addressed through the House a resolution to the head of the department who has the administration of this subject, and all the means of information in relation to it, accessible or known to the committee, which he asked the Clerk to read, with the Secretary's answer to it.

"Mr. BATES, from the Committee on Military Pensions, reported the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to this House the probable number of surviving revolutionary officers and soldiers (not provided for by the existing pension law) who aided in establishing the liberties of the United States, and who are unable to maintain themselves in comfort; designating, as nearly as may be, such as belonged to the continental establishment, and such as were regular troops of the line of the army, but not of the continental establishment, and known as State troops; as, also, such as belonged to the militia of the States, severally, whether as volunteers or otherwise, and what additional appropriations will be necessary to meet the views of the President in this respect, as disclosed in his message at the opening of the present session of Congress; and, further, to report the probable number of those who were, during the late war, disabled from supporting themselves by manual labor, and who are not provided for by existing law.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 19th January, 1830.

The resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 14th January instant, relative to the number of surviving revolutionary officers, &c. cannot be fully and satisfactorily answered by any information on file in this department. The enclosed communication from the principal clerk of the Pension Bureau, is a reply, to the extent that the records of the War Department will permit.

Very respectfully,

J. H. EATON.

ANDREW STEVENSON, Esq.

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

WAR DEPARTMENT,

Pension Office, January 15, 1830.

SIR: In relation to the resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 14th instant, respecting the surviving officers and soldiers of the revolutionary war, I have to inform you that the archives of this department furnish no data upon which an estimate could be made, as to the probable number of those who belonged to the State regiments, volunteers, and militia, during the revolutionary war. Of such troops we have no rolls, except the three State regiments of Virginia. Of the number of Virginia State troops, now living, I can form nothing like an accurate calculation: possibly a hundred may still survive, and perhaps three-fourths of them might ask for assistance, if a law should pass embracing their cases. If all who served on the continental establishment are comprehended in the resolution, it would embrace men who served for six and eight months. What portion of these are now alive, and in needy circumstances, I am unable to determine, but four hundred would, I think, be a large estimate.

I have no means of ascertaining what number of persons were disabled during the last war, who are incapable of maintaining themselves by manual labor, and who are not provided for by law.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. L. EDWARDS.

Hon. JOHN H. EATON, Secretary of War."

Mr. B. said he called for the reading of these papers rather for the purpose of showing what is not attainable than what is obtained. In as much as this measure was recommended by the President, the committee thought it due to him to call upon the appropriate department of his cabinet for such facts and information as might be useful in justifying and sustaining it. But, from the condition of the records of the army, and the nature of the case, it is impossible to form a satisfactory opinion upon the subject. He would not, therefore, venture to give one. The fact can only be ascertained now, as it was in 1818 and 1828, by experiment. Of one fact, however, and the only one material, we are assured, and that is the ability of the treasury to meet the demand which the resolution may create upon it. The House ought not to forget that time has thinned the ranks of these men, and abridged the life of all of them by twelve years since the act of 1818. The amount of the immediate demand will be much less than is expected, he thought, and it will be a gradually and rapidly decreasing demand. These men will soon cease to trouble you. The last of them will soon be gone. The measure must, therefore, rest, for its basis, upon the recommendation of the President, who doubtless considered it well before he recommended it to Congress, and upon the great and obvious and universally admitted justice and propriety of the measure.

He congratulated the soldiers of the revolution that the President had pledged the authority of his name, and staked to the nation his influence with Congress in their behalf. It was an act worthy of a President of the United States. It ought never to be heard in a country like ours, that these men are left to suffer from want, or even to feel that they have been rigorously and harshly dealt by, and he hoped to hear no more of paying the national debt until this, the most ancient, just, and sacred, is first met and cancelled. Sir, [said he] there never was a race of men so trifled with as these men have been, whose feelings and honor were held in such cheap account. In 1818, you gave them a pension. In 1820, as soon as they adjusted themselves to their new condition of comfort, you took it away. By the same act, and that of 1823, you readmitted a portion of them to the pension roll, but upon this condition—a sworn confession of absolute pauperism, nay, you required proof of it upon inspection and valuation. You searched their tents as if they had been felons, not to ascertain where they get their plunder, but what they had, and what they had done with what they had not. You made him account for the twin lambs he had given his children for the rearing, and for the cradle his wife had given to his daughter upon her marriage. You charged him with the money he had paid for services filial piety had rendered, unless he could show an antecedent contract which no parent ordinarily would have thought of proposing, and no son, unless a bastard or an outcast, of making. In 1828-'29, no sooner had a new rule been adopted, more just, more liberal, and in my view more conformable to the act of 1818 than the old one was, and the hopes of these men, which had become dead, been revived, and their crutches put in motion—for they had no time to lose—no sooner had they set out upon their pilgrimage to the court-houses, to get their papers, than the rule was reversed—the Government had changed its mind—"as you were," was the order from the War Department. Of course, all their expense and trouble were incurred for nothing. I repeat, sir, there never were men so trifled with: Age, infirmity, poverty, and suffering have been sported with, not by the boys of Bethel, but by Congress. Here, sir—less here than elsewhere. Fair speeches will answer no longer. They have answered long enough. Let the question be settled, once and forever. Let the claims of these men be admitted and satisfied, or rejected; for, in reference to this subject, hope given up is preferable to hope deferred. Let them have at least the quiet of despair. I say again, that I congratulate them that the President has interposed in their behalf. It is proof that he knows what is due to them, and what is due to ourselves, to our own character and honor; and I call upon the House to sanction the measure he has recommended.

MONDAY, APRIL 5, 1830.

The SPEAKER presented a memorial of James H. Peck, Judge of the United States' district court for the district of Missouri, in relation to the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, made to the House on the 23d ultimo, on the memorial of Luke E. Lawless, in which report it is proposed that he (the said judge) be impeached for high misdemeanors in office, praying the House to receive from him a written exposition of the whole case, embracing both the facts and the law, and that he may have process to call his witnesses from the State of Missouri, in support of his statement, before any discussion or vote be taken on the evidence as it is now presented with the report of the committee—or, if that cannot be granted, he prays the House "to vote the impeachment at once, without any discussion on that partial evidence which presents a garbled view of the subject, greatly to the prejudice of the memorialist, and that he may have as speedy an opportunity as the nature of the case will allow, to exhibit before the tribunal of the Senate, and before his country, the entire transaction in all its parts, as it really occurred."

The report having been read by the Clerk,

Mr. STORRS, of New York, moved to commit it to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to which is committed the report of the Judiciary Committee relative to Judge Peck.

On this motion a debate ensued, which continued till between two and three o'clock, embracing in its range the propriety of granting the prayer of the petitioner, the propriety of the course pursued by the committee in their investigation of the subject, the history of other cases of impeachment in our country and in Great Britain, and, somewhat, the merits of the present case. Messrs. STORRS, of New York, CLAY, BUCHANAN, INGER-SOLL, SUTHERLAND, WICKLIFFE, PETTIS, BELL, SPENCER, of New York, EVERETT, STRONG, COULTER, and CRAIG, of Virginia, took part in the debate, which was at length terminated, by a successful motion of Mr. DAVIS, of South Carolina, to lay the memorial on the table, and print it.

[The following are the only speeches the publishers have been able to obtain:]

Mr. CLAY said, that when he withdrew his motion to lay this memorial on the table, and print it, he had had no idea that such a discussion would have taken place as had since arisen. Nor could he perceive the propriety of the debate under such a motion as had been made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. STORRS] to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. He had greatly misunderstood the memorial of Judge Peck, if it reflected in the slightest degree on the Judiciary Committee; and he was persuaded that those gentlemen who had represented that paper as so doing, had entirely misunderstood its tenor and purpose. All that the Judge had done in his petition was, to present a simple statement of facts, and to ask that he might be heard before he was impeached. He had uttered no reflection whatever, either on the Judiciary Committee or its chairman; and why it had roused so much feeling in the House, he was utterly at a loss to understand. He might be mistaken, but to him it seemed that the whole discussion was out of order. The question at this time was not whether the Judge should be heard at the bar of the House, or whether additional testimony should be received. Neither of these questions was at all involved in a motion to refer the memorial to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; yet the whole discussion seemed to have gone on the supposition that such was the question, and gentlemen had argued it on the ground of precedent. As to precedents, there was no uniformity in them on this subject. One high case had been referred to, that of Warren Hastings, and also that of Judge Chase. But the practice in the several States differed from that which had been pursued by the General Government. In his own State, (and he hoped he should not be considered as presumptuous in referring to the practice of a State which had so recently been admitted to the Union,) the course pursued in cases of impeachment was different; and he thought there were many inducements for the House to pursue the practice there adopted. He could not unite in the opinion that the House should proceed precisely as did a grand jury in ordinary cases of indictment. The present case was totally different. A great officer had been accused of a great offence. Did gentlemen suppose, could they think, that, when a high officer of the Government was accused by a private individual, he must, on the mere ex parte testimony of that accuser, be at once impeached? Mr. C. said he should hesitate much, before he could subscribe to such an opinion. He thought the House ought to proceed with very great caution. Merely to accuse, was not all that was necessary in order to have a judge impeached. Some gentlemen seemed to conceive that the memorial of this petitioner asked that witnesses might be examined at the bar of that House; but it made no such request directly. It only asked this as one alternative—that his witnesses might be heard here, if not elsewhere. Mr. C. inquired why it would not be proper to appoint commissioners to take testimony in Missouri or elsewhere. Where would be the inconvenience of such a course? Where would be the impropriety of issuing commissions to individuals of respectability, to take testimony on the spot where the offence had occurred? This could be done, although that House was not the tribunal before which the accused was to be tried. It had very truly been stated, that the ground of this impeachment had occurred some four or five years before. The case had at that time been referred to the Judiciary Committee of the House, who, after looking at it, requested to be discharged from its further consideration. The same extraordinary prosecution had been attempted the second time, but with no better success. And was it not natural for the accused, when a grand jury had thus twice made a return of ignoramus, to suppose that he was exempt from any further molestation on the same ground? Surely it was; and Judge Peck had concluded, when, in a second instance, a competent committee of that House had had his case before them, and made no report upon it, that he was exempt from further trouble. While these facts were not denied, and gentlemen looked at the length of time which had since elapsed, they must allow that it behooved them, as candid and honorable men, to act in the case with caution and deliberation. Were gentlemen prepared to decide on the proposition of the Judge, without fully consulting the precedents? It had been to allow time for such an examination, that he had made the motion to lay the memorial on the table, and print it; and he must be permitted to say, that a discussion like the present would, in his judgment, have been more proper after such a delay, than it was at present.

He now renewed the motion, but once more withdrew it at the request of Mr. STORRS.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, that, whilst he was influenced by no personal feeling in this case, he thought it was his duty to make one or two explanations in relation to some matters contained in the memorial which had just been read.

Judge Peck, in that memorial, suggests that the Committee on the Judiciary sent for such witnesses only as had been selected by Mr. Lawless. That is far from being the fact. The committee acted upon higher principles. They were sensible of the high responsibility which they owed, both to this House and to the country, for the correctness of their proceedings; and had, therefore, inquired and ascertained, from the best sources in their power, the names of such witnesses as would be most likely to give an impartial and intelligent statement of the transaction. They had sent for and examined seven witnesses; and he owed it to them to say, that, although he had long been in the habit of examining witnesses in courts of justice, he had never observed, on any occasion, more candor or more impartiality than these seven gentlemen had exhibited upon their examination before the committee.

It is true, as the memorial suggests, that, in the case of Warren Hastings, the House of Commons did hear the accused, and did permit him to produce testimony, before they voted an impeachment against him. But this was only a single instance. That course might have been adopted, because Mr. Burke, merely as an individual member of the House, had risen in his place, and moved the impeachment. Whether he was correct in this conjecture or not, it was certain there had been no case of an impeachment by this House, in which so much indulgence was granted, as had been allowed to the accused upon the present occasion. He was permitted to furnish the committee with a written explanation of his conduct, and his request that he might cross-examine the witnesses was promptly granted. The House will decide, when they come to review the testimony, whether he was improperly restricted in this cross-examination, or whether it has not been full and ample. He would say, that, in his opinion, this cross-examination had rather injured than benefited the Judge.

Mr. B. said, that, for his own part, he had never considered the parol testimony in this case of much importance. The opinion of the court, the commentary of Mr. Lawless upon it, which was the alleged contempt, and the record of the court imprisoning and suspending him from practice, were all in writing, and were the facts on which the committee mainly relied in forming their opinion. In that opinion they were unanimous. They felt deep regret, when they found themselves obliged to come to the conclusion which they had done; and it was with great reluctance they had recommended an impeachment to the House. In making their report, they had purposely expressed a mere naked opinion only, unaccompanied by any argument in its support. They did not wish to bias the decision of the House by any commentary of theirs upon the testimony. All they desired was, that each member should read the testimony for himself, and draw his own conclusions from it.

Mr. INGERSOLL said, there might perhaps be some difficulty in arriving at the correct practice to be pursued in this case; and as possibly the practice hitherto had not been uniform, it was the more important that the House should start right. He confessed that this was, in a great measure, a new case to him. The only one that he had ever before witnessed was that in which charges, through a newspaper of this district, had been brought against the Vice-President about three years ago. That officer had presented these charges to the House, as the grand inquest of the nation, and requested an inquiry. A committee had been appointed to investigate them; and, before that committee, a friend of the Vice-President had been permitted to appear, and represent him throughout the whole investigation. Witnesses, also, had been examined on the part of the accused. How it had been in the case of Judge Chase, or of Judge Pickering, from New Hampshire, he did not recollect; but he well recollected that witnesses in favor of the Vice-President had been examined, as well as against him, and that his representative had been allowed to be present before the committee through every stage of that examination. The committee at that time took some pains to ascertain what was the proper mode of proceeding, and they became satisfied that the party accused had, in these preliminary proceedings, a right to be thus heard. The constitution providing for the impeachment of all civil officers, makes no difference between judicial and other officers. Nor can it make any difference whether the matter is brought before us by the individual who feels himself injured by an unjust charge, or whether it comes on the petition of a citizen, or by the message of the Executive, or by a member rising in his seat, as was done in the case of Warren Hastings. The rules which must govern the inquiry must be uniform, be the officer who he may, and no matter in what form the subject is first brought to our notice. Mr. I. said, he would not, in this early stage of the business, commit himself to any course, till he could look further into parliamentary proceedings in similar cases; he rose principally to correct what had been said by the gentleman from New York, who, he thought, went too far in saying that there had been no instance in which the party accused was permitted to examine his witnesses in the preliminary proceedings in this House.

Judge Peck.

Mr. PETTIS said: Standing indifferently, as he protested he did, between the accuser and the accused in this case, he hoped he might be permitted to make some remarks on this subject.

The House of Representatives had now to perform a very important duty—important, as had been observed, not only to the judge who had been accused, but to the country. The practice in cases of impeachments, so far as regards the proceedings in this House, was now to be settled; for it was obvious that it had not yet been settled by precedent. Gentlemen had, indeed, spoken of the case of Judge Chase; but that case had no application to the present one as it now stands. Judge Chase did not ask to make his defence before this House, nor did he ask either to cross-examine witnesses on the part of the Government, or to have an examination of his own witnesses. As the present question was not then raised, that case can form no precedent to govern in this instance.

Mr. P. regretted the course pursued by the gentlemen of the Judiciary Committee, especially that of its honorable chairman, [Mr. BUCHANAN.] That gentleman had repeatedly told the House that he had no feeling towards the accused. Mr. P. said he hoped his remarks would not show a freedom from feeling in the way that those of that gentleman had done. The honorable chairman had, in a very unnecessary, and, he would say, improper manner, entered into the merits of the case. He had told the House that, in order to save the Judge, his request should be refused him; and he had said that the Judge had made his case worse instead of better by his cross-examination of the witnesses. The gentleman from New York [Mr. STORRS] had taken the same view; both intimating that they were desirous to save the Judge from himself. What was it the Judge asked in his memorial? First, that he might be permitted to defend himself before this House, and then that his witnesses might be examined at our bar; but, if this be not granted, that his case might be sent back to the committee, and that there he might present his defence, and there have his witnesses examined. Mr. P. said he considered the request of the memorial perfectly fair and proper; and if the motion to lay it on the table and print it should prevail, he should then move a series of resolutions, presenting in a distinct manner the several requests of the memorialists that the House might act expressly upon them. As to the first, it was certainly important that the House should know the principles on which the case rested. The Judiciary Committee had, it was true, made a report; but they had not laid down one of those principles in it. Now, he put it to gentlemen, whether they were prepared to act in the case until these principles were examined and known. Were there any gentlemen present who had fully examined the law bearing on this case? He presumed not. We were then called upon to act in the dark, upon faith. He had not himself had time to examine the principles involved, nor had he made up any definitive judgment on the case. He thought the Judge ought to be permitted to show whatever bore on his side of the question, and the committee should then exhibit whatever had an opposite bearing. This might be done should the House refuse to hear his witnesses. He was of the opinion that his witnesses should be examined by the committee.

Mr. P. said, this was not the ordinary trial of a criminal before a court of law, but was a proceeding of a much higher character. Why is it that a defendant's witnesses are not permitted to be examined before a grand jury? It is because criminals shall not know what is doing against them, and then make their escape. But even in criminal cases counter testimony is frequently allowed.

If the House should hear what the Judge had to exhibit in his defence, we should be prepared to act intelligibly. The gentleman from New York [Mr. STORRS] had opposed this, on the ground that it would be worse for the Judge; that if this examination was had, and an impeachment preferred, the Senate would be bound, by the force of public opinion, to convict. That gentleman would surely let the party judge for himself. If he judged wrong, he must abide the consequences. It appeared to him a very strange doctrine, that, after a full examination here, and an impeachment found, the Senate would be bound to convict. In the case of the Vice President, and in the case of Mr. Crawford, witnesses were examined on both sides. Both these gentlemen were charged with high misdemeanors, and the charges had been preferred in times of great political excitement. The request of the Judge is supported by the whole train of English decisions in cases of a like kind; and he hoped that the indulgence would be granted him.

Mr. STRONG said, that, from the little examination he had been able to give to this subject, he had come to the conclusion that the present proceedings should be strictly ex parte, rigidly so. It had been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT] that the committee had departed somewhat from this line. It was true that they had deviated from it in a slight degree, but the departure was not such as to warrant the House in taking the other step which was now requested. There was a very material difference between hearing the party accused and hearing his witnesses. The members of the House were not judges to try or to condemn the accused. It was true that the matters in this testimony might not be such as to mix themselves up with party politics; but suppose that it were proposed to impeach a political man of high standing, and that the witnesses were brought to the bar of the House, he put it to every man to say whether the safety of the country did not require that, in such cases, politics should be thoroughly excluded from that tribunal. And how could this be done, but by keeping the proceedings strictly ex parte? Complaints had been made that the committee had not reported articles of impeachment; the case had been referred to them for no such purpose; their duty had been simply to ascertain facts. The House did not want even their opinions; it wanted the facts only, and on one side. What the House had to decide, was, whether the testimony did, or did not, contain matter to warrant an impeachment. If it did, then the House would say the party should be impeached, and the next step would be to appoint a committee to frame the articles. These would be reported to the House, and, if they were agreed upon, then managers would be appointed to conduct the trial before the Senate. It struck him that the safest course would be to keep the proceedings as near ex parte as possible. Let the report and the memorial go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; let them be printed, and let all the members have an opportunity to examine them. If the House should then decide that articles of impeachment should be drawn up, all would have been done that the accused could rightfully ask.

MILITARY PENSIONS.

The House resumed the consideration of the following resolution, reported by Mr. BATES, from the Committee on Military Pensions, on the 8th of January last:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Pensions be instructed, agreeably to the President's recommendation, in his message of the 6th December last, to review the pension law, for the purpose of extending its benefits to every soldier who aided in establishing our liberties, and who is unable to maintain himself in comfort, and to report to the House a bill for that purpose; and, also, that said committee be further instructed, agreeably to said recommendation, to report a bill for the relief of all those who were, during the last war, disabled from supporting themselves by manual labor."

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to amend the resolution by striking out the latter clause, expressing his willingness to provide for those who served in the revolution, but not for those of the late war.

Mr. J. W. TAYLOR expressed his sentiments in favor of the motion to amend, and gave an estimate of the number of soldiers of the late war already on the pension list, together with some reasons which induced him to feel an indisposition to extend the provisions of this resolution in relation to that class.

The question was then taken on Mr. WILLIAMS'S amendment, and decided in the affirmative, as follows: yeas, 145—nays, 29.

Mr. BURGESS then moved to amend the resolution by adding the following proviso:

"Provided that any aid thereby intended shall comprehend only such part of the militia as served in the revolutionary war, and were engaged in some distinguished body of volunteers, or were draughted to fill up the continental army and served therein, and that in either for not less than nine months."

Mr. BURGESS stated that it was his object to make the bill definite and practicable.

Mr. WILLIAMS made some remarks in reply to Mr. BURGESS, and in opposition to the motion to amend; and asked for the yeas and nays on the question, which were ordered.

Mr. DE WITT moved the following modification of the amendment, which was accepted by the mover:

"Whether such service was performed during one uninterrupted series of nine months, or at different periods of the war, amounting in the aggregate to nine months."

Mr. BURGESS then made some observations, which were cut short by the lapse of the hour.

TUESDAY, APRIL 6, 1830.

The House having resumed the consideration of the resolution respecting military pensions,

Mr. BURGESS rose, and withdrew his amendment, not wishing [he said] to appear opposed to giving any thing to the militia of the revolution, though, for the reasons he had already assigned, he thought the plan impracticable.

The question was then taken on the original resolution, as modified by Mr. WILLIAMS, and decided in the affirmative by yeas and nays—110 to 39.

STEAMBOAT ACCIDENTS.

Mr. WICKLIFFE submitted a resolution, instructing a committee to inquire into and report some regulation by which accidents on board of steamboats, from the explosion of the boilers, may be prevented.

Mr. W. said, he offered this resolution, because he believed the House possessed the power, and might, by a proper enactment, greatly diminish, if not altogether prevent, the recurrence of the distressing accidents which now so often take place on board of steamboats. Whoever [he said] had read the account of the late dreadful calamity on board the Helen Macgregor, must be satisfied that it was owing to the negligence of some officer of that boat. Mr. W. wished to be understood, that the committee would be glad to receive suggestions from any person, or from any quarter, which would assist it in framing an efficient bill on the subject. As exemplifying his object, [said Mr. W.] he would mention one idea: it was to require, that whenever a boat stops for any purpose, the safety valve should be raised. At present it was the practice, for the purpose of saving fuel, to refrain from letting off the steam, regardless of human life.

Mr. WHITTLESEY had no doubt that all the cases of such accidents on the Ohio originated as Mr. WICKLIFFE had suggested, and he approved of the object of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to, nem. con.

BUFFALO AND NEW ORLEANS ROAD.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. HAYNES in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the Buffalo and New Orleans road bill.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, rose, and addressed the committee in opposition to the bill. He was by no means surprised at the manifestation on the part of the committee, on a former day, of indisposition to bear with further debate. He believed he might truly say that there was no gentleman on that floor, who, having been so long a member of the House, had been found more abstemious in debate than himself. Old a member as he was, his voice had scarcely been heard during the present session, save in matters connected with the committee to which he belonged. He felt, at all times, indisposition to address even willing ears, much more such as were unwilling. There were occasions, however, on which a public man ought not to be restrained, by minor considerations, from expressing his views of important public questions. He considered the present as an occasion of this description. It was his sincere belief that there lay at the root of the present discussion considerations which ought to be stated—to be stated freely—more, to be stated boldly. His capacities for public services in any mode, he estimated as humbly as any man could do; but, as regarded its responsibilities—in these, whilst taking a part in this service, he could permit no man to go before him. He should feel as representing unworthily the State from which he came, if he did so. That State had been accustomed to claim a place behind no other, in the necessary assertion of truth here. He feared that, on the present occasion, however, the palm must be yielded to another State—to New York. He had been both struck and gratified by the tone exhibited by several gentlemen from that State, [Mr. MONELL, Mr. ANGEL, and Mr. STORRS] on the last day of the discussion. New York had only to exhibit, on all occasions, a similar spirit of uncompromising disinterestedness, in reference to the legislation of this Government, and she would indeed deserve the appellation of great, which it was becoming fashionable to bestow on her: for a State, like an individual, could be truly great but by one mode—the practice of a real public spirit. More than one gentleman from that State had given, on the occasion alluded to, what he [Mr. A.] feared was a just view of the question. The committee had been told truly, that the question was not of the construction of a road, but of the erection of a great policy, of which the bill was designed as the foundation. Of this policy, the road had been called the pioneer; and the appropriation demanded for it, the earnest-money of a wide extending plan of wasteful and selfish dilapidation of the public treasury. Into the justice of these representations, he meant presently to inquire. He must be indulged, in the mean time, in a word of exhortation to the gentlemen from New York, to whom he had allusion; and that was, to remain of good heart, even though their apprehensions should be verified. A predatory and privateering legislation might unfurl the flag of this system of internal improvement, and all would still be well, if their great State would ride by the side of the South in the battle, and partake cordially in the war, for the preservation of the resources and purity of the Government.

The question, then, was on the foundation of an extensive system of the construction of roads by this Government. Not on the system in its fullest extent, however. It was admitted to be confined by a character of nationality in the works to be adopted. Mr. A. had no intention of going into the constitutional question brought to view by this remark. He hoped he had too just a taste, to allude to any subject out of place; and it would be out of place to allude to the constitutional question in this place. Till some force of eloquence, like the fabled power of music in ancient times, could be found to awaken the stones around, and bring the dead from the regions of darkness to light, let no chord of that discussion be struck. Till that time, let it lie by the wall. The General Government was empowered to make roads of a national character. This was the ground assumed. This requisite of nationality, it was impossible, in speculative reasoning, to deny. How far the condition had been heretofore, or was likely to be observed in practice, every man was aware. Let it be supposed there were no constitution in this Government, and yet the complete system of State Governments subsisting with it. Would its jurisdiction even then extend to a concurrence in every function of the State Governments? Who could be so absurd as to suppose it? Who did not perceive that the States were, at the same time, separate jurisdictions, and parts of a general jurisdiction; and that there must be functions appropriate to each, and exclusive respectively of either, or why the superfluity of a double establishment of authorities, and, worse than the superfluity, the mischief, as they must be perpetually in conflict with no line of demarcation? It would be the inevitable conclusion, therefore, that there was an appropriate province of jurisdiction for the nation, as for the States; and when any function was presented for exercise, or act to be performed, the proper inquiry would be, to which of these must it be assigned? By what test was this to be decided? Obviously by the purpose and use of the act or function. If the results and use were to be national, then the function belonged to the authority of the nation, and not otherwise. The use, then, was the test. The application of this test neutralized the entire force of the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. HENRILL] by whom the bill had been introduced. That gentleman had contended that the extension of a road into more States than one, of itself, conferred on the road the character of nationality. But if it was the use which gave its nationality, then the mere extent of the road was entirely immaterial. A road of half a mile from a fort might have this character. A road passing through every State in the Union might want it. The truth of this remark was apparent. If the mere extension of a road made it national, as no road passed to the frontier of a State without the certainty of finding another there to meet it, every road to a frontier must be national; the principle, from which this conclusion was fair, proved too much, and must therefore be rejected. It was equally a mistake to maintain, as the same gentleman had done, that, in order to the construction of an extensive line of road by the States, it was necessary there should be compacts between the States engaged in the construction.

Where was the necessity? If a road made to the frontier of one State met another passing to the frontier of the State adjoining, there was no need of State compacts; yet it was upon this supposed necessity that the argument alluded to rested for its support.

It was the use of a road which constituted the test of its nationality. What were the uses supposed to be of this character? Three were claimed—war, the mail, and commerce between the States. The conduct of war, the transport of the mail, and the regulation of commerce between the States, were uncontested national functions. Subservience to either of these, therefore, constituted a national use of a road. The question now, it was to be remembered, was, not on the authority to construct roads for these uses—that, as belonging to the constitutional inquiry, was a point passed by; it was on the policy, the advantage of instituting a general system of roads, or of the construction of this particular road in the bill. Did either of the national uses mentioned, or all of them, demand either the general system or this road? These were the points to be considered. And, first, of war. This was a national use. The nation might make roads for war, if, and so far as, their exigency demanded. And what was the character of this exigency? Its extent? The exigency was to measure the policy, to determine the propriety, of the particular road. Did this exigency demand a wide spread system of roads—(not in time of peace only—even in time of war. The particular road would be noticed presently.) The exigencies of war, in this respect, were not only extremely limited as to space, but occasional only, and of uncertain and temporary duration. Could such exigencies found an extended system of roads—sustain a general policy in this respect? The exigencies of war, in particular circumstances, demanded the condemnation of private property—that the suburbs of towns should be burnt. Would this justify a general policy of condemnation of property and burning the suburbs of towns in time of peace, or even in time of war, before a special case of the exigency arose? The argument was the same as to roads for war. The function was limited to the concurrence of the exigency, and measured by its extent.

Then, as to the mail and commerce. Was any man found affirming that roads ought to be made for the mail merely, supposing this the only use for them? No one asserted this proposition. Every one would disclaim it. Then there was an end to the suggestion of the mail exclusively furnishing the foundation of a general policy of making roads.

Next, as to commerce. The function claimed for the general authority in this respect, was to regulate commerce. Was not the construction violent, which converted a power to regulate, into a necessity to make roads for commerce? Pass this by, however, as approaching the constitutional question. Subservience to commerce between the States was a national use. Did it require the construction, in policy, (for that was the question) of roads for this object, where there were none previously to be found; that is to say, were this fact proved, there was no occasion for them? If there were occasion for roads, there would have been roads; or, if there were none in particular directions, no evidence could be better, that they were not demanded by the exigencies of commerce—the discussion now turning, not on the improvement of roads, but the policy of constructing them. The system found them, not a real warrant, but a color and a name only under commerce.

Mr. A. would now advert, [he said] in the way of illustration principally, (the question engaging real interest relating to the general policy,) to the character of the particular road which the bill presented. He should touch this point very briefly, as that which had been most discussed. If, as the opponent of the general policy, he had been called upon to state a case to expose it, he did not know that he could have selected one more favorable than the present. A road from the city of Washington to Buffalo, national and necessary! Why? Because the mail has its centre of emanation at the seat of Government, does it follow, that munitions of war, and troops, and the course of commerce, must emanate from the same point? Commerce demanding the construction of a road from Washington to Buffalo! What proposition could be stated more ludicrous? The course of such a road would be transverse to all the commerce intervening between these points. Gentlemen designed to take from us all merit in defeating their system, when they rested it on such projects. Where were the terminating points, and of course the tracts and directions of war and commerce? Along, and at every part of the seaboard frontier and the northern! Every road leading to either of these destinations, was, or might be, subservient to these uses. Had either branch of the road in discussion a termination in one of these frontiers? Both branches had; but both at points the most remote from the centre whence they were made to emanate, by routes the most indirect; diagonal to the tracts which commerce does, or war or commerce may be expected to pursue. Desirous to avoid detail, Mr. A. rested on the statement of the general incontrovertible proposition on this point. If the mere fact of a road terminating on a frontier made it national, all roads with that termination were of this character. How many points were there in the northern frontier, of less importance than Buffalo? Was Buffalo the chief point in relation to military operations during the late war? Were there not points of superior importance higher up, and a large extent of frontier lower down the lakes and the St. Lawrence? Why not all the roads on this frontier be comprehended in the principle set up? Mr. A. insisted that they might. He affirmed the principle in its full extent. The only advantage of Buffalo, in relation to supplies of military munition or commerce, was, that it constituted the point of termination of the longest of the New York canals, forming the obvious and best channel of communication through the States from the seaboard; and of course superseding the necessity for a road terminating at the same point.

Take the southern section of the road. Having its course through the centre and heart of the interior, it could have relation to war at its extreme point only, New Orleans; to which the proper and most available channel of supply of every kind was found in the never-failing and rapid current of the great stream on which it stood. Where tributary streams did not present themselves, or were deficient in water, the roads of the superior and supplying country determined principally to this natural channel. Were other points of the seaboard threatened, the course of transportation would be across the route of the proposed road, which approached the maritime frontier in a line converging, and not direct. The error of ascribing to either section of the road an important office in regard to war or commerce, proceeded from considering Washington as an issuing point of either, as of the mail. This was a fallacy, yet the sustaining principle of both branches of the road. The streams of defence or commerce had Washington for their source, no more than routes transverse to the direct approaches of the northern frontier or seaboard for their tracts, or single points, on these borders for their termination. The supplies of either would have reached their destination, in time to have accomplished their purposes, before the laggard course of this road could be traced.

His purpose to this point had been [said Mr. A.] to strip the system he was combating of unfounded pretensions. The value of internal improvement by roads, it was to be remembered, formed no part of the question. The question was, whether this Government should assume the function of making them. If it did, the benefit represented was, that another agent, with its funds, would be added to the States. But this benefit would be realized to a very partial extent only. Why should the States apply their funds to the object, after it had been settled that the General Government had taken on itself the office? Would not the States, in prudence, wait for the action of the General Government, and expect their improvements from its funds? There was but one consideration to prevent—that the General Government was to be limited to works national in their character. But that this limitation would be nominal merely, we were already instructed by the highest information of experience. The question was, therefore, not so much whether the General Government was to be added, as whether it was to take the place of the States in the office. The inquiry was not of a gain, but a substitution of an agency for others. And which of these functionaries, the General or State Governments, was the better fitted for the conduct of operations of this kind? Why was it admitted universally that an individual, or body of individuals, were better qualified than any Government, or than any corporation even? And a corporation better than a Government? All consent to the fact; and why? The proposition is established in reason, as well as experience. The more general and remote an authority, the less its qualification for an executive function of complication or detail. It must be so, in the nature of things. The superiority of the resources of the General Government was suggested, however, as the counterpoise to the admitted force of this objection to its energies in the policy of internal improvement. But why and whence this superiority? The common fountain of resource is the pockets of the people. If the General Government had any superiority of resource, then it had only to remit taxation beyond the demand of its peculiar and proper occasions, and the superiority disappeared.

An advantage not inferior was claimed for the General Government, as regarded the modes of raising money from its exclusive control over imposts, which were considered at once the most prolific and accessible of the sources of revenue. What was the real advantage of this, over the modes of direct taxation? It would be found to consist in the operations being covert, and the contributors not knowing what they paid. That is to say, the recommendation of this mode of raising revenue was its delusion—that it cheated those it fleeced. He would not [said Mr. A.] affirm it to be desirable that the General Government should be divested of this resource. It might be indispensable in war, when all resources were demanded; or in debt of large amount, which war might leave behind it; or occasionally as an arm of defensive; countervailing, commercial regulation. But when demanded by no imperious consideration of one of these classes, he did affirm, as his deliberate opinion, that the suspension of its exercise would be attended with decisive advantages. A federal Government was too remote from the people, and wore to their view too much the aspect of an unrelated Government, to be supervised with the rigor which, more than any other, it demanded. It was of peculiar importance from this cause—that, as regarded its modes of raising money, there should be no disguise; and of application of it, no extraordinary liability to abuse. Duties were a disguised mode of raising money, and internal improvements a mode of application of it, in the highest degree open to abuse. Why this last? Because works of this class demanded large disbursements, continued for long periods, and in complicated forms. Disbursements in these circumstances invited the attempt at abuse, and facilitated success. Because the operations which works of internal improvement required, were of a nature which, from their difficulties, removal from common knowledge, complexity, and the number of persons and extent of agency demanded, did not readily admit economy, and did readily admit infidelity as regarded both their execution and management. The General Government derived, therefore, no recommendation for the office of internal improvement from its peculiar control over imposts, more than from the nature of the function to be exercised.

A further recommendation of the prosecution of internal improvements by the General Government, had been urged, from the supposed tendency of this policy to introduce affinities of intercourse and interest between quarters not otherwise intimately related; and, in this manner, to exert an influence conducive to the harmony and cement of the Union. There could be no higher recommendation if it were well founded, certainly.

But was any influence of this auspicious character to be justly ascribed to the operations of the policy? Was not the real influence exactly the reverse? The different quarters of the Union had very unequal occasions and demands for works of internal improvement. Some had accomplished, or nearly so, their whole occasions of this description. Would a spirit of concord be diffused in these quarters, by the spectacle of large and continued appropriations in modes in relation to which they had no participation of interest in the objects or in the disbursements? Was a patient condition of feeling in these circumstances to be expected? Jealousies and discontent—would not the occurrences of these be inevitable? This was in the supposition of honest administration of the system. But how strong were the inducements to administration of an opposite character? Discontent would have to be appeased or repressed! By what methods? By gratifications to lull, or interested combinations to stifle, their expression. Where, too, was the limit to this evil in degree or time? Such a system prove a source of harmony! A cement to the Union! This was estimating the operation of scrambles of interest very strangely! Not harmony, but excitement, open or concealed distrust; and under outside amity, smothered hostility—these were the fruits. An extensive system of internal improvement in the name of harmony! The cry would indeed be “peace, peace, when there was no peace.” No! Such a system would prove, eventually, as fatal to the harmony as the purity of the Government. The Union would not break—that would imply a remaining solidity of consistency—it would dissolve under this influence; for rottenness does not break, but loses its coherence of parts from loss of the principles which cemented them!

But waiving other objections, supposing the policy good and wise, have gentlemen familiarized their minds—he might say, their nerves—to the complication of parts the system will involve? If this Government have roads, it must have supervisors of them. This very road will demand a number. The thousands which will be made to connect with it—the tens of thousands of which the principle which gave this birth will be prolific, what armies of officers must they call into being? Where is the complication of this system to have its end? Where the patronage, to call it by no harsher name? Were Congress converted to a board of public works, where would room be found for this new office? The Executive employed in its function of appointment, would not his hands be filled?

But, furthermore, the roads constructed must have provision for their protection. They cannot be left destitute in this respect, as the history of all roads of expensive construction proved. But the office of protection, it could not be confided to State regulation. This might be inadequate, or in its exercise remiss. A State might have no interest opposed to a road being placed in a condition to demand repair, or even a direct interest of reverse character. It might be jealous, moreover, of the competition of federal roads with those constructed by its own citizens or authority. There must be safeguards against all these contingencies. It had been decided in the courts that State authorities could not be compelled to give effect to the laws of the United States. They might assume and exercise this office, but it was optional. This option, however, had reference to laws of civil character only. As regarded those of penal character, it was uncontested, that the State courts could not have jurisdiction given to them, though they should be willing to exercise it. It would be an anomaly, said the lawyers, for one political authority to execute the penal laws of another. But the regulations required for the protection of roads demanded penalties. They could consist of little else than the denunciation and enforcement of penalties. In proportion to the multiplication of roads, these would have to be augmented, not in number only, but severity also. The States were precluded from the office of their enforcement. What remained? This Government must have a system of road police of its own, courts, and officers, and force. Its present paraphernalia in this respect would not suffice. Its courts and officers were too few, at distances too remote from each other, and from the scenes in which they might be called to act. These distinct judicatures and officers must be established for this special purpose, and provision made for the maintenance of their authority. And all this complication of arrangement was to be encountered—for what? For maintaining this Government in the exercise of a function, to say the least, demanded by no necessity, as the States could perform it very well, and for which, for the very reason that it is the General Government, it was wholly unfit.

Such was the character of this policy of internal improvement, to be executed by the Government of the Union! And now the question naturally arose, [said Mr. A.] in what manner it had happened that the policy had not only been proposed, but to no inconsiderable extent adopted and carried into practice? He was brought to this view of the subject, little agreeable, but most important. It had happened, by a peculiar coincidence, that the French revolution, the parent of so many important consequences, had its birth in the same year with the constitution of the United States. The agitations growing out of this event, it was known, had given the fullest employment in attention to external relations and interests to the Government with which we were most connected, and our own. Small scope remained for attention to subjects of mere interior concern. This state of things subsided with the general peace of 1813. This subsidence, in its general character and aspect so auspicious, was attended, however, with an incidental effect of most injurious operation. It led in this, and most of the European States, to the adoption of what is known as the protective, or tariff policy. He was not going into any discussion on this point, however invited by the allusions of the debate. Why? When so many, his superiors in judgment, retained the excitement which perseverance in this policy, here, had awakened, why was he calm and at ease, though partaking entirely the reprobation of its principle and operation? It was from the conviction that, in a free State, truth and public interest must eventually vindicate themselves. He had, therefore, no question that this policy must eventually frustrate itself. His belief was undoubting, that in a period which he hoped would not be very long, many who were now most forward in pressing and maintaining this system, would be ashamed to avow they had been its friends. We had some foretaste of this result at this session, in the invincible repugnance which had been manifested over and over again to bring the practical operation of the system under discussion. The time would come, and probably before the discussion would be permitted, when there would be nothing remaining to discuss. To return to the subject, however, the best and most beneficial institutions were never found exempt from a mixture of evil operation; nor was our excellent federal system exempt from this common law. The subsidence of the excitements growing out of a general state of war, by general peace, had left Government, here as elsewhere, room for the exercise of its energies in interior operation. Government could never be sufficiently imbued with the important truth, that its greatest evil was over-action; nor men get rid of the belief in which they were bred, that they were to regard its operation as the positive source, and not merely the guardian of their prosperity. Its proper beneficial province was, in preventing intrusion—keeping hands off—its own as well as the hands of others—from individual exertion and its fruits, which formed the real sources of all public as well as private prosperity. If he were called upon to state what had been pre-eminently the curse of human society, he should say too much government; and that produced, in a great degree, by the epidemic frenzy of believing that its operation was an active principle of prosperity. Our federal system was liable, in a peculiar manner, to mischief from over-action. From the vast and varied extent of surface it supervised, it embraced necessarily an unusually great diversity of interests—so great as in instances to become inimical. This must, of course, happen in a greater degree, and there would be a greater warfare of these interests under a federative system than any other. Contiguous interests were little disjointed or easily reconciled. Not so of the remote. To what did this lead? It had been said, in relation to religious sects, that their diversity and multiplication were the safety of the State, because, if any one aim at ascendancy, the others will be in activity to arrest it. But this remark was not transferable to interests of social character. It was true of religious sects, because it belonged to their nature to refuse coalescence, and the more violently as they approximated accordance in their tenets. The observation had held, over the whole world, in every region; but social interests observed no such law, and, least of all, under a federative system. They are widely dispersed, moderated by none of the affinities which neighborhood engenders, even among opposing interests. Each seeks its gratification. How are they to attain it? There was but one mode of any extensive success; and that was by the coalition of several, making the weak strong, and the strong safe. This mode had the advantage, besides, of extenuating responsibility and shame. Men were emboldened to do what, without this principle of support, they would hesitate to avow to their own thoughts. The principle itself was of inevitable operation in our system. Take that one of our public concerns which, in point of interest, had come nearly to absorb every other, as an illustration—the election to the Presidency. How much had this to do with merit in the candidates? Every body knew that was of subordinate consideration. No man, in a sphere so diffused, by personal merit or qualification, (excepting always the influence of revolutionary service, or some signal achievement,) could command a popularity sufficiently general to ensure success! Why? Every quarter had its pretender, limiting the circle of pretension of every other. How was any to obtain the goal, in the jostle of movements on the common object? It was only to be achieved by combination of countervailing or separated pretensions, till a predominance was created. The lever of some powerful motive must be set at work to roll the logs together, till the pile was raised to the required elevation. Did he mention this in any way of stigma to individuals? Not at all. He stated it [said Mr. A.] as an inevitable infirmity of our form of Federal Government. The thing was not so by accident or occasion, but necessity. So far from quarrelling with what was inevitable, for one, he was disposed to turn it to account; for there was no form of evil from which good might not be extracted for its alleviation. He was willing now—at any time—he avowed it—to go into coalition in relation to the election for the Presidency. Not for a man—he was done with solicitude as related to particular men. Of that folly he was cured completely. He only wondered how he could ever have fallen into it. Individual men, with very rare exceptions, must submit to the control of circumstances. Operating for an object so alluring, what policy could they be committed to, which would not bend to that which was personal—the extension of connexions—the debilitation of rivals—the advancement of pretensions. He mentioned this as no peculiar reproach. The thing, he repeated, was inevitable—must be so. Although he was ready and ripe then for coalition, in reference to the Presidency, it should not be on the pretensions of any individual. But if a candidate who promised to bring weight to the election stood committed by position, not profession, (for that he should have little value,) to vindicate interests and principles which he [Mr. A.] considered as suffering injustice and oppression from the present operation of the Government, for any candidate in these circumstances, he was willing to go into confederacy. If any candidate standing in this commitment promised strength to tear away this parasite tariff, which wound around the trunk of the Union to suck out its vitality, for this candidate he would go into coalition. If any promised weight to sink this picaroon policy of internal improvement, for him he would go into coalition.

He had been led [said Mr. A.] into this course of incidental remark in the way of illustration. Having no personal interest to serve or injure, it was no merit that he spoke with unreserve. The proposition he wished to inculcate was this, that coalition among special interests, embraced by our wide extending system, to obtain ascendancy at the expense of others, or the general interest, was an inherent evil of the system, the qualification to its otherwise transcendent excellence. In the theory, the strength and counsels of all were to be combined for the safeguard of each; but the operation did not correspond to the purity of the theory. It was this circumstance that furnished the key to incidents which had given so much occasion to surprise in our proceedings here. The smallest sums of money would sometimes be denied to the most essential public service, and the most prodigal grants made the same day, in lands or money, to schemes having obviously only doubtful or inconsiderable claims to favor. The solution was no secret to persons familiar with the scene. The disbursement in these cases furnished the motive, was the benefit contemplated, not the nominal object to be effected. Let the pension system be an example. This system, as regarded the selection of subjects in reference to indigence merely, was said (he believed truly) to have had its origin in a mistaken estimate of the numbers it would comprehend. Unceasing efforts were made of late, notwithstanding, to enlarge its comprehension. Had these efforts any connexion, as the aspect imported, with zeal to provide reward and relief for revolutionary service? No one was imposed on by pretence of this kind here. The real inducement was known to stand in contrast to any impulse of enthusiasm or generosity. It was a simple principle of pecuniary calculation. The purpose was to transfer a heavy poor rate to this Government, from quarters in which the burden pressed unequally, if each sustained its fair proportion; and then, by extension of principle, to augment to the utmost the benefit from the disbursement. There were, of course, exceptions, and a mixture of motive, but this was the leading one. A bill had passed one branch of the Legislature, at this very session, to enlarge the limit of indigence entitling to relief, to one thousand dollars—a sum which would be regarded as independence for the body of the population anywhere else, though it constituted legal indigence with us. If the extension had been proposed to a larger sum, within any boundary that would not threaten counteraction from public indignation and shame, the success would have been no less unequivocal.

The expenditures for fortifications illustrated the same course of remark. They had amounted to a large sum, say nine millions of dollars. Yesterday, a very moderate addition to the appropriation for arming, that is to say, rendering really effective and ready for use such as had been completed, had been refused by a large vote. There was no extensive interest engaged in the founding of cannon. The benefit from the disbursements for fortifications had been widely diffused.

What, then, [inquired Mr. A.] was the real evil principle of our General Government? It was, that the national treasury came unavoidably to be regarded in a foreign rather than domestic aspect; as something different from the State treasuries; and that combinations would be in perpetual generation or activity to subject it to contribution. His colleague [Mr. BARBOUR] had opened this view. He would take occasion to give it expansion and development. It was inevitable that the disbursements of the Government should be distributed with great inequality. The largest grew out of the public debt. The debt would accumulate with the accumulations of capital, necessarily; that is to say, in the region of commerce--on the seaboard. The naval expenditures, and those purely commercial, must follow the same course. The same frontier presented the quarter most demanding preparations of defence. The disbursements of a military character, therefore, whether for fortifications or the maintenance of troops, must, a large portion of them, seek the same direction. The seaboard must be the scene of the larger expenditures of the Government--the region to profit by their direct influences. Not the whole seaboard, however, in equable proportions. To the south of Norfolk, in Virginia, ports occurred at remote distances, and not in circumstances favorable to the attraction of the Government disbursements. The direct benefit of these disbursements must, therefore, be realized unequally, even on the seaboard. The interior and extreme West were nearly excluded from participation of it. Did he state this in any way of censure or arraignment? Not at all. This course of things was inevitable. The revenue, however, presented a very different history as regarded the source of its supply. The great mass of it was derived from the duties on imports. The exports furnished the imports; agriculture furnished the great mass of the exports. It was taxation on agriculture, therefore, that supplied nearly the entire amount of the revenue. It was, in a peculiar degree, too, the character of agriculture to consume the whole amount of its production; and the market for it being chiefly foreign with us, the great mass of this production paid contribution to Government in the duties on the returns procured by its exportation. A much larger proportion of the revenue of agriculture sustained this burden, than of other occupations. Much of that of commerce was derived from a further charge on agriculture; and manufactures had not yet obtained external markets to a considerable extent. Whilst, then, the commercial portion of the community, constituted chiefly by a part only of the seaboard, received the larger proportion of the revenue of the nation, the agricultural and interior paid nearly the whole. Could this inequality fail to be felt with sensibility? That was not to be supposed; and this sensibility was becoming the germ of the most menacing evils. The quarters which received most liberally from the public disbursements had the appetite for them whetted, not gratified. The parts which received nothing, or the least, anxiously sought indemnity. How was this to be obtained? By swelling disbursements in their own direction beyond occasion, or creating them when not required. Sympathies of artificial character tended, in this manner, to distend and multiply the expenditures of the Government. Disbursement became a thing good in itself, per se. Not one, but many interests were engendered in public prodigality; and, what was worse, these interests ran inevitably into combinations for mutual susten-tion; that is to say, into that state in which factitious strength was acquired, and restraining shame was removed! Profusion, on the part of the Government, was rendered an interest to be nurtured and protected by the proper guardians of the States, in the focus of its safety, its halls of legislation! And how nurtured? How protected? Nurtured in corruption! Protected by audacity! And where was the chief channel of this profusion, and main organ of its introduction as a system, to be found? The fact was notorious, [said Mr. A.] and his should be the voice to resound it through the land, this channel and organ were to be furnished by an extended application of the policy of internal improvement. This, this in hunc convertite itum, was the forehead on which public reprobation ought at once, and deeply, to burn its stigma for scorn to point "his unmoving finger at."

Reverting to this topic, one thing there was [he said] remarkable about this business of internal improvement, that, even in circumstances the most favorable, and in regard to projects the best conceived and executed, it was found, in a calculation of cost and profit, to prove a losing business. It did not make returns conformably to the average of ordinary pursuits on the capital invested; and this, with inconsiderable and not frequently occurring exceptions, was the just test in regard to the public, no less than individuals, of a good or bad business. Its capital was the source of the wealth of the nation. Whether employed by the public or individuals, if any portion did not return the ordinary and average rate of interest, the investment must, in the general, and excluding from view peculiar circumstances, be regarded as injudicious. Of the fact of the inability of even the best devised and most valuable works of internal improvement to sustain this test, very remarkable and entirely authentic evidence had just been furnished in New York. He referred to a report of the canal commissioners of that State, made the past winter, in answer to a call of the Senate. The canals of the State, it appears, not only did not reimburse the annual expenses and interest on the capital disbursed; it was made a question whether, by any augmentation of tolls, they could be made to do so. If improvements, giving the largest and best founded promise, executed on the best terms, pervading an extensive and rich country, (he had seen and could vouch from his own view,) commanding the transport of the products of a large part of a continent--if improvements, in these circumstances, marked by a distinction so peculiarly favorable, were found to fail, under the common test of judicious investment, what was to be said of all others inferior in pretension, and, yet more, for a general system spreading every where, and embracing every description as well as variety of projects?

In New York, a question was agitated, not merely of the propriety of taxation, in aid of the proceeds of the canals, but of a character yet more calculated to produce disturbance. It related to the confinement of the taxation to the tracts more immediately benefited by contiguity to the canal, instead of making it a general burden on the State. The temper which must grow from a discussion of such a character was easily appreciated. Yet this was the system, failing under circumstances the most favorable to pay, and threatening, even in the contracted and homogeneous sphere of a single State, to create disturbances, which was recommended as a bond of concord, as well as a source of profit, in a political community, contributing in different proportions to its expense, and deriving unequal advantages from its operation! Neighboring interests, which, when not intrinsically related, ran into easy reconciliation, were thrown into jar by it; yet its tendency to harmonize interests remote in position, and dissociated by character, was a principal argument in its support! Such was the logic which self-interest employed, when disposing of other interests, or those of the public!

Truly, [said Mr. A.] the best ground of vindication on which to place such a system, was that which had been in effect assumed in the debate, and formed the real inducing consideration, its tendency to equalize the disproportionate and unfair disbursements of the Government, as regarded the different quarters of the country. He really esteemed this principle of defence as colored with the most plausible show of reason and fairness. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ISACKS] with honest frankness, had stated this as a leading consideration in its support. He [Mr. A.] did not refer to the declaration with censure, but commendation. It proved, what he knew of this gentleman well before, that he was of too manly a character to refuse the avowal of a motive on which he was willing to act.

[Mr. ISACKS explained. He had indeed adverted to the expenditure of the public money in the West, as one beneficial consequence attendant on the proposed measure; but he never insisted on that as the primary consideration which induced him to be its advocate.]

Mr. ARCHER resumed. He was willing to trust to the considerations he had been stating, for evidence of the true character, both of the general policy and particular measure. But if the equalization of disbursements were to be admitted as any part of the inducing consideration, then he asked whether this principle might not be expected to lead to a careless selection of routes for roads, and an equally careless construction of them. Would not the temptation be strong to remissness, not to say abuse in the exercise of either function?

But this whole policy of internal improvement was itself but a part and an instrument of a further and larger, covered by a fair name, "the distribution system." Internal improvements supplied, though a large, yet only a partial waste of revenue. This "distribution system" was designed to comprehend the scattered streams into a current which should discharge the entire reservoir. Trace the principle in its relation to its first object, the public lands. Particular States had ceded to the General Government large tracts of territory. If the principle of this policy of distribution were just, then after these cessions, on the very day in which they had been made, aye, in the same hour, and before the ink of the signature was dry, it had been in the competency of the General Government to cut up the property among the States, returning their ratable shares to the proper owners. Was there a sense of justice so torpid, as not to be awakened to indignation at the statement of such a proposition? And yet if it were competent to the General Government now, it was equally competent then, to perpetrate this insolence of injustice; this proposition, coming, as it did, from a quarter in which no cession of lands had been ever made, might be supposed to labor under some defect of modesty. It stood entirely acquitted, however, upon this score, by comparison with another having reference to the same subject of the lands. He alluded to the claim advanced recently in some of the new States to the property of the whole of the public lands comprehended within their respective limits, as a result of the character of sovereignty which the United States had conceded to them, with this very condition annexed, of the reserve of this very property. A relation of war between States exposed to seizure and forfeiture the property of either within reach of the other. A relation of the closest amity of incorporation into a common political community, operated the same effect, according to the principle of the doctrine alluded to.

The distribution system, in relation to the final object of its grasp, the surplus revenue, as the first, the public lands, presented the same character. The distributable portions would be restored by a varying rule; and in different proportions, therefore, from those in which they were received. In the instant in which they were obtained by the one rule, they might be restored by the other, and the same parties receive more or less than they had contributed. Was not the inducement, then, decisive to derive revenue, to tax, for no other purpose than to distribute? What was to obstruct? or where was the limit to this sort of operation? The quarters deriving unequal advantages, would they not sustain each other? If it were one of the recommendations of internal improvements, that they operated to equalize the disbursements of the Government, here was an operation of an efficiency yet more extensive, by which more essential inequalities might be redressed. Were different quarters of the country in different conditions, as regarded pecuniary resources and wealth, from variety in the character of their products, the forms of their industry, or other causes, here was an engine of easy application for introducing a republican level, by the direct transfer of the redundancy of some parts to compensate the deficiencies of others. Where was the stopping point to men who could contemplate a policy founded on such a principle? And what must the men be who would submit to its exertion on them? A large proportion of the national revenue was derived from the labor of slaves. Two-fifths of these would not be counted on the proposed principle of distribution; that is to say, their owners, and, through their owners, themselves, would be excluded, in this proportion, from participation in the fund raised from the fruits of their own industry. This system had been proposed—much argued—was almost certain to be fastened on us. We were destined, if it were, to realize the misadventures of Sinbad, the famous sailor, (with whose story we were so familiar in our early days,) when he encountered the old man of the sea. The monster mounted on his neck with a pressure which no effort could shake off, and rode him with a remorselessness which no powers of endurance would long have been able to sustain. Sinbad contrived, by intoxicating the incubus, to destroy him. The case we were likely to present, was in every respect correspondent—the infliction no less remorseless—the relief no less hopeless, unless the drunkenness of triumph should unlock the death grasp from our necks, and assist us to tumble the oppression from its seat. Sir, I have been asked, [said Mr. A.] in relation to this road, whether, as my State denied the constitutional authority on this subject of roads, she would not prohibit the construction of the part which fell within her limits. I have invariably and promptly answered no! for that would be to resist the laws of the Union. I have been asked, whether we would not resort to the nullifying doctrine, so much spoken of lately. My answer, with equal promptitude, has been no! for that would be to refuse obedience to the laws of the Union. Virginia, while she feels with the keenest sensibility the irregular exercise of authority by this Government, of which she complains; while she continues, as she has ever been, foremost in vigilant and strenuous interposal to arrest all exercises of similar principle, will afford the spectacle of precedence, too, in endurance and in patience; whilst evil is sufferable, she will suffer; pursuing in the mean time her true doctrine of '98, to use every effort short of force or disunion, "to arrest its progress." She did not relinquish the hope that the time would never come, in which she should be driven to resort to any doctrine of character ulterior to this. If it did come, she would make this resort in sorrow. She invoked the sense, not of justice only, but, stronger, of superior benefits and real interest, to subdue the spirit of combination for peculiar advantages, which was the evil genius of our Federal Government. And, as the instant evil was the first to be regarded, she prayed heartily as he [Mr. A.] did, that sinister omens might be averted; and this policy of internal improvement might not be made the instrument to wrench to pieces a frame of polity inexpressibly admirable; which formed the fortress, not only of our safety, but of the hopes, and the cause of freedom, in all time, and through the world.

Judge Peck.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 7, 1830.

JUDGE PECK.

Mr. PETTIS obtained the leave of the House (by a suspension of the rule, 101 to 40) to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That James H. Peck, Judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, be permitted to make to this House any explanations he may think proper, in answer to the charges preferred against him by Luke E. Lawless, Esq., which charges have been reported on by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. P. said he moved this resolution in pursuance of an intimation which he gave the other day when he moved to lay Judge Peck's memorial on the table, to try the sense of the House in granting Judge P.'s request. He thought the indulgence proposed was a matter of justice to the Judge; that there was no precedent against it, as he had examined the authorities as far back as 1640.

A long debate ensued on the resolution, and on the modifications which were proposed to it, in which Messrs. STORRS, of New York, BUCHANAN, DODDRIDGE, DRAYTON, RAMSEY, CLAY, MARTIN, PETTIS, SPENCER, of New York, ELLSWORTH, HUNTINGTON, BATES, and BURGESS engaged. In the beginning of the debate,

Mr. MARTIN moved to strike out the word "explanation," and insert "any respectful written argument upon the law and matters of fact now in evidence before the House;" and after some time, to get rid of the debate,

Mr. PETTIS accepted this modification, and inserting further the words "or oral" after the word "written."

Thus amended, after an unsuccessful motion by Mr. DRAYTON to strike out the words "or oral," the resolution was agreed to without a count.

[The publishers give below, as far as they have received it, the debate on this subject.]

Mr. PETTIS, having offered his resolution, remarked, that he had examined all the precedents on this subject which he could discover, and there was no instance among them, in which a request, like that which he had made in behalf of Judge Peck, was denied. He adverted to the case of Lord Melville, and in truth to all which had occurred since 1640. He confidently hoped the privilege solicited would be freely accorded by Congress.

Mr. DODDRIDGE asked how many days it was supposed the Judge would require to prepare his defence. The time of the House, at this season, was peculiarly precious.

Mr. PETTIS supposed he would be prepared by Monday next.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, inquired whether it was anticipated that the Judge intended to submit to the House any thing more than points of law and matters of fact, appertaining to the judicial proceedings complained of.

Mr. PETTIS replied, he believed these were all that was to be expected from him.

Mr. ELLSWORTH observed, that the objection urged by the gentleman from New York [Mr. STORRS] applied to the amendment as much as to the bill. We have no constitutional power to pass this amendment. We are only to inquire, and, if we see cause, direct an impeachment. Upon the merits we cannot act definitively; besides, we might do Judge Peck great injustice; he has yet had no opportunity to defend. Mr. E. said he was in favor of the report and the resolution as they came from the committee. When the papers in this case had been presented to the Judiciary Committee, he had read them again and again, with the greatest anxiety; and it was with the utmost reluctance that he came to the conclusion at which he finally arrived. He felt that it was a grave thing to put a judicial officer of this Government to his trial for his character, his office, his subsistence, and, in a word, for all that is dear to humanity, and to make the last and most sublime appeal known to the constitution, by placing him before the Senate in the last resort. But there was another view of the subject, which struck his mind with equal force. He saw an officer occupying an elevated station, and clothed with the authority of this Government, calling before him a fellow-citizen, known as a man of talent and respectability in his profession, and, by a summary process, stripping him of the exercise of that profession, clothing him with shame, and incarcerating him in a felon's dungeon, the place of disgrace and infamy. He had endeavored to view the case with impartiality, and not to give way to any undue feeling; and, after having attentively heard the statement of facts presented by Mr. Lawless, he had come to the conclusion that if these facts were substantiated by testimony, the impeachment ought to proceed.

It was not now his intention to go into the merits of this case. The subject had been exhausted. But, as he had been a member of the Judiciary Committee, and had given his voice for the impeachment of Judge Peck, he trusted the House would listen to him for a few moments.

It appeared that the Judge, three months after delivering his opinion in the case of Soulard, and three months after the final disposition of the case and the adjournment of his court, committed it to paper, and sent it to the public press. It was an opinion involving the landed titles of almost the whole territory where he resided. He published it, as it seemed, at the request of a lawyer, or lawyers; and manifestly for the purpose of spreading opinions, exciting feelings, and leading to a certain line of conduct in the community where it was published. Perhaps this might be all right; he should find no fault with it; shortly after the publication of this opinion of the Judge, a professional gentleman, nearly concerned in the result of that opinion, had come before the public in another paper, and exposed what he conceived to be certain errors into which the Judge had fallen, which might have been called for, to save his friends or clients from the grasp of speculators, until a final trial in the Supreme Court, and especially as such publicity had been given to the opinion. Mr. E. said he had looked over both these papers; and he there declared, in his place, and was willing to risk his reputation on the opinion, that there was not any thing in this commentary in the least degree reproachful to Judge Peck, either as a man or as a judge; nothing that looked in the least like a contempt of court, or an impeachment of the integrity or character of the presiding officer, unless pointing out error, if there really be any, is an offence. He had seen similar comments in the newspapers a thousand times before. And the House was now come to the crisis, when it must decide whether it would sanction the arrest and imprisonment of an individual by a judge for commenting on one of his opinions. This [said Mr. E.] is the question we are called upon to settle this day. Finding that the rights of an individual had been violated, I put this query solemnly to myself: is there any thing in the conduct of this individual to justify such a proceeding? And I was compelled to answer it in the negative. Judge Peck had neither jurisdiction nor provocation. He had finished the case, adjourned the court, and descended from his judicial station to that of an essayist of a newspaper. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PETTIS] says that a spirit has gone abroad, of reckless and determined hostility to the judiciary; but, let me tell that gentleman, that if conduct like this shall go abroad with the sanction and seal of this House upon it, he may bid adieu to the honor and independence of the judiciary henceforward. Sir, have the days of the star chamber come upon us? Shall it be declared to the American people, that, after a judge has given his opinion, and dismissed the cause, he may arrest a citizen, drag him before his tribunal, and say to him, you have written strictures on my opinion, which I consider derogatory to me, and I, therefore, send you to prison, and take away your livelihood for eighteen months. I tell you, you are a base calumniator, a libeller, and, if you were in China, your house would be painted black, as an emblem of the blackness of your heart, and as a warning to society. Yet it is now proposed that this House shall say, it does not entirely approve of the conduct of the Judge, but impeachment is a solemn affair: the man has been punished enough already, now let him alone. Sir, I do not wish to appeal to the feelings of the House; but while I see a free citizen of this republic made the subject of high-handed oppression like this, I feel it to be the imperious duty of this House to send the man who appears to be guilty of it to his trial before another and constitutional tribunal.

Let me now proceed to answer one or two objections, which have been urged by the opponents of impeachment. And, first, it has been said that we may not impeach unless there is evidence of corruption. There need not be corruption in the common sense in which that term is used. A wicked motive is enough. Error in judgment is not impeachable, but wicked conduct and a wicked motive are. Sir, did any one vote to impeach Judge Pickering, of New Hampshire, for corruption? No, sir; he was impeached for intemperance, but not for corruption. Suppose the wicked conduct of the judge himself brings his court into contempt; suppose that conduct is arbitrary and oppressive, ought we to pass it over with slight language? In all the eight articles against Judge Chase, he was charged with an arbitrary exercise of judicial power. There was scarce one article, if I remember right, which charged him with direct corruption. The whole prosecution was founded on the idea that his conduct was arbitrary, and though he was not finally convicted, it was because the facts did not bear out the charge. Though you cannot show that a judge has been bought, you may show his oppressive and wicked conduct, and that he ought to be turned out of office. The constitution says that judges shall hold their office during good behavior. I do not say that every species of wrong behavior is such as to forfeit his office, but I say that there may be other ill behavior besides taking a bribe. I do on my soul believe that Judge Peck has been guilty of conduct, if not corrupt, certainly arbitrary in the extreme. It has been said that Lawless was personally interested in the cases in which he was counsel, and that all the counsel were opposed in opinion to the Judge. Admit it. Is that any reason that the Judge should act oppressively? His opinion and station were perfectly independent; he was not bound to regard the notions of counsel. Sir, the merits of this case lie within a very small compass. The question is, whether the criticisms of Lawless were just or not, and whether, admitting them to be erroneous, the Judge might, on that account, shut him up in jail, and strip him of his profession. There appears to me to have been a sickly sensibility in this judge. He seems to have resolved to come out, and by his judicial thunder to demonstrate that he was yet alive, that he had a court, and that he was not to be contradicted or reviewed. He, therefore, sent out, brought in his victim, cast him in prison, covered him with infamy, and did what in him lay to deprive him of his livelihood. Unless it can be shown that he had authority so to do, and that he acted on justifiable cause, I for one am prepared to impeach him.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, it was not his purpose to enter into any argument in this stage of the proceeding. He felt rather in favor of the resolution which had been moved by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PERRIS.] He, too, had examined the British precedents, and found that in several cases the party had been admitted to the floor of the House of Commons, simply to make an argument on the testimony which had been previously given to the House. This was the utmost extent of the privilege, so far as he had examined the cases, except in a single instance—that of Warren Hastings. The gentleman, as he understood, did not now ask that new witnesses should be sent for and examined: and if the request of the accused was limited to a mere permission to make an exposition of the law, and an argument upon the facts, as they appeared in the testimony already taken, he should not have the smallest objection.

Mr. DRAYTON said, that, in moving to strike out the words "or oral," he had had no intention of preventing the individual concerned from availing himself of the full benefit of what the resolution proposed to grant to him, but had been influenced by the consideration, that, if his exposition should be made in writing; all the members of the House would have an opportunity of examining it; but, if made orally, it would be impossible that all the members should distinctly hear it, and, if they did, they would probably not retain the substance of it distinctly in their memories. This was one reason which actuated him. Another was, that, in his opinion, ill consequences would be likely to arise from the personal appearance of the memorialist before the House. He might aver that a material fact could be established by testimony incorrectly or imperfectly referred to in the report of the committee, and ask leave to introduce it fully. Should his application be rejected, he might regard the permission to be heard as illusory. Should his application be acceded to, we should be drawn into a trial of the cause. It had been said that this House was "the grand inquest of the nation," thus assimilating its powers and jurisdiction to those of the British Parliament. This is a radical error. This House has no other inquisitorial authority than such as is expressly delegated to it by the constitution, and this is restricted to the power of impeaching certain civil officers of the United States for crimes and misdemeanors. The British House of Commons is "the grand inquest of the nation." In the exercise of this prerogative, they may proceed against any persons, for any offences, and in any manner which they may deem expedient. They may prefer accusations, informations, or impeachments, or enact bills of pains and penalties, altering the rules of law or evidence. They have, accordingly, acted under all these modes. They have accused an individual of misdemeanors, and ordered a jury to be empanelled for the trial, as in the case of Alice Pierce; they have impeached a clergyman for a libel, an offence cognizable by the courts of common law, as in the case of Sacheverel; they have passed bills of pains and penalties, as in the case of Sir John Fenwick, who was executed under a statute dispensing with the proof of two witnesses to an act of treason, as required by the statute of Edward III. From this brief statement, it must be apparent that analogies drawn between the inquisitorial powers of the British House of Commons and of the House of Representatives of the United States, are fallacious. The precedents, therefore, which have been cited, of the manner of proceeding when the British House of Commons accuse or impeach, are calculated to mislead, not to enlighten, our judgments. We must be regulated by our own constitution in the construction of the power of impeachment. That power is limited, in the constitution, to an inquiry to be instituted by this House, whether sufficient grounds exist to warrant the accusation of a civil officer of the United States before the Senate. Unless in this inquiry the House be confined to what is termed ex parte testimony, there will be no bounds set to their inquiry—they must, then, hear all the evidence which can be adduced by him who prefers the charges, and by him against whom they are preferred, and thus the House will, in fact, try a cause over which the constitution has given to them no other power than to decide whether it shall be tried by another tribunal. In what I have said, I desire not to be understood as being opposed to granting permission to the memorialist to be heard, with the limitations expressed in the resolution. I am willing that he should have an opportunity to comment upon the statements and the facts which are contained in the report; but, as I think that it would be more advantageous to him to submit a written than an oral argument, and as the time of the House would be saved by the former mode of proceeding, I therefore am in favor of the amendment which I have offered.

Judge Peck.

Mr. PETTIS said that the privilege would, in fact, amount to nothing, unless the Judge, in his communication to the House, should be permitted to state the facts as they had appeared in testimony, and to show how the law applied to them.

Mr. DRAYTON inquired what course was to be pursued, suppose the Judge should make some statement which was disputed, and should then ask to support it by testimony.

Mr. PETTIS replied, that each gentleman would, of course, decide for himself. The Judge's statement could not certainly be received in opposition to the testimony delivered before the committee, nor would the House be in any wise bound by the statements he might make. If those statements conflicted with the evidence, it would be for the House to decide between them.

Mr. RAMSEY observed, that, if Judge Peck, who was the accused party, was to be permitted to make his own statements before the House, he thought it would be no more than fair that Mr. Lawless, who was his accuser, should be allowed the same privilege. The one had as good a right to be heard as the other. Mr. R. accordingly moved so to amend the resolution, but withdrew his amendment at the request of Mr. CLAY, who said that he could not perceive any difficulty in this case. The proposition was a single and a simple one. Let the Judge submit in writing an exposition both of the facts and the law. This would facilitate all gentlemen in coming to a conclusion. The Judge had not asked leave to state any facts which differed from those in the testimony. His friend had disclaimed, in his name, any such purpose. He thought it was a right which ought not to be denied to an accused person, and he was persuaded that the granting of it would lessen the difficulty of the House in coming to a just conclusion.

Mr. MARTIN said that he had an amendment which he presumed would answer the views of the House generally. He believed there were none who supposed that the Judge was to be permitted to state facts in his own favor, in contradiction to those which had appeared in the testimony before the committee; that thus an issue was to be made up, and that the House was to hear an argument on that issue. Such a thing could not be thought of for a moment. Mr. M. was not indeed fully prepared to say how far it would be proper to hear the Judge at all, but, in so important a case, he was for extending the rule of proceeding as far in favor of the accused as propriety would admit. He would not confine the Judge to too narrow rules in an investigation so important to his own individual reputation, and one having so near a bearing on our judiciary. The House surely were not afraid to trust themselves. He, for one, was disposed to listen to the Judge with all good feeling, but he should also, he hoped, exercise over his feelings a strong restraint of caution, while he endeavored to do strict justice between the accused party and the United States. Let him submit a written law argument. Let the House have an opportunity of hearing what his own views were. Few subjects involved more points of difficulty than the doctrine of contempts, and Mr. M. for one, was anxious to hear what could be said on both sides. In such a case, he should not stop to look at precedents. Mr. M. then moved an amendment, which was at first accepted by Mr. PETTIS as a modification; but, after that gentleman had conferred for a moment with the Judge, he concluded not to accept it, but modified his original resolution by inserting the word "written" before "statement," so as to propose that the Judge might deliver a written exposition of his views before the House.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, said that the object of the resolution, as he understood it, was to permit Judge Peck to be heard. This object differed materially from that expressed in the Judge's memorial, where he prayed not only that he might be heard, but that additional witnesses might be sent for to Missouri. As to receiving a written exposition from the accused, in relation to the law which he supposed to have authorized him in what he had done, and also his commentary on the facts which had appeared in evidence, Mr. S. had no objections. If there was any law which went to justify his conduct, let him have an opportunity of showing it. Mr. S. would willingly acquiesce, provided his explanation were made before Monday next. The session was now far advanced; and, if Judge Peck were guilty, the justice of the country required that there should be no delay in bringing him to punishment.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, he should not suffer himself to be betrayed into any feeling by the remarks which the gentleman from Missouri had made, or by any remarks which he could make. That gentleman had very evidently betrayed his own feelings in the case. He trusted he should treat the subject temperately and calmly. As to what my opinion is, [said Mr. B.] that is contained in the report of the Judiciary Committee; nor had I ever an opinion on any subject more clear and decided. If the report "betrays" any feeling on my part, it is before the House, and before the country, and they will judge. The question now before us is this, and this only: What is the proper mode of proceeding for us to adopt? My desire is that the House may establish such a precedent as shall protect the interests of the accused in all future time. The Judiciary Committee had Judge Chase's trial before them. The mode of proceeding in that trial they considered as strictly proper and delicate. The committee, in that case, were directed to report their opinion on the charges against Judge Chase which had been made on the floor of the House. For the purpose of enabling them to do so, they procured all the testimony in their power. This they reported to the House, together with a simple statement of their own opinion upon it. Nothing else. And why? I presume that, as it was a judicial proceeding, they wished to leave every gentleman to decide for himself upon the naked testimony. They considered one member as competent to decide as another. Their report was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and there it was fully discussed. With this precedent before us, the committee are not justly liable to the imputation of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL] who thought it very singular that the committee did not specify the charges, and give the grounds and reasons of their conclusion. If the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union shall concur with the Judiciary Committee in their view of the case, then the House will appoint a committee to draught articles of impeachment, and thus present the charges in a specific form. These articles will be reported to the House, and the House will discuss and decide upon them. Until after this second decision shall have been made, the accused will not be called upon to answer. The course pursued in the case of Judge Chase gave to the party every thing he could reasonably desire.

Sir, what does Judge Peck state in this memorial? Does he allege he had requested of the Judiciary Committee that other witnesses should be examined? This he could not state, for the fact was not so. He made no such request; and I never even suspected that he had such a wish. Had he requested it, I, for one, should have thought it a very grave question, and one that demanded the most serious consideration. It is a question on which I confess my mind is not at this time fully made up. But that is not the question before us. We are now called upon to decide whether, after Judge Peck had declined to make such a request in the committee, and after the committee have reported the testimony, and their opinion upon it, to the House, it is proper to allow him at this stage of the proceeding to make his defence and examine his witnesses either before the same committee or before the House.

Judge Peck.

Our own precedents, it is said, differ from each other; but this is not the case, so far as they relate to proceedings against judges.

As to the case of the Vice President, he presented his own case before the House, and demanded an investigation. All cases are not necessarily subject to the same rule. One case may demand one course of proceeding, and another case require a different mode.

The remark which excited the ire of the gentleman from Missouri, was merely a response to an opinion expressed by the Judge in his memorial. I said that he had made his case rather worse than better, by his cross-examination. I am still of that opinion.

I believe the best course of proceeding in such cases, is that which the House have hitherto adopted. Give a committee charge of the complaint, and they will seek for disinterested witnesses from all sources within their power; they will inquire who is least excited? Who will be likely to give the most correct statement of facts? If they shall do this, and honestly aim at attaining the ends of public justice, without violating the rights of the accused, we shall have taken the most correct course. I am in favor of referring this whole case to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If that course shall be adopted, I shall not call up the report this day, but will endeavor to examine the precedents as well in England as in this country, and lay the result before the House.

As to the course pursued by the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania, in similar cases, which has been referred to by my colleague, [Mr. SUTHERLAND] of hearing the defence of the accused, and examining his witnesses, before voting an impeachment, it has never met my approbation. I think I have observed great inconvenience, if not great injustice, from that mode of proceeding. It must necessarily prejudice the cause. The accused, instead of going before the Senate without prejudice, shielded by the presumption, both of law and justice, that he is innocent until he shall be proved to be guilty, will be arraigned at their bar, after having been convicted, upon a full trial, by the deliberate judgment of the House. I repeat the opinion, that the best mode of attaining justice is to entrust such complaints to a standing committee, selected from all portions of the Union; and which, from its very constitution, must almost necessarily be impartial. The members of such a committee, acting under the responsibility which they owe to the House and to the country, and clothed with the power of sending for persons and papers, will ever be careful to draw their testimony from pure fountains. After having collected from impartial sources sufficient testimony to satisfy their consciences that the accused ought to be impeached, they will then report this testimony, with their opinion, to the House, as has been done upon the present occasion, and leave each member to judge of its effect for themselves. In this manner the rights of the accused will be best protected, and the interests of justice best subserved.

If Judge Peck had insinuated, when before the committee, that the parol testimony had presented an incorrect statement of the transaction, and had asked that other witnesses might be examined, I should have felt much inclined, I confess, to grant the request. But no such request was made or intimated. We might have called on the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. FERRIS] to testify, and I am sorry Judge Peck did not make the suggestion. But

I protest against reflecting upon the committee, as though they had not been disposed to elicit the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

In conclusion, I say, let a suitable precedent now be established for future times. Let it be solemnly determined whether a judge, when accused, shall be at liberty to demand that his whole cause shall be tried before the House of Representatives before an impeachment is resolved upon.

In deciding this question, I trust the House will come to such a conclusion as will best secure the rights of the people and the accused, both now and hereafter.

Mr. ELLSWORTH observed that the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina brought the House to what he considered the real question, and it was one which involved a point of great interest, but not of much difficulty, though gentlemen seemed not fully to agree. Whether we are to follow precedents already established in the cases of Judges Chase and Pickering, or of William Blount, Senator, or are to mark a new course to be followed hereafter, it is important that we act with caution, doing justice to the accuser and accused, as well as to the public. If the House adopted the amendment, it would be only on the idea that the Judge was to be impeached or not, according to the judgment of the House on the facts already in evidence. On those facts he should be glad to hear the commentary of the accused, who ought certainly to have an opportunity of saying in his own behalf whatever he had to say. But, if a contrary course should be adopted, and the House should reject the amendment, he must conclude the House intended, upon this inquiry, that the accused should have liberty to introduce such evidence as he pleased, and thus to put the matter into the hands of the accused. Mr. E. said he could not consent to such a course. This House has no constitutional power to try the accused. We are to inquire after the oppression complained of, and to inquire until we are satisfied that an impeachment is necessary, but we can go no further; we cannot try the case. Is the accused to bring before us such witnesses as he pleases, to take the defence into his own hands, employ counsel, and try the charges fully and perfectly? This is not our business. We have no charges framed, nor can we have, until we decide to go forward. From what has been said on this debate, [said Mr. E.] he was convinced some gentlemen misapprehended the nature of the duties of the committee on which he served.

This House was the grand inquest of the nation. A judge of the United States' court was here complained of by a private citizen, for an alleged trespass upon his rights. The complaint had been presented to this House, who had referred the case to one of its own committees. The committee, in the discharge of their duty, had sent for all such witnesses as might enable them best to elicit the truth of the case; but he could assure the House that the selection had not been made ex parte. The committee had endeavored to obtain all such testimony as would enable them to present the case fairly to the House. The question now was, whether they should say to the accused, we will hear you on the testimony already obtained, or whether they would go further, and suffer the accused to introduce new testimony.

Of the preliminary facts, he could say that they were not of an ex parte nature. No doubt it was the duty of the House to get all the information they might deem necessary to arrive at the truth; but he denied the policy or the propriety of admitting an accused party to go before a committee into a thorough trial of his whole cause, with counsel to aid him, and then to call upon this House to say whether he was guilty or not. The committee had sent to Missouri for A and B, for C and D, including persons both for and against the accused. They might have procured other testimony, but they obtained all that they thought necessary. It was now for the House to say whether the accused should have another hearing. English precedents in Parliament have been searched, and with the exception of Warren Hastings, who was impeached by Edmund Burke, rising in his place, the accused has never introduced evidence on the preliminary inquiry. If the amendment was adopted, he should understand the House as coming to the conclusion, that, as a grand jury, they were to get all the facts necessary to show whether there was or was not ground of impeachment. But they were not to hear Judge Peck, as if he were on his trial before them; the House was not the body appointed to try him; and he hoped they would proceed on the ground that the accused was to confine his argument to such facts alone as this House might choose to investigate, and not to take the House into his own hands, as though he were to have a full trial on this floor.

Mr. HUNTINGTON addressed the Chair, in substance as follows:

I have read the evidence on which the resolution now under consideration is founded, with attention, not only because I am called to give my vote on that resolution, but because the subject of it is of deep interest to the parties immediately interested in it, and to the nation. If the Judge, whose official conduct is condemned, has so conducted as to require the constitutional interposition of this House, in the form of impeachment, we ought not to shrink from the duty imposed upon us, from a regard to his reputation, his future standing, or the severity of the punishment which will follow conviction. It is due, in such case, to the indignity offered to the country, to the disgrace brought upon the judicial office, to the honor and safety of the bar, that this House should seek to remove from a high and important station a judge who fills it so unworthily. But if he has committed no offence worthy such stripes—none embraced in the constitution from which we derive our authority to act—then it is due to him to give him our protection, to sustain his reputation, and to declare him innocent of that offence which would endanger the loss both of office and character.

Notwithstanding the respectable source from which this resolution has emanated, and with no feelings but those which proceed from an anxious desire to judge righteously, (for all the parties more immediately interested are strangers to me,) I cannot concur in the result to which the Committee on the Judiciary have come, on this interesting subject: and I hope that, in submitting the reasons on which my opinion is founded, I shall not be justly obnoxious to the imputation of favoring judicial tyranny, the worst of all tyranny, because so difficult to detect, and so oppressive in its consequences. I am a member of the same profession with the individual who is said to have been oppressed, and I can surely wish no rule should be applied to my brethren in Missouri, which I should repudiate when sought to be applied to myself.

The resolution submitted to us is, that James H. Peck be impeached of high misdemeanors in office. It is somewhat difficult, if not impossible, to give a definition of the term misdemeanor, as used in the constitution, which will include every case embraced by that word. It does not mean, merely, an indictable offence at common law; for if a judge should come on to the bench in a state of intoxication, or, while there, should employ himself in playing games of chance, he ought, in either case, to be impeached. Nor does the term include incompetency to discharge the duties of the office, arising from physical or mental inability. The judge holds his office "during good behavior;" but that phrase is the opposite of the causes for which he may be impeached—"high crimes and misdemeanors." What constitutes a judicial misdemeanor, subjecting to impeachment, must depend upon the circumstances of each case as they exist. As applied to this case, I think it susceptible of a precise definition.

It is an assumption of judicial power, exercised to the injury of an individual, and done malò animo.

To sustain this resolution, the committee must be satisfied that Judge Peck had no power to imprison, and erase from the roll of attorneys the name of Mr. Lawless, for the causes which led him to do it; that the exercise of this power operated to the injury of Mr. Lawless; and that it was done with a corrupt motive. If either of these points is with the Judge, the resolution ought not to pass. If they are all against him, it ought to be adopted.

I shall spend no time on the inquiry, whether Mr. Lawless sustained an injury by reason of the proceedings instituted against him, for it is obvious that a suspension from practice for eighteen months, and the deprivation of his personal liberty for four hours, were both injurious to him. The right, on the part of the Judge, to do these acts, and the motives with which they were done, are the only topics to which I shall ask the attention of the committee.

As to the right. Was the conduct of Mr. Lawless such as to justify the court in treating it as a contempt, punishable by imprisonment and suspension from practice? It may be assumed as a correct, legal proposition, that any publication, the object and design of which is to corrupt the fountains of justice, by its tendency improperly to affect the due administration of it in causes which are depending in the courts of law or equity, is a contempt, authorizing a summary proceeding by process of attachment, punishable by fine and imprisonment, and, in case of an attorney, by suspension from practice. And it is immaterial whether the effect is attempted to be produced by the operation of the publication on the judge, the jurors, the witnesses, or the public. It is equally immaterial what the text is, which is made the basis of the publication; it may be the opinion of a judge in a cause previously decided, or it may be any thing else; nor is it necessary that the design of the writer should have been accomplished. The essence of the offence consists in the intent with which the publication is made, and its tendency improperly to affect the decision of causes undetermined. Such is the law of contempts, as it relates to the proceedings which have led to the resolution before us; and its application to these proceedings is now to be considered.

Before, however, this is done, I deem it necessary to notice some remarks which have fallen from my friends from Pennsylvania and New York, [Mr. BUCHANAN and Mr. STORRS] which, in my judgment, have no connexion with the merits of the question under consideration, and are calculated to produce impressions not justified by the acts of the Judge which are complained of. I will not stop to examine whether these gentlemen, in the style and manner of debate in which they indulged, exhibited more feeling than properly belonged to the station which they occupy; for I am perfectly sure that neither of them was actuated by any other consideration than that high sense of duty which we all ought to feel; but I must say, topics have been introduced, which deserve, I will not say reprehensions, but a reply. My friend from New York told the committee, yesterday, that Judge Peck, in his written apology, had stated that, if he had erred in this matter, it was an error on the side of Government, and calculated to protect its interests.

[Here Mr. STORRS explained. The gentleman had misapprehended him. The Judge, in the paper which he had furnished, did show that he had erred on the side of the Government, and enumerated a number of cases where his decisions had the effect of saving the public land.]

Exactly as I understood him, [said Mr. H.] though not expressed in the same terms. Sir, the observation was calculated to impress the committee with the idea that the Judge wished us to recollect that if he had proceeded in an unlawful manner, he ought to be shielded, because he had done so in order to favor the Government. Sir, no such conclusion will follow an examination of that paper.

Judge Peck.

All that the Judge says is this: that, as very numerous claims were pending, which embraced the same principles as the case of Souldard, he felt it to be his duty to give that case a most thorough and close examination; and I say, that whoever reads that opinion, cannot avoid coming to the conclusion that it is both an elaborate production, and one written in good faith.

But we are told that the opinion of the Judge, except in one particular, was extra-judicial. If this was intended to afford an excuse for the criticism of Mr. Lawless, I differ most materially from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN] and my friend from Virginia, [Mr. DONNIDGES.] Neither do I agree with them in relation to these obituary dicta. My poor reading has led me to conclude that it is not best to travel out of the record, and to express a legal opinion in a case not before the court. But may I not ask whether, in this opinion delivered by Judge Peck in the case of Souldard, any man can see aught that looks like an extra-judicial opinion. He first settled the case, and he needed not to have gone any further; but he then proceeds as if he would say, if I have been wrong thus far, there is another point which makes equally against the claimants. That is all he has done. He gives different reasons for coming to the same result. They are reasons called for by the case, and such as it was not only proper, but his duty, to consider and discuss. The gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to lay stress on the fact that the Judge printed his opinion in a newspaper. If that remark was intended to have any effect, it must be this, that such a proceeding was derogatory to his judicial station. The gentleman says that when the Judge had given his opinion, there he ought to have stopped; but I ask, was there any thing improper in publishing his opinion? It is a proceeding, which, if not frequent, yet sometimes occurs.

When the bar requested this publication, ought the Judge to have told them that a compliance would be derogatory to the profession? But the gentleman adds that the Judge published this opinion in a political newspaper. Now, sir, I should be glad to know where he could have found any paper which was not political. If it was lawful for him to publish at all, I do not know where he must have gone to do it.

[Here Mr. BUCHANAN explained. As reference had several times been made to what he had said on that subject, he wished to remind the committee that he had said at the time that he knew the character of the paper only from the Judge himself; it had been designated by him as a "political newspaper."]

But the honorable gentleman, I will not say in the coloring he gave to the testimony, but in his comments and argument, inquired why Judge Peck solicited the name of the publisher. Did not the Judge know who he was? Was not his name on the paper? Now, sir, if this was meant for any thing, it was to strengthen the idea that the Judge had selected his victim. But surely the gentleman knows that no attachment could issue to bring the party before the court, without an affidavit to found it upon. And though the Judge might see on the face of the paper that A B was the publisher, he could not issue a rule on such evidence—it must be of record. There was, then, nothing improper in taking steps to procure an affidavit.

But the gentleman asks, why call particularly on Lawless, when all the bar and many other persons were present? Why, sir, Lawless was not specially called. The Judge inquired if any one present knew who was the publisher of that paper, and Mr. Lawless volunteered an answer to the question. Without that answer he could not have proceeded an inch. After Mr. Lawless (and the fact is creditable to him certainly) had verified the fact, then the attachment issued. But I have more to do with the matter than the manner of the Judge. And I proceed to inquire. Did Judge Peck assume an authority which he did not rightfully possess?

The committee has been told, over and over, in a style the most warm and animated, that his conduct was arbitrary, oppressive, unconstitutional—calculated to destroy the liberty of the press, and that this gross assumption of power was called forth by the exercise, on the part of Lawless, of his undeniable and unalienable right as a free citizen of this republic. Sir, let us descend a little from this lofty pinnacle, and let us calmly and coolly ask what did Mr. Lawless do? And was his act a contempt of court? He published an article signed "A Citizen" in one of the papers of St. Louis, and which has been called "a respectful commentary" on the Judge's opinion. Now, sir, there is no member of this House, whose voice would be sooner or louder raised against any attempt to suppress the legitimate freedom of the press. I hope I shall not be charged with any desire to violate it. And I hope that our courts of justice will never be held to be so sacred, that their adjudications may not be the subject of fair and temperate animadversion. No man is above it, or ought to be above it. The moment you curtail the freedom of the press, you destroy liberty.

But, sir, while I guard the freedom, I am as greatly opposed to the licentiousness of the press; I will take care that the object of such animadversions shall not be to bring down upon a court the vengeance of the public, and thus affect the great and vital interests of justice, and the peace and well being of society. The case has been treated as if this article, signed "A Citizen," was no more than a fair and honest commentary on the opinion published by the Judge. Sir, was this so? Were there not causes pending, of a similar kind with that which had been decided? It is admitted—it appears in evidence, there were other causes depending on Spanish concessions to be adjudged in that court. Look then at this publication, and see what its object was. What was its motive? And what was likely to be its effect on the causes pending? Sir, what does Mr. Lawless tell us? (No doubt he has a right to come here and spread his wrongs before this House, if he has suffered any—but he is the accuser—the witness in his own cause.) And what other witnesses have we? His two counsel. I do not deny that these gentlemen are competent witnesses—but what does every man of common sense know? That a party in interest or his counsel are to be heard with allowance for their natural bias. One of my friends has related to me a fact on this subject. A judge was some time since trying a cause, when some point occurred of evident truth, but to which there was no witness. One of the counsel in the cause offered himself as a witness to prove the fact; but the judge suggested to him that it would be better to let the cause go off, until a witness could be obtained; because it did not seem becoming in counsel, when a cause pinched, to offer himself to be sworn. The lawyer, however, insisted. When the judge said to him, "you are a competent witness, and I may not refuse to have you sworn, but, if you do testify, I shall instruct the jury not to believe one word you say." The judge may possibly have stretched the rule, but the counsel will never forget it. And in this case I do not say the witnesses are not competent, but I say they are parties in interest; and yet such are the principal witnesses in the case. Now, I ask, what could have been the motive of Mr. Lawless in writing that article? It is said that it was to put his clients upon their guard, and to prevent them from becoming the prey of speculators. Sir, this article itself develops his secret motive—it seems to me that I can read his heart as plainly in that transaction, as if it was laid open before my eyes. Is it not demonstrable that his motive could not have been that which is assigned by his advocates here? If it had been, what could have been easier than to have inserted an article in the paper, stating that the decision in the case of Souldard was not final; that an appeal had been taken to the Supreme Court of the United States; and that the cause was to be considered as still pending, and recommending to his clients to wait the issue before they took any steps in relation to their claims. But, no; he did not take this course, but inserted an article virtually holding out to his clients this language: Do not be affected by this opinion of Judge Peck—it is quite erroneous. And did he not know that it was to be this very Judge Peck who was to sit upon their causes to try them? And would his clients be deterred from selling their land by this? Was it not the very strongest reason why they should sell? No, sir. It is impossible his motives could have been such as gentlemen suppose. Charity believeth all things, and covereth a multitude of sins; but charity herself can have no room here. If this was not his object, what was it? It was the object of that article to affect the adjudications in the other cases, either in producing in the Judge an alarm, which might check his progress, or, if he was not to be intimidated, then by pre-occupying the minds of those who were to become jurors and witnesses. This was the obvious tendency of the publication. It was a direct appeal from the court to the public, stating that the Judge had been guilty of errors, both in law and in fact. Every citizen who read the article and believed it, would say, this judge is not competent to his duty, and he should not be here. He has been guilty of eighteen assumptions in one opinion, all of which are erroneous. Sir, this was the only effect the article could have, and it is fair to infer that this was the end for which it was written. Now, if it was, then the act falls within the principle which governed the law of contempts. It was intended to operate on cases still sub judice; whether the author effected his purpose or not, is immaterial. The design of his publication was a contempt. I have adverted to this, not so much for the sake of stating my own opinion in relation to it, as with a view to correct the erroneous view which I think has been given by every gentleman who has spoken in favor of the impeachment. I appeal to all who hear me to say whether the resolution has not been advocated in fact upon the sole ground that the object of the publication of Mr. Lawless was fair and honest and commendable, and not designed to have any effect upon the causes pending. Now, can a design be called honest and fair, which goes to corrupt the fountains of justice, no matter how this is effected, whether through the judge himself, or through the jurors and witnesses? To test the truth of this idea, let us suppose that, instead of the article signed "A Citizen," Mr. Lawless had written one in this form: "To all persons who may appear as jurors or witnesses at the next term of the district court for the district of Missouri, before the Hon. James H. Peck, Judge of the same: take notice, that, at the trial of Soulard's heirs, the said Judge assumed eighteen points of fact and of law, all of which were false." I ask, would any man have doubted whether this was designed and calculated to impress the public mind in a manner unfavorable to the court? Sir, there is not a man who could read this notice, and compare it with the opinion of Judge Peck, that must not suppose, if he believed it true, that the Judge was either a very wicked man, or else a natural fool—that he was too ignorant or too corrupt to hold his station. I now leave this part of the subject, and, after a word or two more, I shall have done. If it will not be thought by my friends from Pennsylvania and Virginia to be extra-judicial, I will go one step further. If I have been correct so far, nothing more need be said; but suppose I have been mistaken, there remains another view to which I must advert, at the hazard of being charged with an obiturn dictum; and I ask whether, in the conduct of Judge Peck, there is reason to infer the absence of malice, whether we are obliged to suppose that he had any other motive than to uphold the honor and purity of the court. Sir, it is one of the most difficult things in the world to judge of men's intentions; and I could not but feel some surprise at a remark of my friend from New York, [Mr. STORRS] who observed, if I understood him, that we need not look with eagle eyes into the motives of the accused, seeing that we were only taking the preliminary steps towards a prosecution. Now, sir, my limited practice had led me to believe that in all proceedings ex parte there was a peculiar necessity that the evidence should be full and satisfactory. And is it so that we must not look into the motives of the accused? If not, then there is an end to all fairness. And what is the conclusion? The accused must look out for himself. But surely the presumption of malice may be rebutted by circumstances; and I cannot conceive how the gentleman could have supposed that there was any other motive in this publication than a design to bring the court into contempt.

[Mr. STORRS here explained. What he had said was that the committee were not bound to look with eagle eyes for palliations of the offence, substantiated by testimony.]

Just as I understood him, [said Mr. H.] and I enter my entire dissent from the doctrine. I am a perfect non-believer in it. The question we have to settle is, whether the circumstances are such as to infer an honest or a malicious intent. If Judge Peck viewed this anonymous article as more calculated to impress the public mind than if a direct charge had been advanced of ignorance or corruption, then I do not wonder that he came to the conclusion that the intent of the writer was to embarrass the causes which might come into his court. I have looked at the criticism of the Judge's opinion, and I say that every charge has been highly colored, and that in others there has been a complete distortion of the Judge's meaning. I ask every gentleman calmly to compare the article signed "A Citizen" with the opinion of Judge Peck, and to say whether it is not a perfect caricature of that opinion. And if the Judge entertained this opinion, then you find a motive at once for his conduct. The article held him up to an abused public as incompetent to the duties of his station; and if it did so, then I say that the Judge acted from a motive which is fair and becoming in every man who means to protect himself; and I say further, that a judge, believing that one of the counsel in his court had been guilty of such an attempt to corrupt the fountains of justice, and did not lay a heavy hand upon him, is not fit for his station; and as long as I shall continue a lawyer at the bar, I am perfectly willing to subject myself to the same rule. I do not wonder that the Judge's commentary on this production occupied three hours. The subject had been laboriously examined by him, and had been fully set forth in his opinion; and I do not wonder that a circumstantial examination of it, and refutation of the falsehoods in the article, should have taken him a considerable time. But, sir, we find a motive independent of this. In what circumstances was the Judge placed when he made this examination? He was surrounded by a number of gentlemen, members of a profession honorable in itself, and as useful as it is respectable. Among them all he found no voice in favor of the Government; but every member of the St. Louis bar, excepting, perhaps, the attorney of the United States, was retained, either as attorney or counsel, for some of these claims. It is said that Mr. Lawless was personally interested in the case of Soulard; whether he and the other gentlemen were to share profits with the claimants, is not for me to say; but, in the State from which I come, a lawyer who would lend his professional services in a speculation of that kind would, if detected, be stricken from the rolls with disgrace. What morality may prevail to the westward on this subject, I know not; perhaps the practice there may be considered very honorable. All I shall say is, that I am very glad such notions have no place in my State. A judge thus surrounded had been publicly charged with not knowing the fact, or the law on which he was called to decide. Now, sir, I confess I do not know any thing more calculated to touch his reputation or wound his feelings. Perhaps a charge of corruption might have been a little worse, but I believe that most men would nearly as lief be charged with one as with the other. The Judge did show a little feeling on the occasion—I think I should have shown much more. He sat patiently, and heard the charge fully argued. The accuser himself says that he was permitted to discuss it so long as he wished, and during this time there was nothing in the Judge's demeanor different from what it was at other times. Now I ask what motive could the Judge have had to oppress this man? Was it his interest to do so? Evidently not. Was it any malicious resentment? Why, sir, Mr. Lawless himself says that he and the Judge had always been on good terms. I therefore conclude that he acted on this occasion in good faith, though it is possible that he mistook his powers. But it seems to me that the very circumstance most insisted on as evidence of evil intent in the Judge, is pregnant with evidence in his favor. It is said that he exhibited passion in his manner, and that his language was violent. Well, sir, I admit that he was somewhat indiscreet; but I am yet to learn that warmth of manner is evidence of corruption. Is the manner of a person who designs to perpetrate oppression under the mask of judicial power usually warm and passionate? No, sir! he comes coolly to his task of hypocrisy; he expresses great regret at the task imposed on him. He begins by degrees, looks earnestly upon the assembly and compassionately upon the culprit, speaks of the enormity of his offence, regrets extremely that he should have been guilty of it, asks him if he is ready to apologize, and then proceeds to the blow for which all this preparation was made, and strikes his victim from the roll. Is that the deportment of the Judge? We find him warm and animated, over-excited, perhaps rash in his language; but does not this betray an honest conviction that he would be faithless to his duty if he did not punish a flagrant outrage on the administration of justice? When attempting to ascertain the motive of the Judge, ought we not to remember that he offered the offender the opportunity of purging himself by oath, which was refused; and my friend from New York thought it astonishing that any one should consider this refusal as an aggravation of the contempt.

[Here Mr. SPENCER explained. He said that when interrogatories were offered they were never limited, and the accused could not know what would be the nature of them.]

Sir, this circumstance furnishes my mind with a presumption in favor of the Judge. The interrogatories necessary for the accused to purge himself from intentional contempt, were few and simple. The question was put to the printer, whether Lawless said that he did not intend any thing like contempt towards the court, but afterward we hear nothing more of this. If the object of the Judge had been the gratification of revenge, we should have heard of no interrogatories. I will not say that the Judge was authorized in doing all that he did, but I insist that the offer of interrogatories was no addition to his guilt.

I feel very thankful for the attention with which the committee have indulged me. I felt that the case was a very important one; and as very distinguished friends held an opinion with respect to it the reverse of my own, I considered it to be my duty briefly to state the reasons for my own opinion, and for the vote which I shall give against the impeachment.

Mr. BATES, of Massachusetts, observed that this was a high criminal proceeding against a high officer of Government. The accused ought to be treated with the utmost liberality. He need not speak of the effects of the present proceeding, either on the character of the accused party or upon the Government. Merely to allude to the expense and trouble incident to a trial at the bar of the Senate, and the necessary and consequent delay of business, would be sufficient to induce a proper degree of caution on the part of this House, in instituting this constitutional process.

An application was now made by the friend of the accused, that he might be permitted to make a communication to the House, orally or otherwise, as he might choose, in relation to the law and the facts of his case. He hoped the privilege would be accorded. He was not for fettering the Judge, and restricting and embarrassing him by too much regulation; or by the commitment of his friends in this House to this or that course. Let him be heard in the way he might himself prefer. Mr. B. denied that the House was to proceed in the character of a grand jury. He had much doubt on the propriety of receiving only ex parte evidence, in many cases, even before an ordinary grand jury; but the reasons for it there would not apply to this House. If the accused was desirous of being heard either on the law or on the facts, Mr. B. was for hearing him. He thought it due to him. He hoped the resolution would be adopted, in the confidence that Judge Peck knew what belonged to this House, and what became him as a judge and a gentleman.

[Mr. BURGESS followed Mr. BATES, of Massachusetts, whose speech concluded the debate for this day.]

On motion of Mr. HEMPHILL, the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HAYNES in the chair, on

THE BUFFALO AND NEW ORLEANS ROAD BILL.

Mr. MERCER rose and entered at large in defence of the policy and expediency of the measure, and in reply to the gentleman who had opposed it. He spoke about two hours, when he gave way for the purpose, and the committee rose.

THURSDAY, APRIL 8, 1830.

CRIMES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House then, on motion of Mr. POWERS, went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HUCHANAN in the chair, and took up the bill for the punishment of crimes in the District of Columbia.

A good deal of discussion took place on the details of this bill, and on motions to modify them, in which Messrs. POWERS, WICKLIFFE, SEMMES, SPENCER, of New York, STORRS, of New York, BURGESS, WHIT- TLESEY, BOULDIN, P. P. BARBOUR, WASHINGTON, DRAYTON, DODDRIDGE, TAYLOR, and VER- PLANCK bore a part. The question which gave rise to most of the debate was on a motion of Mr. WICKLIFFE to insert the word "free" in the second section, so as to limit the penitentiary punishment for certain offences to free persons, and leave slaves to be punished according to the laws of Maryland and Virginia, now in force in the respective divisions of the District. This question was ultimately decided in the affirmative: yeas, 58—nays, 54.

Mr. POWERS, chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, gave a general explanation of the views of the committee in reporting the bill, and showed the necessity of its immediate passage. He observed that the bill, in its essential features, was similar to one which had been prepared and reported several years since; that it was more simple, and the definition of offences had been chiefly left as they were at common law. The draught of the bill had been submitted to, and approved by, several distinguished members of the bar in this District, who best understood the defects in the existing laws. The proposed code was mild in its character, and conformable to the improved and enlightened state of public opinion on the subject of criminal punishments.

After further general remarks, Mr. P. adverted particularly to the offences of gaming and duelling, punishments for which were provided in the bill; and dwelt somewhat at length on the enormous evils of gaming, as practised in this District, and which the corporate authorities had found themselves, after their best efforts, unable to suppress.

Penalties had been imposed, two-thirds of which were paid to the informers; and the extent of this evil could be somewhat inferred from the fact, that a single constable was in the habit of receiving from two to three thousand dollars a year of gamblers, as informer, for his share of penalties, the balance of which was paid to the corporation. It was certainly important to the morals and welfare of society, that this alarming practice should be suppressed.

He should not [said Mr. P.] dwell on the subject of duelling. It had often been discussed by far abler men, and he could offer nothing new. All must be sensible of the magnitude of the evil, and concur in a desire to abolish a practice fraught with such calamities as this country had experienced from it.

He should trouble the committee with no further remarks at present, but was prepared to give such explanations to the various provisions of the bill, as might be called for.

Mr. WICKLIFFE proposed to strike out three of the offences mentioned in the bill. He referred to the words "cheating, gaming, and duelling." All crimes, he contended, should be punished according to their enormity, and no jury, he presumed, would be found to sentence a man to the penitentiary for the undefined charge of gaming, for instance. He would leave this subject where it now rested, in the care of the common law. He presumed the committee intended to suppress the evil of keeping public gaming tables, though, in the present shape of the provision, it extended to the corner of the whist table.

Mr. SEMMES proposed to amend the section by inserting the words "keeping a public gaming table or house." This [he said] was the kind of gaming intended to be punished by the committee, and he hoped it would meet the views of all. As to duelling, [he said] it was evidently the wish of a large proportion of the citizens of the place to have something done for its suppression; and as they were legislating for a people who have no legislative council of their own, he thought it due to them to consult their wishes.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, said he should readily concur with the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE] that the word duelling should be stricken out as too indefinite an expression, if it were not fully defined in the eleventh section. Gaming [he said] was also a crime of various grades, and required provisions accordingly. Cheating was entirely too indefinite a term, and should be stricken out, or receive a substitute. In relation to duelling, there was scarcely a State in the Union which did not severely punish the incipient steps towards the commission of this crime, such as bearing challenges, &c. He hoped this ten miles square would not be made an exception, but that here a still more salutary example would be set, for the guidance of other parts of the Union.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, said, if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] would withdraw his amendment for a moment, he would submit a proposition which he thought would meet his views.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said, no man could have more abhorrence for the crimes enumerated, than he had; but he knew the futility of enacting laws which would not, and could not, be executed. He would, however, withdraw his motion to strike out, to give the opportunity asked by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STORRS then proposed to amend the section by substituting the following words: "for obtaining money or any securities herefor, or any goods or chattels, under false pretences, or keeping a faro bank, or other common gaming table."

A suggestion was made by Mr. WHITTLESEY to strike out the word "common," but Mr. STORRS feared this might destroy its object, and it was agreed to as first proposed by Mr. STORRS.

Mr. WICKLIFFE next moved to insert the word free, in order to make these punishments only applicable to free citizens, and not to slaves.

Mr. POWERS said it was the intention of the committee to place slaves on the same footing as free citizens in relation to criminal punishments.

Mr. WICKLIFFE demanded what punishment it could be to take a man from the bondage of his master, and place him in the penitentiary.

Mr. POWERS said, he had inadvertently answered for the whole committee on the subject of maintaining an equality in punishments, while, in reality, he only expressed his own sentiments. He was now convinced that others, and perhaps a majority of the committee, were opposed to him on that subject.

Mr. BURGESS said, he did not know the provisions of the bill, but he could not see how a distinction could be made in punishing the crime of a slave or that of his master; and he was sure his master could not complain of the loss of his service, so long as his confinement was required for the public safety, for this was, in fact, the object of punishment. He agreed with the gentleman from Kentucky, that it was no great punishment to imprison a slave; but the public safety might require his confinement. If slaves were exempted from punishment, a man might, with impunity, aim a dagger at the throat of him whom he hated, by the hand of his slave.

Mr. BOULDIN said, there were circumstances, founded in necessity, which rendered a distinction essential, between the laws applicable to a free man and those intended for a slave. The incarceration of an individual, and making him a slave for a time, had some terrors for one who was free; but what possible effect could it have on one who was already a slave? What possible good could result from taking him for a time from one master, and giving him to another? He thought, also, that the punishment of the slave and the interest of the master should ever be inseparable. The master should rather be interested in the detection and punishment of the crimes of the slave, than in their concealment. He did not know the size of the penitentiary, but, if the act passed in its present shape, they could not be too quick in setting about its enlargement, for it would certainly be filled. He did not know what the laws of Maryland and of Virginia were at the time of their adoption by the District; but he presumed they were nearly the same as they are now, and adapted to the government of slaves.

Mr. POWERS stated the provisions of the laws of Maryland on the subject.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, said, the infliction of pain or punishment upon the offending individual was not the object of criminal law. It was to provide for the public safety alone; and in this respect no difference could exist between black or white, bond or free. It would certainly be wrong to punish slaves with more rigor than others, as their opportunities to acquire knowledge, and their inducements to practise virtue, were less than those of the white man. It would also be wrong to punish them less, as it would look like an inducement to the commission of crime. He thought the House could make no distinction in its provisions for their punishment.

Mr. SEMMES said, as a slave holder, and a representative from a slave holding State, he was entirely opposed to the amendment, for the reasons offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SPENCER.] It was a most mistaken idea that it could be no punishment to a slave to confine him in a penitentiary. He would ask the gentlemen to look around on the condition of slaves in this District, at this enlightened age. Had they not as much to lose by their incarceration as the white man? Would they not be torn from their homes—the bosom of their families—and the enjoyment of their domestic comforts, by being condemned to prison? He contended that stripes were no adequate punishment for crime, and did not conduce to the reformation of the culprit. He was a member of the Legislature of Maryland, when the laws of that State were enacted to ameliorate the condition of its slaves, and to modify its former laws in relation to them; and he would now announce to the House, that it was the intention of the chairman of the committee, [Mr. POWERS] if the amendment did not prevail, to extend the laws of Virginia and Maryland, on this subject, to the District.

Mr. BOULDIN said, the laws of Virginia, and he believed those of Maryland also, provided for the payment of the price of each slave who was executed. He still contended that whatever speculations might be made on this subject, it would be found, by sober practice, that the interest of the master must be consulted, in the punishment of the slave. If the amendment were adopted, it would leave the committee at liberty to introduce a new bill, containing a short and simple plan of punishment for slaves.

Mr. POWERS said he must still decline acceding to the amendment.

Mr. DRAYTON feared, if this debate were continued, the object of the committee would be defeated. And, although he would not presume to lay down rules for the government of the committee, he suggested that the debate should be as circumscribed as possible. He believed it essential that freemen and slaves should be governed by different codes of laws; but he would be inclined to adopt a rather less sanguinary one for the government of the latter than the former, as they have not the same incitement to the practice of virtue as their masters have. The codes should, at all events, be distinct, and the danger of their conflicting avoided.

Mr. BURGESS said, he meant to make no improper allusions. He would not say that there were one class of individuals there, that knew more of the management of slaves than others, but he could not subscribe to some of the opinions advanced there. He could not believe that the condition of slaves was such, that being bound by links of steel, and lashed to a wheelbarrow during the day, and then turned into a solitary cell at night, had no terrors for him. He thought he was more a slave, who was deprived of the sight of the green earth, and the glorious sun, and the powers of the free exercise of his limbs, than he who was only held in common bondage. He would agree that these things were not quite so much a punishment to the slave as to the freeman; but he contended we had not the right, this side of the grave, so far to exercise the retributive powers of Almighty justice. If, in the exercise of the powers they possess, they infringed on personal liberty, or even life, it could only be so far as the public welfare called on them to act. He had been told of the failure of the penitentiary system, but these remarks could only apply to the manner in which it was formerly conducted, before the introduction of solitary confinement. When culprits were mingled in a mass, and suffered unrestrained intercourse with each other, in every hue of crime, it was to be expected that they would deteriorate; but such was not now the case. He said he would go any length to accommodate gentlemen in what he deemed to be right; but, before his country and his God, he could not consent to form one code of justice for the government of white men, and another for blacks.

The question was then taken on the amendment to insert the word "free," when there were, for the affirmative 50, for the negative 54. This not being a quorum, the question was again taken, and it was carried: yeas, 58—nays, 54.

Mr. WASHINGTON then moved an amendment, making the laws of Virginia and Maryland, in relation to slaves, binding in the District.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, and several other members, wished to know what these laws were, before they voted for them.

Mr. SEMMES said, if gentlemen wished for the amelioration of the condition of slaves, they would effect their object by voting for the proposition.

Mr. BARBOUR followed in explanation of the laws of Virginia on this subject. After some further debate, however, the proposition was withdrawn.

Mr. WICKLIFFE proposed an amendment to the clause relating to assaults, with intent to kill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND suggested that the word "murder" would be more correct than "kill," which was the usual term. It would, he thought, be better to insert in such cases two counts, one for assault and battery, with intent, &c., and the other for the intent to murder; the jury could then decide upon the quo animo of the case before them. He referred to a case which he had formerly conducted, in which, by this means, the criminal had been convicted.

Mr. TAYLOR said, that, in his opinion, it was better to retain the words used in the ancient judicial practice. To kill, as applied to this, was, in the legal acceptance of the term, to kill feloniously; and such was the construction put upon the phrase by the highest authorities.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, after a few remarks, withdrew his amendment.

Various other amendments were proposed and adopted.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to amend the bill, by adding to it a section providing to punish the crime of forcibly carrying away or seducing from the District, with intent to sell, free negroes, by fine, not exceeding five thousand dollars, and imprisonment for not more than seven years.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WICKLIFFE proposed a further amendment to the bill, for the punishment of persons breaking into a dwelling-house during the day time.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, stated, that he had never heard of such an offence as the one described. Breaking into a house by night, with intent to steal, is punished as burglary, because it disturbed the repose and hazarded the safety of the inmates. In the day time, however, there could be no offence of this nature committed, amounting in the eye of the law to burglary.

Mr. WICKLIFFE replied, he was reluctant to labor under an imputation of providing for the punishment of a crime which had never been heard of.

Mr. SPENCER, in explanation: I stated that it was a crime which I had never heard of.

Mr. WICKLIFFE resumed. He should not have alluded to the remark, but from the circumstance of its being made by so eminent and distinguished a jurist as the gentleman from New York; [Mr. SPENCER] nevertheless, he must still maintain that the breaking into a house in the day time was, under certain circumstances, equivalent to the crime of burglary during the night. He would instance a case which would demonstrate this: suppose a man leave his house during the day, in the pursuit of his usual avocations, in the care of a female of his family, and that some one entered his house with a felonious intent, or attempted to commit a felony, would the person injured be content with a system of law which indicted the prisoner for a mere assault and battery? It was for the protection of families from alarm and outrage, that he had moved the amendment in question. You must charge, [said Mr. W.] under the present law, the ruffian who breaks into a house during the day, with the most atrocious intentions; he does not accomplish his full purposes with intent to steal only; for which offence the punishment is a small fine, and, perhaps, six months' imprisonment. My amendment will prevent this very apportionment of punishments, and contribute, accordingly, to the safety of our fellow-citizens. With respect to the remark, that the proposition is novel, in as much as it provided for the punishment of an offence never heard of, he would only say, that he [Mr. Wickliffe] had, in his own State, Kentucky, been charged with the prosecution of such offences, and had convicted the offenders.

Mr. SPENCER repeated, that he had said he had never heard of such offences. If the necessity of such a provision could be shown, he should certainly give his ready assent to it.

After some further discussion, in which Mr. STORRS, of New York, Mr. WICKLIFFE, Mr. SPENCER, of New York, and Mr. TAYLOR took part, the amendment was negatived.

Mr. MARTIN submitted an amendment to the fourth section of the bill, providing that no person concerned in a duel shall be subject to an indictment for having been engaged in it, on his own testimony, during any part of the proceeding in the case of such duel.

The amendment was adopted.

Upon motion of Mr. POWERS, the committee then took up the bill for the appointment of commissioners to prepare a code of laws for the District of Columbia.

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved to amend the bill, by inserting a clause, that one at least of the three of the commissioners proposed to be appointed for that purpose should not be a resident of the District of Columbia.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. STERIGERE moved to strike out from the bill the words "by and with the consent of the Senate."

This motion was also negatived by the committee.

Several verbal amendments were proposed and agreed to.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, moved to reduce the sum to be appropriated from ten thousand dollars to six thousand five hundred dollars; which, after some remarks from Mr. POWERS, was agreed to.

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved a further amendment, granting to the commissioners the use of a room in the Capitol; which was agreed to.

The committee then rose, and reported; and,

On motion of Mr. VINTON,

The House adjourned.

FRIDAY, APRIL 9, 1830.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House took up the bill for the punishment of crimes in the District of Columbia, with the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. A. SPENCER objected to the amendment which introduces the word "free" before "persons," and thus confines the operation of the bill to free persons. He repelled the idea that confinement to hard labor in the penitentiary would be no punishment to a slave, and entered into a train of reasoning to show that the discrimination was improper and inexpedient.

As discussion seemed about to arise on this bill, Mr. WHITTLESEY proposed that the House, according to the rule, take up the private docket, and the SPEAKER accordingly proceeded to the orders of the day.

SATURDAY, APRIL 10, 1830.

THE ARMY.

The House proceeded to consider the following resolution, reported some days ago from the Military Committee: "Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to this House, at the commencement of the next session, such an organization of the army of the United States as will reduce the number of its officers, without injury to the service."

A debate arose on this subject, which was terminated only by the expiration of the hour allotted for considering resolutions, of which the following is a sketch:

Mr. TAYLOR said, he was not himself, and he presumed the House was not, prepared to act upon this important subject, involving the question of a reduction of the army, without discussion or reflection. He moved that the report and resolution be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and that they be printed.

Some remarks were here made by Messrs. SPEIGHT and DESHA.

Mr. DRAYTON said, he wished it to be distinctly understood, that he did not declare himself in favor of a reduction of the number of officers of the army. He did not deem it necessary to express an opinion on that subject. But he thought it altogether proper that the inquiry should be made. This was the whole object of the resolution.

Mr. TAYLOR said, he must still be allowed to consider this more than a mere resolution for inquiry. It directs the Secretary to submit a plan for the reduction of the army. He thought the first step should be, for the House to inquire whether such a reduction was proper to be made; but this the resolution takes for granted. It was in vain to say, that, by the passage of this resolution, the House would take no part on the question of further reducing the army. It would imply an expression of opinion that this reduction was proper, and it would go abroad to the people of this nation in that light. On the reduction of the army from ten thousand to six thousand men, in 1821, Mr. T. said he was one of those who advocated the measure. For this, he and his friends, who voted with him, were stigmatized as radicals, and as attempting to take away the right arm of the national defence. This was nine years ago, and he asked what they had done since? How many fortifications have been erected since, and how many men will it take to arm them properly to make them effective in the defence of the country? It is but a few days since the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DRAYTON] himself introduced a bill making appropriations for this very object. Is this a time, then, for this House, without debate and without investigation, to pass a vote that it is expedient to reduce the army? for this is the purport of the resolution. Mr. T. said it had been suggested to him to offer an amendment, calling on the Secretary of War merely for information on the subject; but he would not do even this. He believed that inquiry belonged exclusively to that House, and he did not think the mere opinion of the Secretary of War could aid them in arriving at a conclusion on the subject.

Mr. POLK said, he thought the gentleman from New York [Mr. TAYLOR] mistook the object of the resolution, as it was evidently only intended by it to institute an inquiry.

Mr. TAYLOR asked that the resolution might again be read; which being done,

Mr. POLK continued. He thought it a proper subject for inquiry, though he was not now prepared to express an opinion on the policy of continuing the present system of maintaining a skeleton of an army.

The SPEAKER pro tem. [the Hon. P. P. BARBOUR] remarked that the question was on the commitment of the resolution, and not on its merits.

Mr. POLK thought the delay incidental to a commitment to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, was wholly unnecessary.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, he fully concurred with his colleague, [Mr. TAYLOR] in the opinion expressed by him, that this was a proper subject for reference to the House, and its discussion while on the state of the Union. It was well known that officers, in what had just now been termed our "skeleton of an army," supported at the public expense, for future emergency, were more numerous, in strict proportion, than the privates. But it was also known that most of the disasters which befell our country at the commencement of the late war with Great Britain, arose from the want which we so deeply felt of experienced officers. It was not the business of the Secretary of War to instruct that House upon the policy of reducing the officiers of the army to a minimum with the privates, or of preserving the precious "skeleton" of an army which we yet possessed—it was not a subject for him to decide, whether our army of officers was to be fostered or abandoned; but he believed it was a proper subject for reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DRAYTON said, if he took the same view of the subject that the honorable gentlemen from New York [Messrs. TAYLOR and CAMBRELENG] did, he would readily concur with them in the propriety of the proposed reference. But he could not so view it; and he must still believe it a proper subject for reference to the Secretary of War. He was extremely anxious not to be misunderstood in this matter. He had by no means inferred that he had arrived at a conclusion that the army or its number of officers should be reduced, nor that they should be increased; though he was not sure that, on a proper investigation, he should not express one of these opinions. The proposed inquiry was far from being unprecedented; and he would ask if resolutions were not almost daily laid upon the table, and agreed to, for inquiries to which the House was opposed. The language of the resolution was certainly misconstrued. It called for such a plan as would not be injurious to the public service; and, if such a plan were submitted, he asked if the House would not feel bound to adopt it. As the object of the resolution was a mere inquiry, he thought it should be sanctioned.

Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, said, as the object was merely that of inquiry, he would propose to amend the resolution by adding "if, in his opinion, such reduction can be made" without injury, &c.

[A motion being pending to commit the resolution to a Committee of the Whole, this amendment was not in order.]

Mr. DESHA said, he rose to reply to the gentlemen from New York, [Messrs. TAYLOR and CAMBRELENG] who had adverted to the policy of the Government in the present organization of the army, as a resort in future emergencies. Experience had fully proved that the service of an officer in time of peace did not improve his capacities, or qualify him for the exigencies of war; on the contrary, such had ever been found the most inefficient.

Mr. VANCE expressed his opposition to any project for disturbing the present established organization of the army. The detached service on which this small corps was employed, required a greater proportion of officers than if they were kept in more compact order.

The SPEAKER again reminded gentlemen that the merits of a resolution was not a subject for debate, on a motion to commit it.

Mr. VANCE said, he believed its commitment would amount to its rejection, as it could not be reached this session in the regular succession of business.

Mr. DWIGHT said, he was equally opposed to the resolution, with other gentlemen who had addressed the House. [Order.] The reason why he was in favor of its commitment to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, was to give an opportunity for discussing whether the Government would abandon fortifications for which they had appropriated ten millions of dollars. The defence of our sea coast alone, on which these fortifications are erected, requires in time of war forty thousand men, and in time of peace twelve thousand; while, at this moment, we have not five thousand men in service. He would ask, if it was supposed the Secretary of War could instruct the House that five thousand men were too many for the service of twelve millions of inhabitants. The agitation of this question [he said] must tend to destroy the confidence in the Government, which it was desirable should be possessed by men, who, he did not hesitate to say, were as talented, worthy, and brave, as those of any army of its size in the world.

Mr. WILDE said, he was in favor of the motion for the commitment of the resolution, because the inquiry appeared to him to be altogether an improper one. The resolution also seemed more than a simple inquiry. It indicated something like an opinion, on the part of the House, that some alteration might be made in the present organization of the army, and he must entertain an opinion of that sort himself, before he could vote for it. The various suggestions it contained were all proper subjects for the consideration of that House, and not for the Secretary of War. We do not call upon him to know whether it is necessary or proper for us to diminish or increase our fortifications, or whether we will abolish or continue the Military Academy, that nursery of officers. Mr. W. said he was a member of that House at the close of the late war, when the calamities we had suffered for the want of a well organized army in its beginning, were fresh in their memories. Perhaps their feelings at that time might have carried them too far in providing for future emergencies; if so, he was willing to bear his due proportion of the blame. It seemed to be admitted that the number of privates was not too great for the necessities of the service. It was only the officers against whom the inquiry was directed. Experience had demonstrated that it would be much easier to procure men on the recurrence of a war, than it was to have them properly commanded.

The SPEAKER again remarked that a debate upon the merits of the resolution was inadmissible.

Mr. WILDE said, he was sorry to infringe on any of the rules of order of the House, but he felt the necessity, and he wished to impress it upon the minds of members, to reflect what would be their condition, if they proceeded to pass a vote for another reduction of the army, for such, he considered, was the purport of the resolution proposed.

Mr. W. was about to proceed, when the SPEAKER announced the expiration of the hour allotted to resolutions.

KENTUCKY DEAF AND DUMB ASYLUM.

Mr. BAYLOR, from the committee appointed on the 28th of December last, to which was referred, on the 18th of February last, the petition of the trustees of Centre College, of Kentucky, who are also the trustees of the Kentucky Institution for the tuition of the Deaf and Dumb; reported a bill to amend an act entitled "An act for the benefit of the incorporated Kentucky Asylum for teaching the Deaf and Dumb;" and to extend the time for selling the land granted by said act.

Mr. KINCAID rose in explanation, and support of the bill. He observed that its object was simple and reasonable; being to extend the time which had been allowed to the Deaf and Dumb Asylum of Kentucky in the original act to dispose of the land granted to it by Congress. The act had been passed on the 5th of April, 1826: it granted to the institution one township of land, to be located under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and made it the duty of the said corporation to sell the land within five years from the passage of the act; the same to be located in one of the territories, on land on which the Indian title had been extinguished.

Difficulties of various kinds had occurred in complying with the terms of the act, in consequence of which the sale had been so far retarded, that, if the terms of the original grant should be insisted upon, the trustees would be compelled to part with the residue of the land, (consisting of about one-third part of the whole,) at a great sacrifice. Under these circumstances, they had presented their petition to Congress, praying that the time might be extended to five years longer.

The nature and causes of the difficulties which had retarded the sale were well explained in a letter written to him by R. C. Allen, Esq. the agent of the institution in Florida, (in which territory the lands had been located,) and which he asked might be read at the Clerk's table.

It was read accordingly; when,

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, said, he regretted that an imperious sense of public duty compelled him to oppose any measure that had the appearance of promoting any charitable or humane object. He was impressed with a belief that when the House was informed of the history of this grant, and the proceedings under it, they would be inclined to think that charity had already suffered much, and that some of that feeling now invoked for the passage of this bill ought to be extended to his constituents. In 1826, an application was made to Congress for a grant of a township of land to the incorporated Asylum for teaching the Deaf and Dumb in Kentucky. He did not, upon that, or any other occasion, interpose any objection to prevent the most munificent bounty of the Government for so benevolent an object. It was not his province to inquire into the expediency or power of Congress to make grants of the public lands for any object. It was his duty, however, to guard, as far as possible, the interests of the people of Florida against any injury which might happen to them in the profusion of the nation's bounty. Every one acquainted with the surveys of the public lands must know that a township is one of the legal divisions, six miles square, containing nine sections of six hundred and forty acres each. It was the intention of Congress that this land should be selected in one body, according to the surveys, as that of General Lafayette's was, and all the other grants of a similar nature. This land was not so selected. A powerful influence was enlisted to pervert the law, and induce the Secretary of the Treasury to reverse all the decisions previously made in the construction of similar laws, and to allow the selection in small bodies all over the territory. The late Secretary of State was induced to use his influence with the Secretary of the Treasury to have the land located in small bodies, and it was accordingly so ordered. This decision, made, as I have said, against all precedent, gave to the institution land four times as valuable as any one entire township in the country would have been. Not content with this advantage, an attempt was made to place these selections over the farms and houses of all the poor settlers in the country, contrary to a law that secured the possession of these meritorious occupants, and in violation of the pledges of the representatives here made, to prevent any opposition to the bill. I had visited that institution, had my sympathies strongly enlisted in its favor, and was desirous that the bill should pass, if it was not injurious to my constituents. This attempt to place the grant over their houses and farms, produced the embarrassments alluded to by the gentleman from Kentucky. How far it will constitute a claim for indulgence from this House, I cannot say; but, judging from my own feelings, I cannot suppose it will have much effect. I mention this to show how highly this institution, by the influence of the late Secretary of State, has already been favored.

I have two objections, however, to the passage of this bill, which I humbly conceive, with all the benevolent feelings in favor of the institution, the House will consider reasonable and well founded. This grant was accepted, upon the express condition that it should be sold within five years. The United States parted with the title, and the condition was for the benefit of the Territory of Florida. This is a question now, in which the United States have no concern; and I doubt their power to extend the condition of a grant, to the injury of a third person, or party, by removing restrictions intended for their benefit. A bill has already passed the Senate, granting six or eight townships of land to all the large States, to be located in the territories.

If that bill should get through this House, of which there is every prospect, from the combination in its favor, with the privilege of holding up the land five years, and with the certainty of a prolongation of five more, upon the precedent now about to be established, the territories, instead of being colonies of the United States, will be held by Deaf and Dumb Corporations, who will sell them out as the funds may be required for the purposes of their institutions. I humbly hope, sir, Congress is not prepared to adopt a policy so unwise, a system so destructive of all the hopes and prospects of the territories. It was my good fortune, once, to defeat a bill like this, by moving an amendment, that the lands granted should be sold at public auction at once. This produced a discussion, which resulted in the postponement of the bill.

If this course is persisted in, the population of the country will be checked, its settlement retarded, and the most injurious results produced. The honorable gentleman from Kentucky is mistaken in supposing that the time asked for is required. The land now selected can be sold for five dollars per acre, which will make this grant worth more than one hundred thousand dollars.

They can sell every acre within the time now limited by law, at that price; and so far from there being any danger of their suffering from speculators, if this extension is allowed, it will enable this charitable institution to become, itself, a speculator, to the injury of the people of Florida. Upon the ground, then, that it is unnecessary and impolitic, that it is a violation of the condition of the grant, and injurious to my constituents and the country, I move an indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. KINCAID addressed the House in reply, observing that they would perceive from the letter of the agent that the land had been disposed of, excepting about one-third, which still remained on hand; and although he supposed, from the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Florida, that it was worth five dollars per acre, and he hoped even more than that, yet he could not agree with him that it would at present command that sum; no such offers were made to the agent; but, on the contrary, the highest bid made for any part of it was about three dollars per acre, and, for the greater portion which lay out of the settlements, no offer whatever was made. Should the gentleman's motion, therefore, succeed, the amount now on hand would have to be got rid of within less than one year from this time: a great sacrifice must be the inevitable result. There were no buyers to bid for it but land speculators, who, being apprised of the terms of the grant, were now lying by, in hopes of getting a great bargain.

Mr. K. said, the argument that the House had not the power to pass this bill, was pretty much an argument of course in the discussions here, which he would permit on this occasion to pass; but, in answer to the other arguments advanced by the gentleman, he felt it his duty again briefly to explain to the House how the difficulties had arisen which had operated to prevent the trustees from disposing of the land as they had hoped and expected to do, within the period at first fixed by law.

The grant, as he had before stated, had passed the House in April, 1826; but, at the same session, an act was passed granting the right of pre-emption to "every person who had actually inhabited and cultivated a tract of land lying in either of the districts established for the sale of public lands in the Territory of Florida, which tract was not rightfully claimed by any other person, and who should not have removed from the territory." The trustees would doubtless have taken their land in one undivided township, but they had found it impossible (unless they had taken what was worthless) to find any township which did not include the improvements of some of those settlers who were entitled to the right of pre-emption to which he had just referred. Under these circumstances, the trustees had applied to the Secretary of the Treasury for instructions and advice; (the act having declared that the land should be located "under his direction.") That officer, after a careful examination of the law, was of opinion that it permitted the location of the land in tracts of a smaller size than an entire township, and they made their locations accordingly. But still within some of the sections, there were settlements which had indeed been abandoned, but whose owners, not having removed from the territory, were entitled to pre-emption. Finding such to be the case, the trustees were under the necessity of applying to Congress: and, in 1827, a law was passed providing "that the incorporated Deaf and Dumb Asylum of Kentucky shall have the power, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, of locating so much of the township of land granted to the said institution, as has been taken by the claims of those who are entitled to the right of pre-emption in the Territory of Florida, under the provisions of the act aforesaid, which shall be located in sections upon any unappropriated and unreserved lands in either of the Territories of Florida or Arkansas." Leave to re-locate being thus obtained, they located once more; but the true position of the boundary line between Florida and Alabama not being then accurately known, it happened, as he was informed, that a considerable part of the land had unintentionally been located within the State of Alabama. The mistake being discovered, a new location had to be made. In the mean time, to add yet further to the impediments and difficulties they had to contend with, their agent died; by which several months' further delay was occasioned. At length, however, the entire amount of the land granted was located in such a manner, he believed, as not to interfere with any improvements of the settlers. Sales were effected as before remarked, until all that portion of the land, or nearly so, which lay within the limits of the settlement, was disposed of; but, for the residue lying without the settlement, there was at present no demand.

Mr. K. said that the trustees had no wish to impose on the people of Florida, nor did they ask to retard the settlement of the territory; but, on the other hand, they were unwilling to be forced into the hands of speculators. The question for the House now to determine was, whether these unfortunate deaf and dumb children, to whom the Government had extended the hand of beneficence, should be defrauded of the boon by a sacrifice of the land intended for their benefit. The institution was of a highly interesting character, and had a strong claim on the humanity of all who could pity the destitute. It was at present in a prosperous condition, supplied with instructors of the first abilities, and in circumstances to receive and educate perhaps all the deaf and dumb children in the western States. He trusted the House would interpose its aid, and shield the children of its own benefactor from so great an injury, by rejecting the motion for postponement, and putting the bill in a train for its final passage, by ordering it to its third reading.

Mr. VINTON having made a few remarks in support of the bill,

Mr. SPEIGHT, of North Carolina, moved to lay it upon the table.

Mr. LETCHER begged the gentleman to withdraw that motion, as it was highly important to the prosperity of the institution that no further delay should occur. He hoped it was not the wish of any gentleman to do it an irreparable injury. The bill must pass now or never. It would occupy the time of the House but a very few minutes.

Mr. SPEIGHT withdrew his motion.

Mr. LETCHER then said that he regretted to see his friend from Florida making such strenuous opposition to this small bill; and he was persuaded that the source of that gentleman's hostility was to be attributed to feeling; and to over-anxiety, lest some injury might happen to his territory, rather than to any solid reasons. The difficulties which had occurred heretofore in the location and sale of the land granted by Congress to the Kentucky institution, and to which reference had been made by the gentleman, had nothing to do with the present bill. The land had been granted them under condition that it should be sold within five years. For reasons which had been very fully explained, the trustees would not be able to comply with this condition. The gentleman had contended that a further delay would be injurious to the territory; and had affirmed, that, at the end of another five years, the land, instead of being worth five dollars, as at present, would probably be worth twenty. Now, if Congress, in its benevolence, had seen fit to grant a tract of land to the most unfortunate of the human race, would any gentleman on that floor say that the guardians of these deaf and dumb children should be compelled to sell their land for five dollars, when they might get twenty? Surely not. The fact, if it was as the gentleman supposed, was the very best reason, not against, but in favor of the bill. It would not take long, however, to prove that, if compelled to sell now, they could not get five dollars an acre, or any thing like it. What individual, sir, ever receives an adequate price for his property, if compelled to sell within a limited period? Is he not forced to sacrifice it himself, or allow the officer of the law to do it? My observation through life points out at this moment no exception. The speculator, always heartless and vigilant, is waiting with impatience for one thus embarrassed and pressed. He listens to no argument addressed to his sympathy or his justice—no appeal that necessity compels the sale, and therefore he ought to give a fair consideration. No, sir, that is the very kind of case he has been anxiously looking for; and, prompted by his cupidity, he will ruin the seller for the sake of his own gain. And would not this be the fact in reference to the lands given to the Kentucky Deaf and Dumb Asylum, if forced into the market? Would they not be sacrificed? Could any gentleman seriously suppose, that, if it was known to all the buyers that the land must be sold or forfeited within a given time, they would offer five dollars an acre for it? One would underbid, and another would underbid, and finally the object of the benevolence of the Government would be completely defeated. The institution is going on prosperously; it sustained a high character, and promised very extensive utility. All it asked was for a little time. Its property was rising; and would soon command a respectable price. If the sale were compelled at present, the land must necessarily fall into the hands of speculators; and how would the Territory of Florida be benefited by the change? The speculators would not be compelled to settle the land, and would be sure to keep it up for higher prices. Florida would not be settled any sooner in the one case than in the other. If, however, gentlemen were desirous of defeating their own benevolence, all they had to do was to vote for the motion of postponement, and then the greedy speculator would carry away the patrimony of these poor deaf and dumb children. Why should the House refuse to extend the time for sale? If ten years, instead of five, had been asked in the first instance, the one period would have been as readily granted as the other. The trustees had proved their willingness to sell, for they had actually sold two-thirds of the land. Why not allow them the requisite time to dispose of the residue?

Mr. L. said, he had no personal motive in supporting the bill; the institution was not within his district; but he was acquainted with its condition, knew it to be well conducted, and to enjoy a high reputation. It was filled with interesting youth, whose unfortunate privation bespoke for them the compassion of every benevolent heart. The gentleman from Florida, however, was unwilling to pass this bill, because there were other bills on the table containing grants of a similar character. But if that were the case, when those bills should come up, the gentleman could oppose them if he felt it to be his duty, but ought not to urge his expectation of other bills as an argument against this one. A more reasonable and unexceptionable request than that of the trustees of this institution could not be made, and he felt perfectly confident it would be unhesitatingly granted by the House.

Mr. VINTON said that he hoped the bill would pass. He could not think with the gentleman from Florida, that there was reason to apprehend the institution to which the land in question belongs would attempt to hold up its land from sale, so as to avail itself of an enhanced price by that means. It must be recollected, this was a charitable institution, and, like all such institutions in this country, presumed to be in want of money. The land was in a state of nature, and situated in advance of the settlements; it is, therefore, quite apparent that the institution can never clear up and cultivate this land, so as to make it productive of revenue. As long as the land remained unsold, it must be dead and unproductive property. It will, therefore, always be the interest of the institution to sell this land, when and as fast as it can be disposed of at its fair value, and for less than that it ought not to be compelled to part with its property. It can never be the interest of the institution to hold up the land, and pay the taxes that would be assessed upon it: as I understand the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KINCAID] the grant will be forfeited, unless the residue on hand is disposed of within a twelve-month from now; and that about eight thousand acres remain unsold. Now, sir, every day, and every hour, diminishes the value of this land to its present owners. There are millions of acres of land, both public and private, beyond any present demand for settlement, in market, in Florida and every part of the western and southwestern sections of the United States. Many gentlemen on this floor, from those sections, who are proprietors of uncultivated lands, very well know that an individual who was obliged to dispose of eight thousand acres of wild land in the short period of a year, would necessarily be compelled to sacrifice nearly the full value of his property. This institution can do no more than an individual, to effect sales on fair terms. It is therefore obvious, that, unless we grant the time proposed by the bill, which he thought quite little enough, the property of this charitable and humane institution would fall a prey to speculators, who would buy on their own terms, perhaps for one or two dollars per acre, land which, from the remarks of the gentleman from Florida, there is reason to think may be worth ten or twenty times that amount.

Mr. WHITE briefly replied to Mr. LETCHER and Mr. VINTON.

Mr. ISACKS was in favor of the bill, but thought the time asked was longer than necessary; and moved to reduce the proposed extension to three, instead of five years.

Mr. DANIEL opposed the amendment, and supported the bill.

The question was put successively on the amendment and the indefinite postponement, and both motions were negatived by large majorities.

Mr. WHITE then moved an amendment, to provide that the lands should be liable to taxation as private lands; which motion was also negatived; and

The bill was ordered to a third reading, by a large majority.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HAYNES in the chair, on the

BUFFALO AND NEW ORLEANS ROAD BILL.

Mr. MERCER rose, and spoke two hours in continuation and conclusion of the speech which he commenced in support of the bill when it was last under consideration.

Mr. HUBBARD said, it must have occurred to every individual who had observed the course of proceedings in the Congress of the United States since the adoption of our constitution, that a most important and somewhat extraordinary change had taken place in the character of its legislation within the last fifteen years of our history. Instead of now being confined to an equitable adjustment of our exterior relations—instead of now being confined to the transaction of our public business, and to the liquidation of private claims against the Government—instead of being limited exclusively to measures designed for the common defence, or for the advancement of the general welfare—instead of having the legislative action of Congress confined to objects of this character—instead of giving heed to those things which shall, in effect, advance the great interests of the republic—of this whole republic—instead of providing ways and means to extinguish our national debt, and to secure a revenue, for the further purpose of defraying the necessary expenditures of the Government—it would seem that, within the period named, the legislation of Congress has, to an alarming extent, been directed to local and limited objects. It would seem that the course of our modern legislation has been for the protection of the few, to the injury of the many; and from the numerous and multifarious applications which have flooded in upon us since the commencement of the present session, to appropriate portions of the common fund to objects of local and internal improvement, it would seem to be the order of the day, that we should sit here, as session justices—receive petitions for new highways—hear the reasons for and against—pass judgment thereon; and should the contemplated improvement begin in one, and end in another State, we are at once to give it the name of national—send forth our brigade of engineers, to mark and survey, and return to us a profile of the improvement.

Such proceedings are not unfrequent in my own region of country: they, in truth, constitute almost exclusively the jurisdiction of "the session courts in New England." But, in my judgment, they illy comport with the dignity, or accord with the legitimate action of Congress. The little excitement which was manifested the other morning while this bill was under discussion, when it was proposed by one gentleman to change the route so as to pass the other side of the mountain; by another, to confine the course to the metropolitan route; and, when it was suggested by a third that he could not, as much as he loved his constituents, through whose territory the road was intended to pass, "go for the whole hog," that he must stop at Memphis—it could not fail to bring to mind the events which ordinarily happen whenever applications are made for the laying out of new roads, especially when such contemplated improvements would, in effect, divert the public travel from the doors of our early settlers: on this subject, more than on any other, the people are peculiarly sensitive; and the scramble over the way satisfied my mind, most conclusively, of this fact, that each of the parties litigant conscientiously believed that this great national road, to give it a more perfect national character, should pass directly through his own national district. The gentlemen were not prepared to go quite as far as a very honest but zealous yankee did on a certain occasion, when an application had been presented to the proper authority for a new road, and which, if established, would divert the travel from his own door: he declared its impolicy in the most emphatic manner, by alleging that, starting from the given point, and travelling either north or south, east or west, you must pass his own habitation. No, the gentlemen who were engaged in asserting the claims of their favorite routes, were not quite so extravagant as my own countryman. But, from what was then heard, from what was then seen, from what is invariably heard and seen on similar occasions, we are forced to say, "O, judgment, thou art fled." The various plans of the parties concerned could not fail to impress our minds, that, starting from Buffalo, going east, southeast, southwest, or south, or, according to the mighty project of my friend [Mr. RICHARDSON] from Massachusetts, going northeast to the waters of Champlain, still we should be conducted on the great national road from the northern and the western lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, from Buffalo to New Orleans. Yes, it does seem, from what has transpired, that we are hereafter to be constituted as the great road court of the country; and whenever a new highway shall be wanted in any one of the States of this Union, which may, by chance, accommodate an itinerant citizen from another State, it is at once to receive the baptismal name of national, and thus be presented to our consideration; and with such an imposing character, (judging from what has taken place,) it will not fail to receive the deliberate and successful attention of Congress. I should not have submitted any remarks to the committee on this subject, did I not feel constrained by a sense of duty, a duty which I owe to my constituents, to state, most distinctly, the reasons which have induced me, and I presume my colleagues, to vote against the bill which has already passed, making appropriations for the Cumberland road; and which will induce me to vote against the bill now under consideration. Before I proceed to state my objections to this bill, I must ask the indulgence of the committee for a few minutes, while I advert to some of the reasons which were urged by my worthy friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RICHARDSON] in favor of the measure. If I rightly understood that gentleman, this project had his support; that his feelings were warmly enlisted in its favor, not on account of its own intrinsic merits, but for the reason that it might and would lead to other improvements nearer and of more interest to him and his constituents, and which could not fail to secure New England influence in favor of this system of internal improvements. And the gentleman, with great sagacity, and with his usual force, for the purpose of getting up a New England excitement favorable to this project, and for the purpose of securing the votes of her delegation in favor of this measure, proposes to connect with the project now under consideration, a plan for extending the road from Buffalo to the waters of Champlain, and from thence to the great market town in New England. And the gentleman has gravely told us that a road of such extensive dimensions, passing from New Orleans, by the way of Buffalo and Champlain, to the city of Boston, through not less than twelve States of this Union, would be so national in its character, so grand in its object, of such vast importance in a commercial and in a military point of view to the country, that it would be so conducive to the common defence and the general welfare of the republic, that he should feel constrained with all his heart, strength, and mind, to give to such a mighty measure his most unqualified support.

If the gentleman had been a little more comprehensive in his extended plan, he might possibly have hushed, in every part of New England, the silent murmur of discontent. If, after winding through Vermont, he had passed down the banks of the Connecticut, by Hartford, to Saybrook, and from thence had continued a metropolitan route by Newport and Providence to Boston; if the gentleman had enlarged his plan by establishing one other branch, passing from the lake to the Connecticut, thence through the White Hills to Portland, and from thence on a metropolitan route through Portsmouth to Boston, he would have added three more States of the Union to his number, and the plan would have been so national in its character and in its object, would so much increase the facilities for commercial intercourse, would so essentially aid the military operations of the country, would so directly contribute to expediting the conveyance of the public mail, that, if the gentleman is not mistaken in his doctrine; every yankee voice in New England would be loud and clamorous in favor of this mighty scheme. But, if the gentleman has erected his superstructure on a sandy foundation, it will ultimately fall. If reason and if fact stand opposed to the improvement contemplated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, he can never expect the co-operation of the intelligent yeomanry of New England. They will not be deceived. They can never yield their assent to a measure of so great and so gross injustice as the one now under consideration. They never will voluntarily agree to such an inequitable distribution of the common fund, as is provided by the present bill, or even as would be provided by the bill with the gentleman's amendment.

Let us examine with some minuteness the plan of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and see whether New England should give her aid for the road from Buffalo to New Orleans, with the belief that this contemplated addition would be of the least practical advantage to a single State within her borders. Whether, in truth, if the whole plan of the gentleman could be perfected, it would not hereafter operate to our detriment, at some future period of our history, when our surplus revenue shall be divided among the several States upon principles of justice and equity—will it not then be said, that the national road of the gentleman from Massachusetts has swallowed up the portion of New England? Believing, as I do, that for no national purpose whatever can a new and independent way be wanted from Buffalo to Boston—believing, as I do, that the construction of such a road would not add to the existing facilities of communication in any point of view—I cannot consent to tax my constituents with such an unnecessary expenditure of the public treasure, even within the territorial limits of New England. It would be a measure of great inexpediency, and to New England herself the height of impolicy. Her doctrine now is, ever has been, and ever will be—waste not the common fund, but mete out to her and to every section of the Union the measure of equal justice. She asks no more at your hands; with less she ought not to be, and never will be, willingly satisfied. I could not have supposed it possible that any individual, with a knowledge of the existing facilities of communication between the interior and the market of New England, could have conceived the idea of constructing a new national road at the cost and charge of the United States, from Boston to Lake Champlain, and from Champlain to Buffalo. It looks to me like one of the most extravagant fantasies that ever entered the head of the most extravagant enthusiast. The present exigency of the country for any national purposes does not call for such a road. If such a road was at this moment well constructed and made, it could not, in the nature of things, tend to increase the commercial intercourse, or to augment the facilities of communication between those two points. There is but little difference between the latitudes of Buffalo and Boston. And establish railroads, or any other facilities of communication, from Lake Erie to Boston; give them, if you please, the imposing name of national ways, and you could not then induce the farmer, destined to market with the produce of his farm, to cross the Hudson. No; when he arrives there, he well knows that, in twelve hours, he can be conveyed to the largest and to the best market in our country, by the safest, most direct, and most expeditious way and mode. And as soon would you find fire in ice, as find the farmer of Buffalo travelling on the gentleman's national road, with his pigs and his poultry, to the market of New England. Men never will voluntarily act against their own interest. The Erie and the Champlain canals, and the waters of the Hudson, have brought the market of New York near to the farmers of the northern and the western lakes; and it would not happen, that such an intelligent and sagacious body of people as compose the farming interests in those regions of country, would ever transport their produce from the Hudson, two hundred miles, either over railroads or national roads, to the market of New England. But this is not all. The gentleman must, according to his scheme, leave the western canals—the great highway of the western country—and wind his way through the inteprior of New York; and, if he designs to find the waters of Champlain at Plattsburg, he would carry us in a north-eastern direction, into the northeast county, and almost to the northeast corner of that State. In such an excursive range, he would assuredly lose his point of compass; he would find himself two degrees, at least, north of his line. But the gentleman, probably, goes on this principle, that the more circuitous the route, the more national the object. From Plattsburg the gentleman would undoubtedly transport us across the lake, on floating bridges, to Burlington; from thence, on his national road, by Onion river, to Montpelier; from thence, by White river, to Hartford, in Vermont; and from thence, by Concord, in New Hampshire, to Boston.

This looks well on paper, it sounds well in story; it may have entered the imaginations of some of the most zealous friends of internal improvement within the limits of New England. It may, for aught I know, be among the numerous plans in contemplation, upon which the surplus revenue, the property of all, the common fund of the nation, is hereafter to be expended. But, mark my word: the warmest supporters of these measures will never live to see a road constructed and supported by this Government from Buffalo to Boston. Some New England gentlemen may honestly believe that it may take place; some gentlemen may sincerely wish it. But, for one, I am incredulous. The influence of New England never has, and never can be successfully exerted in obtaining appropriations from the common fund for the purpose of accomplishing local objects of internal improvement within her own limits. If considerations of interest should control my vote on this question, as one of the delegation from New England, as one disposed to look to her interest, I should feel constrained to oppose, in every shape, the appropriation of the public money for local purposes. But other considerations, in connexion, which I shall take the liberty soon to suggest, have produced on my mind the conviction that I have no right to put my hand into the public treasury, and draw from thence, for particular and local objects, any portion of the public fund, the property of all, without the consent of all.

I have said that the expectations, the hopes of the gentleman from Massachusetts would never be realized. And why? For this plain, this forcible reason: there does not exist any necessity for this great and contemplated improvement. The condition of the highways from the lakes to the ocean forbids the idea that millions of the public treasure will be expended in effecting improvements not absolutely required by the exigencies of the country. No, if we can, and if we will, go on in appropriating money, or parts of the public domain, for local and particular objects, the West and the Southwest will be ready, with open arms and with irresistible claims, for years yet to come, to receive all that can be spared from your public treasury. It will be said, and be said with effect, when the proposed amendment of my friend from Massachusetts shall be under consideration, that Vermont, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts have already anticipated the Government, that their roads are already well made.

You do not, as might be imagined from the character of the proposition, and from the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, after crossing the waters of the northern lake, pass into a trackless wilderness. No; but you find a highly cultivated country; a rich, a prosperous, and an enterprising people; men who know the value of your institutions; men who have fought for your liberties; men who are patriots, not in word but in deed; men who have, by their own pecuniary and physical means, constructed as fine "national" roads from the lake to the ocean, as honest hearts could desire, as faithful hands have ever wrought. And, unless I greatly misjudge, the good people of my own State would not wish to have the common fund appropriated in the furtherance of such a project.

If a portion is to be dealt out to my own State, New Hampshire should direct and control its expenditure. It is not in her heart to desire any unnecessary, any useless expenditure of the common property, even if that expenditure should be made within her own territory. No such sentiment, no such feeling exists among the people of that granite State. The general welfare is her text and her commentary. It is perfectly true that the country cannot boast of better roads, roads wrought with her own hands, than are now to be found in the very route and over the very ground hereinbefore described; and which route must have entered the imagination of the gentleman, when he conceived his grand national project.

If I am mistaken in the contemplated plan of my friend from Massachusetts—if it is his purpose to strike the waters of Champlain at Whitehall, and wind his way through Vermont to the banks of Connecticut, near my own native village, and from thence to the market of New England, I would merely suggest that all that I have said in relation to the inexpediency and impolicy of the measure, on the northern route, will apply with equal force to the course last alluded to. It is well known that, from the Connecticut river, through this section of New Hampshire and Massachusetts, every facility is already furnished, at the exclusive charge of those States, for the transportation of the farmer's produce, for the accommodation and comfort of the traveller, as far as the construction and completion of good roads can furnish such facilities. The present exigencies of the country do not call for this improvement through those sections of New England. And her influence should not be enlisted in favor of the bill before us, from the idea that the contemplated amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts will be adopted. The true policy of those in New England who are the devoted friends of a system of internal improvements, most clearly is, a just and equal distribution of the common fund, upon the principle of representation, to be expended under the direction of the States. This would give to her equal rights. Without this, New England never can, and never will, have meted out to her a full measure of justice. The existing state of her roads, and the existing facilities for internal communication, forbid the idea; and her delegation, looking solely to her interests, would do well, in my judgment, to oppose every appropriation for improvements in any one State, without an equitable appropriation, upon the principle just stated, to the other members of the Union.

In New Hampshire, not a dollar of the common fund has ever been expended in the construction of her public roads. The people of that State have, by their own voluntary contributions, established and made every road within her limits. I have said that these roads are wrought by the voluntary contribution of the people. The remark needs explanation.

The members of the town corporations in New Hampshire—the purest democracies in the known world—assemble at stated periods, with equal rights and equal privileges. The man who has attained the age of twenty-one years, whether he be or not the owner of property, has the same political power as the richest of his neighbors. And, at these primary meetings, composed of the people, who are most emphatically the true sovereigns of this part of our country, money is voluntarily voted, for the purpose of making and repairing public highways, and for the further and worthy object of instructing and educating the rising generation. For these and for all other purposes necessary for the well being of society, the people freely vote to tax themselves. In this way, not less than two hundred thousand dollars is annually raised in New Hampshire, for the making and repairing of their public roads. In this way, but little less than a like amount is annually raised for the support of her free schools. And the money is not only raised, but it is most faithfully applied and expended; and, "year following year," the people reap their reward, in the improved condition of their public ways, and in the improved state of those who shall come after them. In New Hampshire, the cultivators are generally the owners of the soil. Her practical husbandmen are the yeomanry of her State. Her citizens are not less distinguished for their habits of industry than for the purity of their patriotism.

In the manner I have stated, by the application of our own means, have all the improvements in the roads and canals in New Hampshire been made; and it cannot be supposed that I would be silent, with a knowledge of these facts, and see drawn, indirectly, from the pockets of my fellow-citizens, annually, the enormous tax of two hundred thousand dollars, (which I will attempt soon to explain,) for the purpose of constructing new roads in Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Carolina, three of the oldest sisters in the confederacy.

No, I feel myself called upon most solemnly to protest against a measure of so gross injustice. True it is, that Virginia has been first and foremost in opposing this encroachment on constitutional right. True it is, that a majority of her delegation will stand forth now in opposition to the measure before us. But it is no less true, that the bill contemplates the construction of this national road through a portion of her territory. Whether with or without her consent, I know not. But my argument is, if this road is wanted for any public purpose—if it is necessary—let Virginia follow the example of New Hampshire. Let this road, within her limits, be made by her own pecuniary and physical means. And whenever such a necessity shall exist—whenever the exigencies of the country shall require a new and continuous national road from the seat of Government to New Orleans—there can be no doubt, from the course which Virginia has heretofore taken, that she will construct this road, within her own limits, unaided by the General Government.

The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ALCORN] who addressed the committee a few days since, remarked, that if any appropriations were to be made for purposes of internal improvement, they should be given to the West. I do not stand here to make any sectional distinctions; I do not intend to controvert that point with the gentleman from Virginia; it is enough for me to know, that on this question we shall act in unison; but I would wish to put the gentleman right. As far as it respects the State which I, in part, represent, the remark is unjust. I have heretofore stated, what is strictly true, that not a dollar of the public money has ever been expended in the construction of her roads. No such remark can with truth be applied to the western States. True, in New Hampshire, a light-house has been built near the outlet of the harbor at Portsmouth; a measure which was of all importance to the safety of our public as well as of our private ships. True, a navy yard has been established within her limits, and wisely and judiciously established; and if it were necessary to show this, I think I should find little difficulty in satisfying this committee, that, notwithstanding the bewildering fogs which at times hover over our sea coast, the navy yard at Portsmouth, considering its perfect security, and the entire safety of that harbor, should be sustained. Yet, sir, this pittance, if reports and rumors are to be relied upon, is soon to be denied us. These works are exclusively national; they do not materially affect the State in which they are located; works which were established with a proper view to the general welfare. And, while the western States have been permitted to carve liberally from the public domain, for their benefit, the State of New Hampshire has, unaided, managed her own affairs in her own way. While appropriations, exceeding in amount seven millions of dollars, have been made for the exclusive advantage of the western States, New England has done her part in paying; but, with the exception of a few thousands to Maine, she has not received a dollar for local objects. I know full well that such allusions and comparisons should not be made on this floor; but I could not let the suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia pass unnoticed. I should feel unwilling to have that gentleman suppose that New Hampshire has had any portion of the common fund meted out to her for any purpose of internal improvement.

I cannot but regard the improvement of our harbors and navigable rivers, the erection of light-houses and of breakwaters, as so essentially connected with the commerce of the country, from which we derive the greater portion of our revenue, as objects falling clearly within the legitimate action of Congress, under the express power given by the constitution to regulate commerce. I cannot but regard fortifications and military roads as so essentially connected with the common defence, and with the general welfare, as objects properly claiming our consideration. For all such objects, I have felt myself bound, as I would contribute to promote the common defence and advance the general welfare, to give my support. And in favor of every such measure, during the present session, my vote has freely been given. Beyond this I cannot go, consistently with my own views of the constitutional powers of Congress, and consistently with my regard to that sacred principle of strict and impartial justice to each member of the confederacy in the distribution of the common fund.

Until I shall believe that general and particular—national and sectional—limited and unlimited—reserved and unreserved, are synonymous terms, I can never yield my assent to a construction of the constitution, by which instrument authority is expressly given to Congress to provide for the general welfare; that this power is legitimately exercised by Congress, in appropriating any portion of the public property for local purposes. I can never yield my assent to the doctrine, that a road from Buffalo to Washington is a national road; that a road from Washington to New Orleans is a national road; or that a continuous road from Boston, by the northern and western lakes, by the seat of Government to New Orleans, is a national road. It cannot deserve such a name, unless it be necessary to the common defence of the country; or unless it be clearly productive of the general welfare—the welfare, not of a part, but of the whole republic. In my judgment, such a description of highways alone merits the name of national roads. Nor can I conceive that any partial expenditure of the common fund, for local objects, can have any tendency to rivet more strongly the various members of the confederacy—to cement more firmly the great bond of national union. No, sir, in my humble judgment, a totally different effect will be the consequence of such partial and limited legislation. It is admitted that the ingenuity of man has never yet produced a better form of government than our own; and that no government could be devised, better calculated to subserve the great interests of the American people. And, sir, it may with great propriety and truth be said, that no people have ever enjoyed more real happiness—more rational liberty, than the people of this republic; and may it not be urged, that this enjoyment of freedom, in which the American people have hitherto so largely participated, has been the result of confining our legislative operations within the pale of our written constitution? that we have had with us our political fathers and friends, who laid the foundation of this republic—to tell us the story of olden time—to remind us what was granted and what was reserved by the people—to warn us of the danger of giving any forced construction to the charter of our liberties, and to remind us to keep within its letter? No doubt, sir, but the seasonable admonitions of these early friends of the republic have had a most salutary effect—have induced those who have come after them to rally round the constitution of the country as the grand pillar of their liberties, the only sure foundation of their political peace.

In the virtue and intelligence of the American people I have full confidence; and although thick clouds may seem to gather over us at this time—although there may seem to be a spirit abroad in the land, unfriendly to the permanent existence of our free institutions—although, on some great national interests, honest politicians may honestly differ in opinion, yet the republic will safely ride out the storm. Our country, our whole country, is a sentiment which cannot fail to influence the public conduct of every upright legislator. The people may think differently—put in jeopardy their liberties, and they will act together. If the majority of the tax payers of this republic are favorably disposed to the subject of internal improvements—to this road-making project—the system will continue; if otherwise, it cannot progress. And I do, therefore, entreat gentlemen who profess to be the ardent supporters of this system, not to halt, but to go forward, and put the subject home to every man in the community. Let the people not be deceived—let them see—let them feel the effect of this policy at once. I presume that no member of this committee will pretend that he can, constitutionally, take a given portion of the common fund, and appropriate it for purposes of local internal improvements, unless he could impose a direct tax to the same amount upon the people for the same object. No, even in this day of strange things no such absurdity would be pretended. I would, therefore, for the purpose of ascertaining the true state of the public mind on this subject, which is in all probability hereafter to claim much of the time and attention of Congress, recommend to the warm friends of this measure to let the treasury alone, to keep their hands clean, and impose a direct tax upon the people for the amount wanted. Raise a sum of five millions of dollars (for a less sum will not suffice) by direct taxation. Send your tax gatherers to every hamlet—to every man in your country; tell him you want his money for the purpose of constructing a national road from Buffalo to New Orleans, or, should the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts be adopted, from Boston, by the northern and western lakes, to the city of Washington, and from thence to New Orleans; and the return of these officers will tell you a tale that cannot be misunderstood. They will give you the honest state of public opinion; and I greatly miscalculate the signs of the times, if the present friends of this system would not then be found among its enemies. I greatly misjudge if the sovereigns of this country would not speak in such a manner as to make the throne itself tremble. At any event, in this way the honest, unbiassed sentiment of the public mind would be made known in relation to the important subjects of making local internal improvements, at the cost and under the direction of this Government. This would be the fair course. This would be the honest course. But the course now pursued, first filling your treasury by indirect taxation, and then taking therefrom what is wanted to answer particular purposes, is the most deceptive to the people at large.

The consumers, who are the tax payers of this country, annually contribute to the filling of the public treasury, without seeming to care in what way the money is expended. They know that a large public debt is outstanding—they know that the Government must be sustained—they know that fortifications must be erected, and must be armed—they know that our navy must be supported, and that our army will not be deserted. They know these things; and they know that the resources of the nation may be legitimately applied to these objects. And they believe that their public servants will not appropriate from the common fund for any thing not connected with the common defence or promotive of the general welfare. On this point a great portion of the American people have not sufficiently reflected, because their attention has not been drawn to it by any regard to their interest—put directly to them—put home upon them—let them feel, let them know that their money is wanted, and for what purpose, and they will reflect—they will consider, and they will determine in this grand question. With that determination future Congresses would be content; and, acquiescing in that determination, nothing more would be said or done about expending the property of all for the benefit of the few.

It is of no importance to determine whether more or less of the revenue is collected in one or in another section of the country. Although frequent allusions have been made to the amount paid into your public treasury by particular States, yet, is it not to be inferred from that circumstance that the inhabitants of those particular States are in that proportion the actual contributors to your revenue? No! At ports of entry your revenue is collected, but the people—the consumers are the payers; and although, in the region of country where I happen to live, the people may not be known at the treasury, yet the wares and merchandise by them consumed draws heavily upon their purses, to supply the common fund; and whether the goods are entered at Providence, or Boston, or Portsmouth, they are nevertheless part of the consumers of the country, and pay their full and just share for the support of the Government.

The good citizens of my own State are not, and never have been, behind the citizens of the other States, in contributing their full portion of physical and pecuniary means for the common defence of the republic, and for the advancement of its general welfare. But I hold it to be unequal and unjust that they should be taxed for the benefit of particular sections of the Union. Such a course strikes my mind as anti-republican—as against the spirit of our free institutions—as at war with the first principles of our federative Government. And entertaining such sentiments, we will not aid in such projects; as much as we love our sister States, and rejoice in their prosperity, we cannot but regard this measure as an attempt to appropriate a portion of the common fund for local objects, by mere numerical force, without the consent and against the will of some of the old members of the confederacy, who were partners to the original contract. And believing that I know the sentiments of New Hampshire on this subject, I should be unfaithful to my constituents should I withhold my vote against this project; should I suffer it to pass without raising my voice against it. I must oppose the measure as fraught with the grossest injustice.

It not my purpose, at this time, to present an argument on the constitutional powers of Congress to construct roads—that subject has been often and ably discussed; but I have been, and I shall be obliged, in the further prosecution of this subject, to submit some incidental remarks in relation to the legitimate exercise of the power granted to Congress by the express provisions of the constitution, in relation to the subject of making local improvements at the expense of this Government.

I have said that I must oppose this particular bill now under consideration; and the principal reasons which have induced this opposition, independent of constitutional objections, I will succinctly state.

I do not believe that this road would be of such national importance—of such indispensable necessity, as to justify Congress in constructing and perfecting it at the expense of the Government.

I do believe that all these facilities of communication between one section and another section of our country should be provided at the expense of the several States, within whose limits such improvements are required.

I do believe that all appropriations made for such purposes, at the cost and expense of the General Government, must of necessity be unequal and unjust; bearing lightly on some sections of the Union, and heavily on others—bestowing your munificence on some sections of the Union—withholding it from others—and on this account, such projects should not receive the favorable consideration of Congress.

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

I do not believe that national expenditures for purposes of internal improvement, tend to a dangerous increase and influence of Executive patronage.

I do believe that a sense of justice, which should invariably control the operations of our Government, requires, upon some fixed and established principle, a just distribution of the surplus revenue among the several States, provided that fund must continue to be drawn from the pockets of the people, for the purpose of being expended in the construction of roads and canals. I say that a sense of justice, in such a case, demands that an equitable division should be made among all the members of the confederacy. Any thing short of this would savor of injustice and oppression.

These are among the reasons why I shall vote against this bill.

I cannot regard this measure, notwithstanding all that has been urged, as necessary either for commercial or military purposes, or for the more safe or more expeditious transportation of the public mail. The inexpediency of this particular project, on these several points, has been most fully and satisfactorily shown, by the able argument of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BARROUR] who first addressed the committee; and at this late hour of the debate, I do not purpose to trespass on their patience by any minute examination of these topics, but shall merely give some very general views in relation to them.

It is alleged that this road would be of great national importance, in a commercial point of view; that, regarding it as the means of affording great commercial facilities, it ought to be constructed at the expense of the republic. I ask, where is the evidence in support of this fact? Where are the reasons, the considerations, which would warrant this committee in coming to this conclusion? We look in vain for them. They exist merely in the imaginations of gentlemen! They have no real foundation. It is not in the nature of things that our commercial intercourse between Buffalo and New Orleans can be, or would be, increased by the construction of this road.

Any individual, acquainted with the geography of the country, cannot for a moment suppose that should this road, in course of time, become like the Apian way—should it become perfected by the location of iron rails—that any of the commerce of the lakes—that any of the trade in the proximity of these lakes—that any of the business of Buffalo, or of that region of country, would be diverted from their natural channels. No; make this national road as fine and as perfect as the art, the ingenuity, and the industry of man can make it—still, not a single ton less of the produce of the country would float down the western canal; not a single ton less of merchandise would be transported upon it from the market to the interior.

The great object of the farmer is to find a market for the produce of the labor of his hands. The great object of the cultivators of the soil is to obtain, at the least possible expense, a market for all they make to sell; and it cannot seriously be urged that the products of the agriculturist or the manufacturers would be transported from the region of Buffalo, over this road, through the State of Pennsylvania, to the city of Washington, and from thence to New Orleans. The idea is preposterous. A better way is already provided—one, not by the funds of this Government, but by the enterprise and the efforts of a single State. A better market is at hand; and our farmers would be a little too attentive to their interests to abandon that way and that market for this great national road, or for all the prospects of gain which Washington or New Orleans could afford!

The expense of constructing this road cannot be justified for any commercial purpose. It is further urged that this road would be of great national importance, regarding it as the means of facilitating the transportation of the munitions of war. That this nation would have this for a great military road, I am equally incredulous on this point as on the one which I have just noticed. It cannot be wanted for this plain reason—that such are the facilities of communication which now exist between the different sections of this republic, that even should this country be visited with the calamity of another war, in that event this road between Buffalo and New Orleans would be but little used as a military road. Better ways are now in existence or in progress for carrying heavy ordnance and all munitions of war from Buffalo and the region of the lakes, by our canals and our rivers, even to New Orleans. And such is the nature of these facilities for internal communications, that our munitions of war can, at all times, be conveyed with much less expense and loss than would be unavoidable in the use of this national road for any such purposes. And such transportations can, at all times, be made with the most perfect safety to the country, free from the danger of attack from any enemy whatever.

It is further urged that this road is intended for the transportation of the public mail, and in that view should be regarded as of sufficient national importance to warrant the expense of constructing and completing this contemplated improvement. I am free to admit that it should be among the leading objects of those who have the administration or the legislation of the country committed to their hands, to provide for the safe and expeditious transportation and conveyance of the public mail. It is due to our citizens, it is due to the people that their representatives should do all that can with propriety be done, to give them the means of receiving information of the passing events of the times, with safety and with all possible expedition. Nevertheless, in the establishment of a post road, or in the construction of any way over which the public mail is to be conveyed, every unnecessary or imprudent expenditure of the common treasure should be avoided. Some sacrifices must be made for the public weal—individuals must submit to some inconveniences for the advancement of the general welfare. Now, this road is not called for, to facilitate or to expedite the public mail from Buffalo to Washington. It is well known that such a new way for any such object is not required, and would not tend to the promotion either of individual interest or of the general good.

And how is the fact in relation to the contemplated road between the city of Washington and New Orleans? Whatever reasons may exist for constructing a post road, on a part of the route, for the more purpose of a more safe and expeditious conveyance of the public mail, I cannot for a moment entertain the idea that, at this period of our history, there exists any necessity for this Government to lend her aid in the construction of any public road, for any purpose whatever, through the territorial limits of these parts of the Union. Is it come to this, that the funds of the nation are to be taxed to make a national road through Virginia, for the pretended purpose of the necessary transportation of the public mail? No, it cannot be; and I was not surprised, I was gratified, to hear one of the lineal sons of the ancient dominion, on this floor, in so eloquent and so forcible a manner, repudiate that idea.

The facts which are within the reach of every member of this House, must satisfactorily prove that this road is not indispensably necessary, either for the safe transportation, or for the more expeditious conveyance of the public mail. I cannot, therefore, feel justified, upon any view of the subject, in lending any aid in accomplishing this improvement at the expense and under the direction of this Government, on the ground that it is of a national character, and of national importance. And I am unable to discover why this better deserves the name of national road, than any public road which begins and which ends in my own State. It merits not the name; and we, the re-representatives of the people, ought not to appropriate the property of this nation in establishing this road, either for the pretended purpose of facilitating the intercourse between different sections of the Union—for carrying on internal commerce, as it is called—for the purpose of a military road, or for the purpose of a more safe and expeditious conveyance of the public mail. The objects to be attained would not justify the expense; and, as the faithful guardians of the interests of the people, it does strongly impress my mind that we should oppose the measure, at all events as inexpedient and as impolitic.

In the course of my remarks, I have said, and I now repeat, that if the present tariff of duties should be continued; if we are determined annually to drain from the pockets of the people twelve millions of dollars more than can be necessary for the gradual reduction and ultimate discharge of the public debt, and to meet the ordinary expenditures of this Government; if such a surplus shall annually be at the disposal of the Congress of the United States; if this amount is annually to be distributed, under the direction and control of the National Legislature; if this sum, or any portion of it, is to be appropriated on objects of internal improvement, I ask, how shall it be divided? how shall it be distributed? In one section of the Union? Forbid it, ye ministers of justice! I answer, as the whole Union contributed to the common fund, let the whole Union participate in the benefits of the distribution. As I have before said, apportion this fund, upon some settled and equitable principles, among the several States, unless you are disposed to do a still greater act of justice, by leaving it untouched in the pockets of the people.

If the United States should receive no more from imposts than would be required to meet the current expenses of the Government, to provide the ways and means of extinguishing the public debt, would Congress presume to impose a direct tax, for the express purpose of collecting a fund to be appropriated in the construction of roads and canals, or any other objects of internal improvement not clearly warranted by the letter of the constitution? They would not dare to do this. Such an experiment would, in my judgment, prove fatal to the best hopes of the friends of this system.

How would the proposition have been received, (by the tax-paying people of this country,) to have incorporated a provision in the constitution, vesting a power in Congress to establish and regulate imposts, not for the purpose of collecting a revenue for the support of Government; not for the purpose of protecting any particular interests; but for the mere object of collecting a fund to be appropriated, under the direction of Congress, from time to time, on local objects of internal improvement? Sir, such a proposition would have excited a general feeling of hostility, from one to the other extreme of the confederacy. The constitution never would have been accepted by the tax-paying people of this republic, if such a provision had been expressly introduced into it by our political fathers. They too well understood the character of the American people, to have recommended to them to invest in Congress any such power.

Would New Hampshire have gone forward, and by her vote unqualifiedly accepted the constitution as binding upon herself? Would any of the small States of the Union have done this, if the great States, in the legitimate exercise of their constitutional powers, could appropriate any portion of the revenue for making roads and canals, or for any objects of internal improvement? No, sooner would they have remained in their colonial relation to the mother country, than to have jeopardized their particular rights, by yielding any such general power; and not until the latter period of our history, have any such powers been attempted to be exercised. When the constitution came fresh from the hands of the people, its provisions were perfectly well understood; the powers granted and the powers reserved by the people were not then matters of speculation. The great struggle, which had terminated in the establishment of our country's independence, was too recent; the people were then too jealous of power, to have accepted any charter of their liberties, containing any provision which might, by possibility, prove dangerous to their rights as freemen. Never would they have jeopardized their equal privileges, by giving to the majority of Congress the power, at any time, to appropriate the common fund as their mere will and pleasure should direct. If such a power had been supposed to have existed under our constitution, it would have been early exercised; and I presume to state, that we should not at this time have had to pass over a road so badly made as we now find between the city of Richmond and the Potomac. If such a power had been supposed to have existed, the great influence of Virginia in the councils of this nation would have been successfully exerted in the construction of all her public roads, at the expense and under the direction of this Government. If such a power had been supposed, in our early history, to have appertained to the Congress of these United States, not a road or canal would have been made without the application of the pecuniary means of the republic. But no such sentiment was then entertained; no such idea was harbored by our political fathers. They then believed, and they then practised, that Congress only had the power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." They believed, and practised, that they had not the power of laying and collecting imposts for any other purpose.

It was reserved for this day of strange things to give a different construction to the constitutional powers of Congress. In some of the members of this Union, admitted since the establishment of our present Government, a construction seems to be given to the constitution, compatible with an enlarged and liberal exercise of congressional power. And if the sentiments of the States are fairly represented by the opinion and votes of their delegates, there are some of the oldest States who now believe that a power exists in Congress to lay and collect imposts for purposes of internal improvement—such a liberal and enlarged construction to our constitution must have been the growth of modern time.

I cannot believe, however, such to be the sentiment of New Hampshire; and on this point I do not speak without authority. In 1822, our legislature had their attention drawn expressly to this subject, by our then chief magistrate; and I must ask the indulgence of the committee while I read from his message the following passages:

"The words 'to provide for the common defence and general welfare,' are merely mentioned as the objects for which the power to raise taxes is given, and the power to lay taxes is the only specific power given by this article of the constitution. Under this erroneous construction, a majority of Congress seem to suppose that they are invested with power to appropriate the national resources to objects of mere internal improvement, such as making canals and roads in the interior of our country, which have no connexion whatever with either the common defence, or the general welfare, other than that which all internal improvements, even the building of bridges or mills, or the improvement of the soil, possess. It is too obvious to be disputed, that, if this clause of the constitution gives to Congress the authority to make such roads and canals, even a less extended construction of it must include every specific power vested by that instrument, and thus render them wholly impertinent and unmeaning—an inconsistency and absurdity which could not be admitted, except under the most imperative necessity. Were the phrase in question to be regarded even as a delegation of power to provide for the general welfare, yet, on every known and acknowledged principle of interpretation, it would be liable to receive a strict construction, and consequently could authorize only such measures of Congress as were in their nature general, extending direct benefits to every part of the nation, and not such as were directly beneficial only to a part, and to the remainder merely incidentally, by possibility, or on some remote and uncertain contingency. The consequences which may naturally be expected to result from giving so broad and indefinite a construction to this clause of the constitution, as would authorize Congress to appropriate the national resources to mere objects of internal improvement, ought not to be disregarded in a consideration of this question. The national resources, so applied, would generally be directed to great and imposing objects in those parts of the country which were susceptible of them on that extensive and magnificent scale which would gratify those national feelings which always have a powerful influence, whilst those which were less adapted to gratify these feelings, although of equal or even greater importance, and those affecting the interests of the smaller and more remote sections of the country, would be either wholly neglected, or receive less than a proportionate share of the attention of the Government.

"Jealousies and discord would inevitably spring from real or supposed partiality in the appropriations for these objects, and endanger that general harmony which is intimately connected with national happiness. It would greatly extend that indirect power and influence of the Government, derived from its patronage, which ought always to be feared as a principal source of that intrigue and corruption which has so generally destroyed or impaired every thing valuable in human Governments. No motives are discovered that should induce such a wish that the constitution might be found susceptible of a construction which should authorize Congress to expend the national resources in mere objects of internal improvement, unless accompanied by a belief that these objects would be more judiciously and economically attained under the direction of the National than of the State Governments. But no facts or evidence are known to exist, which can be thought to warrant the expectation. In National Governments generally, (it is to be hoped our own may prove an exception,) waste and profusion, corruption and favoritism, connect themselves with every national undertaking and expenditure."

The legislative assembly of New Hampshire—the immediate representatives of the people, did not, on that occasion, withhold the expression of their opinion on this subject. They responded to the sentiments of the Executive, and declared, by their resolutions, which were adopted with great unanimity, "that the constitution has not vested in Congress" the power which is now attempted to be exercised, and that no such power should be vested in Congress. It was believed that the existence of such a power would be dangerous to the rights and privileges of the small States. Such I believe to be the sentiments of New Hampshire—a sentiment I feel bound, no less from a sense of duty to my constituents, than from the force of individual feeling, to assert and maintain.

We have works of internal improvements in that State, which we should be pleased to have accomplished. But relieve us from the national debt, and then forbear to levy upon us unnecessary taxation. Free my own constituents from an annual tax of not less than fifty thousand dollars, which they now pay in the oppressive duty on salt; relieve them from a like amount which is now drawn from their pockets by the present duties on teas; relieve them from the onerous duties on iron and on coffee; all which articles are of general use, and which duties remain in the aggregate as an annual tax upon their industry, of not less than two hundred thousand dollars; free us from these burdens, too heavy to be borne, and we will work out our own salvation. We will go on as we have done; appropriate and work out, as we have done, the annual tax of two hundred thousand dollars, in making and repairing our highways, and in effecting the desirable objects of internal improvement under our own supervision.

But if the present policy must be persevered in, if the people must continue to be indirectly taxed, for the purpose of filling the public treasury, to be appropriated, under the direction of this Government, in the construction of roads and canals, the language of New Hampshire is—be just. She does most solemnly protest against an act of such flagrant injustice as compels her, while she makes her own roads, at her own cost, to appropriate annually one hundred thousand dollars (twice the amount of her State tax) to help the great State of Pennsylvania to make hers.

This expenditure of the public treasure is attempted to be justified on the ground that it serves to cement more firmly the various parts of the confederacy. It is a most fallacious and deceptive argument. The very circumstance of an unequal distribution of the common fund, which must necessarily take place in effecting objects of internal improvement, would create distrust and jealousy among the less favored members of the Union; and if it has any bearing, its tendency must be of a character different from that which the friends of the system have urged.

But the fact is certain, that the State of New Hampshire does not require the exercise of any such power to bind her to the Union. She fully realizes the value of our free institutions, and she would be the last State in the confederacy to give up the ship. She rallies around the constitution as the charter of her liberties, the foundation of her hopes, and she needs not that rope of sand to rivet her affections. There is no disloyalty within her borders. Her citizens contribute much of her treasure, and have spent much of her blood, in procuring and maintaining public freedom. And while the names of her Stark, of her Sullivan, and her Scummiel, shall be remembered, so long as the sacrifices and services of her revolutionary patriots shall be preserved in mind, the loyal faith of New Hampshire will never be questioned. Some solitary individual may linger among the wilds of the interior, who has dared to breathe forth the sentiment of disloyalty. But if, in fact, such a sentiment ever had a real existence, it never could have extended beyond him who conceived and who brought it forth.

I have observed that I do not oppose the improvement of your harbors, your ports of entry, for I cannot but regard such measures as directly connected with the public welfare; and I have, since the commencement of this session, voted for a just distribution of the avails of your public lands among the several States.

I consider the public domain as the property of the whole Union, ceded for the common benefit, or purchased by the common fund; and I voted for this, because we were told by the President, in his message, that we should not want the present amount of revenue, either for the payment of debts, or for ordinary expenses. And when the resolution of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CONNER] proposing a reduction of the duty on salt, was introduced, it was then immediately strangled—a duty which bears most hardly on my own people. I became satisfied that the present tariff must be continued at all events. Then I was for doing for the benefit of my people all that was within my power. I should have much preferred to have had a judicious adjustment of our tariff of duties. I should have much preferred to have let the money remain in the pockets of the people. I should have much preferred to have had my constituents saved from the annual tax on their industry of two hundred thousand dollars at least, in the way of duties on salt, on tea, on coffee, and on iron—articles of prime necessity, and which enter very generally into their consumption. But I was convinced that this would not be done; and although existing duties on these articles were not wanted for purposes of manufacturing protection, yet Congress was apparently determined to retain them; and the subsequent history of our proceedings will show that I had not formed erroneous conjectures. Under these circumstances, and with these considerations, I voted for an equal distribution of the avails of the public lands. I shall do it again—not out of any hostility to the West, but because, in my judgment, their interest would not be injured, and a benefit would be conferred on my own citizens.

A few words more, and I have done what I have felt it my duty to offer.

This confederacy may, with perfect propriety, be compared to a partnership concern. The several States, as partners, contribute, according to the articles of agreement, their respective proportions, to make up the common fund. They are, under the articles of agreement, interested in this common property. All have contributed—all are alike, upon certain principles, entitled to the beneficial operations of the concern. But it would be no greater act of injustice for one partner, in any other concern, to withdraw not only his own investment, but actually appropriate the half of his associate's to his own exclusive use, against his will, than it would be for this Government to appropriate, from the common fund, the property of all, or to use any portion of that fund for the exclusive advantage of any one of the original partners of any one of the States. We should pause, and well consider before we thus act.

"The evil men do lives after them."

Mr. PEARCE said, he had finally succeeded in placing himself upon this road, not, however, without a struggle. How long he should remain upon it, he could not now say; but it was not his wish to travel it from one end to the other, a distance of thirteen hundred miles, and, as some gentlemen had told us, more than that: lest [said Mr. P.] (pointing to some notes before him) I should faint by the way side, I have taken with me some viands, from which I can receive relief if any should be wanted. I cannot, however, read a speech, for I never was able to write one before I obtained the floor, on any question or subject under discussion, and never able to write one out after I had finished my remarks. In either case, I could employ the gentleman now in my eye, (Mr. Stansbury,) much better than I could employ myself.

The gentleman who has just taken his seat will excuse me if I do not follow his example. I appear before the committee under circumstances somewhat different from those of many others. It has been said that New England, New York, and several other States, have no direct interest in this road, and that, therefore, there is no reason why they should contribute their support to the bill, or their money to carry it into effect. The opposition has been urged, not merely on grounds of principle, but appeals have been made to the worst feelings of our nature—to the selfish feelings of individual interest—as if nothing ought to be done by any gentleman on this floor, unless it contributes immediately and directly to the interest of his individual district, or the State from which he comes. I am influenced by no such feelings, and am prepared to say, what gentlemen have told me was true, that Rhode Island has no interest in this road. What then? If the nation has an interest, is it right to withhold my vote, and refuse this measure my support? Others can speak for themselves, but it is sufficient for me if this road will contribute to the benefit of the country at large; that conviction is sufficient to command my vote, and, in obeying it, I have no doubt I shall be sustained by those I am proud to represent. I know that designs of this kind present very different subjects for legislation. We have all seen this difficulty. Some gentlemen, with all their constitutional scruples, would not have any serious scruples to this road, if it could pass through their district. At any rate, if it must be made, the route through their districts is the proper route, notwithstanding all the engineers have said upon the subject. The road is assailed by objections the most various, and frequently of the most opposite kind. For some, it is too far west; for some, not far enough; for some, it is too long, and ought to terminate at Memphis—looking towards Texas; for others, it is too short, and ought to go to Boston, by the way of Lake Champlain. One thing is certain—it is too long and unmanageable to be laid upon the bed of Procrustes, and shortened and stretched to meet the views or gratify the wishes of every one. If mere local feelings are to influence us all the proceedings of this House, what can ever be done for the good of the Union? So far as relates to me, I merely ask myself whether the scheme that is proposed is calculated in its nature to confer benefits on the whole country, without reference to any particular section of country.

Is it not familiar to us all, that, although the western portion of this Union is entitled confessedly to an armory somewhere upon its waters, yet, owing to local disputes, and sectional differences of interests, the site has been a bane of contention for many years? From the time I took my seat as a member of this House, to the present period, there has been among gentlemen from the West a sharp and animated debate on this subject. Some have thought that Pittsburg was the most eligible situation, some West Tennessee, some North Carolina; and others, among whom I can name the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. JOHNSON] and his predecessors, that the district of country which he represents is the place which should be selected for that purpose; and, from all I can learn upon the subject, I think, with him and them, that it is—but so far as relates to my present argument, not but that the necessity for an armory somewhere upon the western waters existed, yet, owing to the divisions and differences which have existed, none has been established, and none will be, so long as they shall continue. If they cannot among themselves agree, they have no right, and cannot with propriety arraign the Government for withholding the appropriation of money necessary to commence an establishment of this description. The remarks which I have made relative to the western armory, will apply with equal force in reference to the establishment of a military academy in the western section of our country. More than twelve years ago a bill passed the Committee of the Whole House, establishing a military academy in the western section of our country; but it was defeated, because gentlemen from the West would not agree upon the place where it should be located. Both the House and the country assented to the design. But such was the struggle of local interests, that members here could never agree. In reference to this bill, and the proposed route of this road, it is sufficient for my purpose and my vote, that it comes to us under favorable auspices, and recommended by those who have no interest in this or that route, which does not belong to them as members of this confederacy. The chairman of the committee who at a former session reported a bill in the words of this, or similar to it, is a gentleman [Mr. MERRICK] who, we all know, has given as much attention, and devoted as much time to subjects of this kind, as any member of this House; and no one will deny that on this and similar subjects his zeal has been untiring, and his exertions indefatigable. The venerable gentleman who at this session reported the bill in favor of this road, [Mr. HEMPHILL] comes from a State that is identified with internal improvements; and at home, in reference to objects of this description, he is first among his peers. What motive, I have a right to ask, has either of those gentlemen to prefer one route to the other, independent of the general good? None, I think I am warranted in saying. Sir, during the pendency of the bill, and this discussion which has taken place, I have watched the movements of the chairman of the Committee on Internal Improvements, and verily believe, if ever a man was actuated by pure and disinterested motives, having the welfare of the Union in view, and that alone, in reference to any measure, the venerable head of our committee has been so influenced, guided, and directed. In addition to the recommendations of this route from the several committees referred to, it is recommended by the officers of the engineer corps, who, it will not be pretended, could have had any personal interest in the recommendation. An examination of their report will acquaint us with the reasons and grounds of their preference. Among other reasons by which all should be influenced, we are told that, if hereafter it should be thought advisable to Macadamize the road, the expense of Macadamizing the western route would not be so great as either of the other routes, by twelve hundred thousand dollars. So far, then, as expense is concerned, and judging from the information which comes before me, together with the recommendation of the present and former committee, I am led to conclude that the western is the preferable route for us to adopt. Let it be remembered, that, in settling this question, we are not to be governed exclusively by a state of things which may now exist, but should look forward to the future; and although the population on a particular route may be sparse at present, we must look to the resources of the country as they will exist when fully developed by the facilities which such an avenue and communication as this road will open to them. We are not to legislate in this matter for to-day, but for years and centuries to come. For myself, I am, perhaps, less encumbered in giving a vote, than some gentlemen may be. I have no constitutional scruples to impede me, nor have I any difference from a former course to embarrass me. I shall vote now as I have voted heretofore, for my course has, on questions of this description, been uniform—the same yesterday, to-day, and, with my present convictions, will be forever. As to local feelings, thank God there are none to divert me. I have none to lead me to prefer the upper to the lower route; my great desire has been to ascertain which would be best for the country at large; and, if I have been so fortunate as to make this discovery, I am satisfied.

I might, in that spirit of selfish feeling which has been manifested by many gentlemen who have addressed the committee in relation to this road, inquire, what has been done by this Government for Rhode Island? The answer must be, nothing to its internal condition by appropriations for roads and canals; not a dollar to give us new roads, or to improve the condition of our old ones. I am happy in saying we want no money from the public chest for that purpose; our common roads are better than the best turnpikes in this part of the country, and our best better than all the money in the treasury, or all the surplus fund, when the national debt is paid, can make some roads here. In relation to the general distribution, it may be said we have had our share on other subjects, and, if it has been a small one, it has been in proportion to the comparative size of our State. What has it been? I was so fortunate once, and not without a struggle, (and, in effecting what I had in view, I received more aid from the other branch of the legislature than this,) as to procure for the improvement of one of the harbors in Rhode Island an appropriation of four thousand dollars; this sum, I contend, was not for our exclusive benefit, any more than the several light-houses on our points and promontories; it was for the benefit of the navigation and commerce of the whole country. But it may be retorted, that very important fortifications have been projected, and actually commenced, in Rhode Island. It is true these works are within our State; but I do not consider Rhode Island under any special obligation to the Government, because the erection of these fortifications was not from any special regard to us.

The appropriations were the necessary result of our peculiar situation in reference to the coast of the Union. Without these fortifications one link would have been wanting in the grand chain of defences of our seaboard; without fortifying Newport, neither New York nor the Chesapeake could be defended. From the communications which were made by the Executive at the commencement of the session, it appears that his eyes, the attention of the Secretary of the Navy, and the Board of Navy Commissioners, have been directed to the waters of Narragansett Bay, in Rhode Island, as a place for one of the grand naval establishments of the country. And why? Because that State had any claim for large appropriations for her benefit? Not at all; but, owing to our location, it has been found that our waters, our noble and capacious harbors, presented a better place for a naval depot than was elsewhere to be found. I am still, therefore, warranted in saying, that, in regard to any improvement of the resources of the country, nothing, or next to nothing, has been done or projected for the State from which I come. Yet I am not, because the Government has been less liberal in its grants than many in the State that I represent could wish, or perhaps all desire, to be influenced by sectional considerations or sectional designs. Is this any reason why I should withhold my support from any object which is national in its character? I trust not. A gentleman from New York [Mr. MONELL] said, a few days ago, that his State had knocked at your door in vain; and because the gentleman's State received nothing, he is now opposed to this bill. He should recollect, more especially as he seems to have some constitutional scruples, that the legislature of his State had none, for the appointment of agents to solicit the aid of Government in constructing their great canal was a recognition of the constitutional power to aid works of this kind. Other reasons might have induced the refusal, beside opposition to the principle of internal improvements; the party then in power might have been opposed to appropriations for internal improvements; but since a change has taken place in this respect, is their conduct on that occasion a good reason for voting against this bill now? Surely not. The Government of the United States, at the time that application was made, might not have been in a situation, from inability, to grant the aid solicited. But it is not too late for New York to obtain the aid of this Government for enlarging her system of internal improvements, and extending them still farther than at present. She has, from all that appears, a disposition to do this; two bills have been reported at this session, to authorize subscriptions to the stock of two of her canals; inceptive measures have been taken to the improvement of the navigation of the Hudson; an appropriation has been made to defray the expense of a survey of a canal to be cut through a neck of land near Hurl Gate; we have been notified that something will be hereafter required to improve the navigation of Black river. Has New York in fact received no aid? Nothing to aid her in constructing a national road, although a military road has been commenced at Plattsburg, and partly finished, the whole expense of which has been borne by the United States; another has been projected from Albany to Sackett's Harbor. Has she received no money for internal improvements? What has become of the appropriations for Oswego, for Black Rock, for Buffalo, and other places bordering upon the lakes? Yet we are told, because New York once applied and was refused, either because the party which then constituted a majority in the House was opposed to internal improvements, or the treasury then too much embarrassed to afford the grant, now the members from that State are bound to refuse to contribute their aid to a design connected with the common good of our common country.

[Here Mr. STORRES, of New York, interrupted Mr. P., and asked what benefit this road would be to the people he represented.]

I know [said Mr. P.] this is the argument of the opposition to this bill—an argument which, if it obtains, will destroy not only this, but every bill that may be hereafter reported, to improve the internal condition of the country.

I hoped for better things from that gentleman, when he told us he was in favor of appropriations for internal improvements, and had heretofore voted for them. Not a cent of the amount appropriated will reach my district. This has been rung through all the changes, not only by those who are opposed to the system altogether, and will be opposed, as we are told by them, as long as they have tongues to utter their sentiments, or judgments to direct their conduct, but it seems now to be adopted by the gentleman from New York. Not a cent of the appropriations goes to Oneida county, New York. He would vote for the Delaware breakwater, because that work was national, and the State of New York was interested in it, although not a cent of the appropriation ever reached his district. If I correctly understood the gentleman, when he addressed the committee a few days ago, he labored to persuade us to withhold our support from this bill, because the appropriation required might interfere with other works; works perhaps in which New York might have a more direct interest.

In what do arguments of this description originate, except that selfish sectional feeling, the fallacy and unsoundness of which I have endeavored to combat, and shall further expose before I conclude. I should suppose the gentleman is more proud of his State, in consequence of the construction of the Erie canal. Is he unwilling to look back to that period of time when this great work was proposed, and examine the objections which existed to it? How did they differ from the objections urged against this bill? Every county in the State through which it was not to pass, was opposed to it, and opposed for reasons similar to those which are given against this bill. Long Island, Delaware county, the counties upon the Hudson, the counties east of Albany, were all opposed to the work, not only because it would confer no benefits on them, but would make their situation absolutely worse, lessen the price of the products of their soil, as it opened a quick and cheap conveyance from the interior and extreme parts of the State to the great market and place of deposit in the city of New York. Yet, sir, those objections to that work did not prevail, and I trust the similar ones to this bill will not. Another gentleman from the State of New York, [Mr. ANGELO] visits this road, not as angel, or minister of grace, to give to it his aid, but to condemn this and all similar works: at a proper time he is to alter the title of the bill, and call this a road leading from Buffalo, via Washington, to despotism. He does not wish any part of the State of New York contaminated by it, although he is perfectly willing Pennsylvania should be. That gentleman, sir, may speak the sentiments of the people of the district from which he comes, as that district, as I have understood, has been generally opposed to works of internal improvements—as opposed to the Erie canal; but I am not willing to admit that he is the organ of the State of New York. Let this road be made, and his State will be as pure and uncontaminated as she now is, as pure as Pennsylvania, and that will be saying sufficient of that State. One would suppose that this gentleman belonged as much to Virginia as New York, and was a disciple of the new school of Virginia politics. A gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ARCHER] seems willing to give up the glory of this opposition on behalf of Virginia, and transfer it to New York, with a view, as one would suppose, to work on the feelings and enlist the prejudices of the delegation of that State. Another gentleman from the State of New York, [Mr. MONTELL] whose remarks I have already referred to, has called the attention of the committee to an attempt made a few years ago, as he says, to exact a transit duty from the boats on the New York canal. But I ask, did this Government ever make such a demand? I know, indeed, there was some correspondence between the comptroller and the canal commissioners; but both the late President and the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States disavowed all intention to enforce such a demand; yet we have had this old, worn out story brought forward on the present occasion, to influence the New York delegation. It may be very good policy—thirty-four votes, this New York regiment, as the delegation from that State were once called by the predecessor of my friend, now near me, [Mr. IRWIN, of Pennsylvania,] are not to be marched out of sight when an important point is to be gained. The gentleman has supposed the case of a collision between the State authorities and those of the United States, which must be settled by the Supreme Court, while that tribunal, he has graciously told us, would instantly settle in favor of the Government of the United States. Why, sir, this thrust at that court? Can no question be discussed without implicating that institution? That court, it seems, can never show the least regard to a claim, however just, of a State against the General Government. Now, sir, I ask, has there been anything in the decisions of that court heretofore, to authorize this stab at its reputation? I repel the charge, I was going to add, with indignation. I will say, however, the remark is gratuitous and unfounded. The gentleman knows as well as I do, that the members of that court, whether collectively or individually, have too much self-respect to make any decision that will justify this insinuation. But to return to the road provided for in the bill. Is it not such as the present circumstances of the country will fully warrant? Is it not calculated to improve the condition of the country? To strengthen the bonds of union, and brighten the chain of mutual intercourse? Will it not confer a benefit on the people at large? Surely the nation is in as good a situation for undertakings of this kind now, as it ever has been heretofore. What, then, is the cause of this hue and cry? Is not our national debt nearly paid? And, when paid, are not apprehensions expressed that the surplus revenue will be divided among the several States? In that event what is to become of internal improvements, or works of a national character? Gentlemen tell us that the States must be left to accomplish these works themselves; that is, when they can agree among themselves that a certain work is expedient and proper. And who does not see that the will of a single State is sufficient to defeat every undertaking of the kind? As an illustration of this truth, gentlemen have only to look at this very road. It passes through seven of the States. Pennsylvania is in favor of it; so is Tennessee, and so are the States farther south; but all their contributions are to be rendered void, because Virginia, perchance, is unwilling to engage in the undertaking, and because New York will not pay for about one hundred miles of the road that may pass through her territory. So it will happen with respect to every national design. The tenacity, not to say the obstinacy, of one or two States will defeat the whole. The case, therefore, resolves itself into this question: shall the system of internal improvements continue, or shall it not? If yea, they must be done by the nation in its collective capacity—the States will never combine in any such scheme. In still further prosecution of that appeal to sectional views which has characterized this debate, it has been said by gentlemen from Tennessee, upper Virginia, and a portion of Pennsylvania, that not one cent has yet been granted from the treasury for their benefit. This argument is surely not a good one, and would not be entitled to such consideration if it stood alone; but it is a useful one, as it comes home to their feelings. Did those gentlemen withhold their aid to works of internal improvement, because they were in other States? No, we are told they did not. Has upper Pennsylvania ever acted on this principle? Is there one gentleman from that, or any other part of that State, who can withhold his vote from this bill? Did they withhold their votes (the gentlemen from the interior of that State) from the Delaware breakwater? So far from it, that an honorable gentleman through whose district this road will pass, [Mr. RAMSER] as he now tells me, offered the resolution which first directed the attention of the House to a consideration of that work; then, as the Delaware and Chesapeake canal, when the question of subscription of stock to that canal was under consideration, where is the evidence of the hostile feelings from the sectional interests of western Pennsylvania, Tennessee, or Kentucky? The gentlemen of those States, superior to the interests of mere sectional interest, did not withhold their votes from the subscription of stock. How many days ago is it since a bill for light-houses, harbor improvements, and surveys, passed this House, making an appropriation of more than half a million of dollars? In the common language of the day—not intending to adopt it as correct—for whose benefit? Of Kentucky? No, sir. Of western Virginia? No. Of western Pennsylvania? No; not a cent for either of those sections of the country. Louisiana, indeed, received some partial benefit, but a greater proportion of the money went to New York and the eastern States. When that bill was under consideration, it was not opposed by the arguments now used in opposition to this, by gentlemen from the West, or any other quarter. And we are called upon to refuse this road, because the money does not go to those districts! One gentleman said the design was not national, and that it would interfere with harbor improvements, and other works which he called national; but now the harbor bill has passed, and that gentleman represents an interest where there are no navy yards, no harbor improvements; has he, I must again ask him, no pride in the reputation of his State? And is not his support due from that State? O, no. Not a cent has been given to his constituents, not a dollar has been appropriated for fortifications in his district. This argument gives up the Union entirely, and we may as well say so now as at any other time. I again say that when our surplus revenue shall have been divided among the States, no object truly national can be accomplished. Instead of being less, there will be ten times more local feelings than now: the language of one State will be, I am in the interior of the country; the Atlantic States must take care of the seaboard; and they, in reply, will say, let the West and the States upon our northern frontiers protect themselves, develop their own resources, and improve their condition. I do insist that if any thing national is to be done, the General Government is the power that must do it. It must be done by the United States, or not at all. I have once adverted to the operation of local feelings, even among gentlemen coming from the West—the same section of country. Not a session commences that is not opened with a dance about the western armory. One gentleman moves Pittsburg, one Beaver river, and another, the Horse Shoe bend; and what is the result? We get rid of the appropriation altogether, with no disposition to withhold it, because they cannot agree where it is to be applied. I view this subject of internal improvements as necessarily connected with another important policy of the country—I mean the protection of national industry. They must go hand in hand, mutually aiding and reciprocating their benefits. What are some of the objects to be effected by them? Cheaper transportation and cheaper productions. Is it not manifest that the cheaper the raw material can be transported, the cheaper the goods can be sold? The cheaper they can be brought to market, the lower will be the market price?

I have been served this session with a copy (and I presume the other members have) of a communication made by an English writer, whose object is to show that the French manufactures cannot long sustain themselves, as England can manufacture cheaper, and consequently undersell them. The main argument used is, that in England, owing to the greater facilities of communication, and transportation of both the raw material and manufactured goods, the necessary result of the roads, railways, and canals of that country, they can be furnished at a lower price. The manufactures of one nation will always put down those of another, where the material is cheaper, and there is a greater facility of transportation. If it is true in England, it is true here; and though there may be members of this House in favor of internal improvements, and of this road, and yet not in favor of the tariff, the argument I have last advanced will have weight with all those who are in favor of the tariff. What are the main objections urged against the bill? It is truly amusing to observe the various speculations which have been conjured up as arguments against its passage. For the purpose of addressing one peculiar feeling of the House, it has been said that the Executive is wholly hostile to the design. To gain another portion of it, we have been told that he was warmly in its favor, and anxious for its success. One gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] has read to us, in terrorem, a long extract from his message, in which he is particular to show his friendly feelings to works of internal improvements. Both of the statements made in relation to him cannot be true; but, for my own part, I am not to be influenced by one or the other. From all that I have seen and heard, I am led to believe that the Chief Magistrate will not, by any act of his, impede the progress of this design. I think he cannot but feel some regard for the opinion of the legislature of his adopted State, which has been expressed in favor of the undertaking. I should think it natural that he should feel some regard for the glories of his own administration. Peace has its glories, as well as war; and what, I ask, can add so bright a halo to the splendor of his reign, as the completion of this road, of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, and the other works of internal improvements which have been projected? The laurels gathered at New Orleans, plenteous as was the harvest, are “trifles light as air,” in comparison with the glory of having these great works of national improvement begun or perfected during his Presidency. On retiring from office, he might then say, in the language of one of the Latin poets, without incurring the imputation of egotism, which has been ascribed to that poet:

What are the monuments of Egypt, or the pyramids erected to perpetuate the folly or idolatry of an age, compared with these works, one of which cost more than all the money which this nation has disbursed, or will soon be required to disburse, on account of works of internal improvement.*

If any one consideration more than another would make a seat in this House desirable, to me it appears it would be that which would hereafter authorize us to say that we have, as the representatives of the nation, contributed our share to the commencement and the completion of these works. Of all such it may with propriety be hereafter said, in the language of another of the Latin poets, whose sentiments I will endeavor to render in English—“Happy, thrice happy, did you but know, did you but realize, what happiness was yours.” The measure of our glory would be full, and we need not aspire to any thing more to render our names illustrious, or cause them to be held in grateful remembrance. Away, then, with these stories about the influence of this or of that feeling retarding a great national design.

* Pyramid of Cheops.—Of the pyramids of Egypt, the largest, that of Cheops, is a square of seven hundred and forty-six feet, and its height four hundred and sixty-one, being twenty-four feet higher than St. Peter's at Rome, and one hundred and seventeen feet higher than St. Paul's. The quantity of stone which it contains is calculated at six millions of tons, which is three times that employed in the break-water at Plymouth, and has been calculated by a French engineer to be sufficient to build a wall round the whole of France, ten feet high and one foot broad. Its area at the base is, as near as may be, that of Lincoln's Inn fields.

It is too late now for gentlemen from the tide water of Virginia to spread before us their hair-spun theories. The system has made its way down the side of the mountain; it is making its triumphant way to the South, "conquering and to conquer." The voice raised in South Carolina has reverberated along the highlands of Virginia, and the cry of North Carolina now is, "what shall we do to be saved." In reference to the western feelings and western claims, such is my opinion of their equity, that even if I had any conscientious scruples with regard to them, I would at least endeavor to divest myself of them. My word for it, if you withhold from the West what she now asks as a favor, you will hear, ere long, the same requirement in the form of a demand. Do gentlemen forget at what ratio the number and influence of the nine States in the valley of the Mississippi are increasing? Why, if I ever had any hostile feelings towards the West—and to all such feelings Rhode Island and New England are strangers—I would endeavor to make my peace quickly, while I was in the way with her. What Bishop of Cloyne said of North America, compared with England, may with equal truth be now said of the South or the East, viewed in reference to their relative future consequence, when compared with the West:—

"Westward the star of Empire takes its way.

"Time's noblest offspring is his last."

We may withhold favors from them now, or deny to them what is justly their due, but, rely upon it, we shall hereafter feel their power and the weight of their influence. Already the West has given us one President, and unless I am greatly mistaken, she will not be satisfied with giving us one, but we shall have another, and another, and another. Is it then good policy for us to throw obstacles in the way of their improvements? To the West, I say, we must look for our next President. It is not my province to designate or name the man; he who is now at the head of the nation may be the man; the late distinguished Secretary of State may be the man; the late distinguished Postmaster General may be called upon to exchange the judicial robe for the Presidential chair; in addition to these illustrious men, I might point to a late distinguished Senator, now a member of this House, a gentleman decked with laurels and covered with wounds received in fighting the battles of his country. To me it is morally certain that South Carolina and New York might as well hang their harps upon the willow, for at least the next four years, General Duff Green and Lieutenant James Watson Webb, if they please, to the contrary notwithstanding. During this debate I have listened with great attention, and pleasure, too, to two venerable gentlemen, one from Tennessee, [MR. STANDIFER] and the other from Pennsylvania, [MR. RAMSEY] their powerful appeals, addressed to their respective colleagues, ought not to be disregarded; they have told the House that whatever we may do on this floor, the people will ere long declare for themselves what is their will on this subject. The language of the gentleman from Tennessee was the language of plain, sound, practical common sense. He told us this bill was to result in the benefit of those on whom still rested the primeval curse, and who lived literally by the sweat of their brow. He told us the yeomanry of the country were desirous of an opportunity to convert their toil into money. I confess that appeal from such a quarter had a powerful effect on me—an effect which I could not have been able to resist, had my prejudices been enlisted on the opposite side of the pending question.

But we were told by one of the gentlemen from Virginia, [MR. P. P. BARNUM] that the money asked for this design could be better used. He said that the duties on coffee, paid by Virginia alone, amount in the course of a single year to one hundred and thirty thousand dollars, and that if, instead of wasting money on this road, we would consent to take off these duties, Virginia would be richer by that amount, and that one hundred and thirty thousand dollars may then be applied by that State to the construction of roads and canals. He affirmed that seven millions may be dispensed with from the revenue, and that sum can be equally well distributed. Now, I am in favor of repealing the duty on coffee in toto; and as Virginia will then have one hundred and thirty thousand dollars to be applied to internal improvements, taking the gentleman at his word, I think we may call upon that State to appropriate money to that amount. But if she shall be disposed to answer the call, how can she collect the money? If she does it at all, she must do it by direct taxation, the most odious and burdensome of all modes in which contributions of the people can possibly be rendered. How will the collector be met? When he asks for this new duty, he is, I suppose, to tell the people—you ought not to complain, your burdens have been lightened by a repeal of one hundred and thirty thousand dollars of the revenue; and how would he be answered? Mr. Collector, that is nothing to me; that is no relief to me; I have houses and lands, I use no coffee; at any rate, I am not compelled to use it; I will not pay your tax. Such must be the natural effect; an effect in which doubtless the gentleman will rejoice, because its tendency is to foster and strengthen a prejudice against internal improvements. And this brings me back to the question whether we are to have any internal improvements at all. Gentlemen cannot say that they expect by direct taxation to collect a sum such as shall avail for the accomplishment of any work of national importance. And how shall we know when either to begin or end, in making our exactions for revenue? We must retain enough to meet contingencies, and defray the expenses of Government. And suppose you have in the national treasury only one million, an amount that none will say is too large, will there not be just as great a scramble, and just as many squabbles for that single million, as there is now for ten times as great a sum. We shall have all the difficulties that we have now, while at the same time we have little or nothing to appropriate for the great objects of national policy. And here let me drop one word as to an argument which is very common in this House, but which addresses itself to the worst feelings of human nature—the argument is, that other sections needed the benefit as much as that which happens to be presented to the House. Admit it. Must we, therefore, refuse all? Because we cannot do every thing at once, must we, therefore, do nothing? Because we cannot benefit all the districts in the United States pari passu, is this any argument why we should not begin to benefit any? This argument would have prevented all that we have ever done. In the plan submitted to Congress for the fortifications of our seaboard, designed for the Union, were all reported as works to be commenced at once? No; they were reported in classes, and numbered from one to five. Some would require more time to finish them than others. Might not this argument have been used in that case? Might not gentlemen have contended then, as now, that all these objects were needed? that one part of the country had as good a right to be defended as another; and, as we could not go on with all, we ought not to begin either? It comes to the same thing, because we cannot do every thing we must do nothing. Let me now advert more particularly to the constitutional argument.

It is said this road is not needed, either as a military, a commercial, or a mail road—that the interest of the money will cost us one hundred and thirty thousand dollars a year, and that sum will consequently be the expense of transporting the mail from Buffalo to New Orleans. This argument goes manifestly on the ground that the present state of things is to exist forever, and because there is no commerce now immediately on the route contemplated by this road, that there will continue to be none after the road is made. So, because there is no war at present, therefore the military power of the Government does not authorize us at this time to engage in the undertaking. Gentlemen might just as well say that a man cannot be a soldier unless he is constantly fighting. The nation is not now at war, and of course it has not any munitions of war to carry; but does that prove it never will have? Another gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. COKE] tells us that roads are only needed where there is a dense population; but if a part of the country happens at this moment to be secluded from public view, it must always remain so, and its population must be always sparse, for the very reason it is so secluded. Why, if this country, through which, or near which this road is to run, had already all the benefits it would derive from the road, it is very plain that it would not want the road. But the great purpose of the road is to dispense those very benefits. Must the mail start from Buffalo and go all the way to New Orleans in one route, in order to constitute this a mail road? Surely not. It may be employed as a part of several routes, and the making of it will be warranted by the powers of the Government, in respect to the mail. Another argument of the modern Virginia school is derived from the unequal bearing of appropriations of this kind.

This argument, if admitted, would strike at once at the root of all the fiscal operations of the Government. It is a manifest impossibility that this Government should distribute its funds with exact mathematical equality, as if the whole surface of the country was a plain, and these distributions were to fall upon it as one vast sheet of water. Such a state of things is impossible; it is forbidden by locality, and the situation of our country. It cannot be expected unless you raise all the valleys, and sink all the hills. Nor can any one appropriation be made by the Government, the benefits of which shall be equally felt in all parts of the country. All our appropriations are unequal, and must be so of necessity; and the same inequality would exist, and does exist, in appropriations made by the State authorities. I would ask these gentlemen from Virginia, whether the money appropriated for the capitol at Richmond was an equal distribution of the money of the people of that State?—whether the moneys granted for the erection of court-houses in the several counties are not local appropriations? The money for these objects is raised by taxation over all Virginia; but what benefit did the people in the western counties receive from the erection of so costly a building at Richmond? It is all idle to talk in this manner. Inequality is inherent in the nature of all human society. The same argument would prove that one individual must not be appointed to a foreign mission, because there are others equally fit for the place, and who have equal claims on the Government for the same. It might with equal truth be maintained that the present distinguished occupant of the chair should not have been chosen Speaker, because there are other members of this House who would discharge the duties of presiding officer as well as he does. This is the amount of the gentleman's argument.

But, in addition to this, we find the old string has been pulled upon—the payment of the national debt is to be retarded—a bugbear which regularly makes its passage over the stage whenever any useful project is moved here which is to cost a little money. But, sir, that debt is so nearly discharged, and its payment so entirely within our power, that that argument is entitled to but little weight. The gentleman from Virginia carried us back so far as to the year 1688, when the public debt of England was but one million, and now it is more than a million of millions. Very true, sir; and what then? That debt, however great, is owed to her own citizens; and, be it great or small, it was not contracted by works of internal improvement. But while the gentleman held up one picture to terrify the House, might he not, on the other hand, have presented to its view another picture, showing how, by her works of internal improvements, and her vast system of domestic industry, England has been able to sustain the pressure of such a debt, and to remain strong and prosperous, and to march with a bold and firm step, though pressed by such a burden? The Government could not have borrowed unless her citizens were able and willing to lend. So the gentleman's argument goes only to prove that internal industry enabled the people of that little island to lend their Government a million of millions of pounds sterling. England knows where her strength lies, and she has wisely pursued a policy to foster it. By this she has been enabled to monopolize the market for all those resources of strength which grow out of her internal improvements and active industry. By this she has been enabled to subsidize all the Powers of Europe, and to make herself a party to all the battles of the world. Every body will admit that the present dynasty of France has no very particular attachment to the memory of Bonaparte, and yet we see them, from necessity, pursuing the course of his policy, and endeavoring to augment her internal resources. When that blood-stained conqueror was chained to a rock in the midst of the sea, what was it that furnished consolation to his reflections? His thousand victories? his bloody laurels? No! he himself declared that it was the remembrance that he had improved the condition of France, and that his works of internal improvement were of themselves enough to make his name immortal. With these works, and with his code of laws, he could have afforded to dispense with all his victories.

One of the gentlemen from Virginia [Mr. COKE] represented the mountains of Tennessee as being of such a stupendous height as to render the road to New Orleans of no practical utility. I do not pretend to an intimate acquaintance with the geography of that portion of the Union; but of this I am sure, that piling up Pelion upon Ossa will never raise a valid objection to this design, be the mountains what they may; the road can never come in contact with them. The gentleman has relied mainly on Dr. Morse as his authority, (now he could not push that authority very far in Rhode Island, I can tell him;) and on that authority he tells us of the wide and noble rivers which penetrate that region, and which he seems to think are themselves an all-sufficient highway for commerce, mail, war, and all other purposes of travel. But what says the gentleman from Tennessee, who lives upon the spot? He tells you, that during three-fourths of the year these roads are of no service whatever, their channels being often so dry as to admit walking over them. And as to these Alpine mountains, which seem to have towered so much in the gentleman's speech, they are not so high as he imagines; and, whatever their height, they are mountains of ore, and contain resources which will furnish commerce for the road to carry. We have two armories—and he tells us, if ever we have another, it will not be located on this road; and the road will be useless. Is the gentleman sure that there never will be more than two armories in the United States? Is he quite sure that this road will never be employed for the march of an army? What is this argument but to declare that we are not in peace to prepare for war? Will not the same doctrine prove that we are not to increase our navy? that we are not to fortify our coasts?

But it seems that we are to reject this bill for consistency's sake. Because the Jackson party raised a hue and cry about Executive influence, and about the shameful waste of money by employing the engineers to make surveys in various parts of the Union, we must, out of consistency and pride of character, refuse this bill, and even that for the usual annual appropriation for surveys. Why, is it an incredible thing that that hue and cry was raised for mere political effect? Is it too much to suppose that partisans used that argument, who did not themselves believe there was much truth or weight in it? And, admit that the power of making surveys was ever so much abused by a late administration, because a good thing has been used for a bad purpose, does it cease to be good, if properly used?

I come now to notice the speech of a gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Archer] who seemed so particularly magnanimous toward the State of New York. I was happy to hear him—the strain was so new, that it made a strong impression upon me—the gentleman seems to have made the discovery that there can be something that is correct without the bounds of the State of Virginia! But, before the gentleman praises New York too highly, let him wait and see how she will vote on this question. If New York is to vote down this bill because her petition for aid was once rejected, what is she to expect in future? Will the time never come when New York will apply for a share of that very aid she is now asked to refuse? And what will then be said to her by the power of the West on this floor? Sir, I hope New York will be magnanimous—too magnanimous to cherish the remembrance of a disappointment, and the feelings of resentment it excited. The gentleman ought to have recollected that the policy of New York in making the application was directly in contradiction of all his theories as a politician. When Clinton asked this body to grant aid to the State of New York, did he come here ignorant of the constitution? and, if not, did he hold the same views of it as that gentleman and his coadjutors? No! he acknowledged this Government had the power and the right to grant the aid he solicited. The gentleman has used soft words—I will not use the vulgar phrase, and say he has been pouring soft soap down the backs of the New York delegation; but he can never reconcile her conduct with his principles. The gentleman told us that if the General Government did not engage in these works, they would be done by the States; but, according to his argument, if this Government does not, the States will not. We have heard new doctrines broached here. The gentleman seems to have taken lessons in the school of a certain judge in Israel, and to have adopted that maxim of exalted morality, “all is fair in politics.” The gentleman is hot for forming a coalition—he will coalesce with any body; but it is for the most unprincipled purpose, if that combination is to be directed against the policy of the tariff, and of the internal improvements of the country. I speak for myself alone—in relation to my own morality; I can, of course, speak only for myself; but I have not much confidence in the morality of those who are ready to join with any body in opposing one of the most healthful attributes of this Government. If I do not forget, that same gentleman told us that if Virginia should ever alter her law respecting elections, he would pack up and remove into the very heart and centre of Africa. But Virginia has changed her law of elections, and the gentleman has not removed to Africa. If our eyes and ears do not deceive us, he is still here—and I apprehend he will not go there. I greatly fear it. If he does, however, he will not, of course, stop at Liberia, because the people there are in favor of internal improvements. They are all for building houses and making roads, and engaging in every design that can improve their colony. And, what is worse for the gentleman, he cannot remain at home. This policy has got down the country, till it is reaching tide water. The next thing we hear will be, that it has driven the gentleman down to low water mark. When it comes to that, the gentleman must embark for Africa, or somewhere else. Would it not be better for him to try to content himself at home, bad as things are, and to say, in the midst of all the noise of canal diggers and road makers—

Virginia! with all thy faults, I love thee still!

THE ARMY.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution reported from the Military Committee, requiring the Secretary of War to report a new organization of the army, so as to reduce the number of officers; the question pending being on the motion of Mr. TAYLOR to commit the resolution to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. WILDE said, that, when he was intercepted by the expiration of the hour devoted to resolutions, the other day, he had but a few more words to say. He had said, on that occasion, that the passage of this resolution would be an indication, on the part of that House, that they were prepared to vote for a reduction of the army. One gentleman had remarked that this was a proposition merely to institute an inquiry. In this light he could not view it. The Secretary is required to submit a plan for the reduction of the number of officers; and should he report that no reduction could be made without detriment to the public service, would it not be said that this was not an answer to the call made upon him by the House? The resolution either contemplates asking the Secretary whether any reduction can be made in the officers of the army, without injury to the public service, and, if any, what? or it directs him to propose a plan for this reduction at all events. In either of these cases, he would deem it proper to commit the resolution to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that it might there be discussed, the principles settled which it involves, and then the result of their deliberations might be submitted to the Secretary of War for his action; or they might submit to the department only the inquiry in relation to the expediency of the measure, and not call upon it for a distinct plan for re-organizing the army, without a proper investigation. It appeared to him that the proposition, as it now stood, was one asking them to express an opinion without deliberation. Mr. W. said he should offer an amendment to the resolution, if the motion for its commitment did not prevail.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said, the question before the House was on the commitment of the resolution to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The proposition in the resolution did not contemplate a reduction in the rank and file of the army, but only in its official corps. If such reduction were proper, he did not know why it could not as well be discussed in the House, as in a Committee of the Whole. For his own part, he was anxious that some plan should be submitted at the next session of Congress, by which the number of officers in the army could be made to bear some proportion to the men. This undue proportion of officers, he believed, in his conscience, to be useless. There is not a Government on earth [said Mr. W.] whose army is thus organized. A gentleman near me makes the exception of that of Bolivar; but, not being acquainted with the fact, I, of course, cannot join in the exception.

According to the reports laid before the House, the army never consists of more than five thousand five hundred men; and what proportion of them are officers? According to the estimate of the members of the Military Committee, there is a commissioned officer to every seven men, or seven and a half. There are near seven hundred officers to command five thousand men! There are twelve regiments in the service, each regiment consisting of twelve companies, and each company of from forty-five to fifty men. Companies [he said] were in fact divided, as, during the war, the number of men to a company was fixed at from eighty to a hundred. Unless some re-organization of the army took place, the present officers would all be brigadiers. The captains would be majors, and the lieutenants captains by brevet. He asked if gentlemen had examined into the expenses of our army. He meant the army proper. He would ask if it was known what proportion this expenditure bore to those required when the army consisted of ten thousand men. The difference is very small—three or four thousand dollars. For the last two years, the pay and subsistence had averaged two million three hundred thousand dollars. But this was not all; the Military Academy at West Point had become a part of the army. It had admitted two hundred and sixty cadets. It was true, they did not all remain to hang as a burden upon the army. After receiving their education, those who could procure a livelihood by a profession at home, preferred that course; the remainder hung upon the skirts of the army, at about twenty-four dollars per month, without the semblance of service. Something [he said] ought to be done in relation to the evils which grew out of this institution.

Mr. DODDRIDGE inquired if this discussion was in order.

Mr. VANCE said, he hoped the gentleman from New York [Mr. TAYLOR] would withdraw his motion to commit the resolution, in order that the discussion might proceed without interfering with the rules of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR said, that, as his object was only to call the attention of the House to the subject, and as this object had been accomplished, he would withdraw his motion.

Mr. WICKLIFFE resumed. His reason for making the remarks which he had offered, was, that he conceived the motion to commit the resolution equivalent to a motion to reject it. He then recapitulated the arguments which he had used. In relation to the Military Academy, the door to military promotion was now closed to all who had not graduated at that institution. No man who educated his own son, however well qualified he might be, or however much he might desire to see him enrolled among the defenders of his country, could gain admission for him till provision was made for the sixty or a hundred brevets already hanging upon the skirts of the army. There was no motive to excite the non-commissioned officers to a laudable competition in the performance of their duties, or the acquirement of a knowledge of their profession; for even the rank of a subaltern was placed beyond their reach, without the pale of their hopes. These men, during the late war, proved our most efficient officers, wherever their deeds of valor earned their promotion.

We have had much complaint [said Mr. W.] on the subject of the frequent occurrence of desertion from the ranks of the army. And why is this, sir? It is because when a man attains the rank of an orderly sergeant, (one of the most essential company officers,) his military career is ended. He has attained the utmost point at which he can ever hope to arrive; he has no further motive for action, or stimulant to laudable ambition. Mr. W. said he had long been of opinion that the system pursued in relation to this Military Academy was a most unjust and ruinous one, that no man, however meritorious and well qualified, should be admitted into the army, unless he can produce a sheepskin, evidencing that he has graduated at this institution! He thought no men could be more unjustly proscribed and disfranchised than those who were thus refused. The gentleman on my left [Mr. DE WITT] says, except editors of newspapers; but I say, not even them.

Mr. DANIEL observed, it appeared to him manifest that there ought to be a new organization of the army. When the army was reduced, in 1821 or '22, the object of that law was to reduce and curtail its expenditures; but we see that they have amounted to about the same since that period as before. This he thought a sufficient reason why something should be done. While they were urging the necessity of retrenchment in every department of the Government, why not commence with the army, and at least lop of its useless parts? But, [said Mr. D.] he did not believe that education could form a military character. Two-thirds of those educated at West Point could never be fitted to command an army, or a company, or even to perform the duties of an orderly sergeant. To be sure, some of them might be capable of these duties. What, it would be asked, is the best course to make them qualified? Why, educate them at West Point, if you choose, but throw them back again into society, and let them take an equal chance for promotion with the rest of their fellow-citizens. If they have talents, no doubt they will be developed. If they have merits, no doubt they will be rewarded. There were many who had never received a military education, who were equally well qualified with those who had. Was such an education found essential in the late war? Not at all, sir; on the contrary, it was found totally useless, and, indeed, involved the country in more calamities than any other cause. He asked, was Scott a man who had received a military education? Not at all—he was a mechanic. Was Morgan? Not at all—he was a wagoner; and neither of them had more than a common English education. Let it also be remembered that Bonaparte took his officers from the ranks, for their valor and good behavior; and by that means created the finest army in Europe.

He was told by the gentleman from New York, on his right, [Mr. CAMBRELENG] that in war we find a difficulty in getting officers, while privates were easily procured. This only proved to him that the gentleman knew but very little of the recruiting service; as it was notorious we had ten applications, during the late war, for offices, where we had one enlistment of a private soldier. There was, and there always would be, a greater number of applicants for rank, station, and command in the army, than there were offices to give them. The demand, if he might so express himself, in the language of the day, the demand was greater than the means of supply. He said that there would always be a sufficient number of capable men in the intelligent community to form the officers of a larger army than we should ever have occasion to raise; and that, too, without having occasion to seek them at West Point, or at any other point. After some remarks on the requisites necessary to render an officer of value in the service of his country, he proceeded to comment on the observation of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS] on the preceding day, that the frequency of changes in the army would tend to create indifference in the officers as to their proficiency in military knowledge and science. It was said that they would reason with themselves, that, having the prospect of remaining but a certain period in the service, they would grow negligent and careless in the performance of its duties. Now, I [said Mr. D.] think that totally the reverse of this would be the case. I think that the adoption of such a measure as the one proposed, instead of discouraging them from the study of their profession, would, on the contrary, act as an additional stimulus to the acquirement of knowledge in it. When an officer knows that, every five or ten years, there will be a re-organization of the army, and that the most meritorious officers would be selected, and retained in commission, it stands to reason that every officer in the army, desirous of continuing in the service, would apply himself with unceasing diligence to the attainment of that knowledge, and the improvement of those capacities, which alone qualify their possessor to be retained in his office. The argument of the gentleman from New York must, therefore, fail. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TAYLOR] had said that he had voted for the reduction of the army, in 1821, and that for doing so he had been assailed by the newspapers, and called a radical. The vote on that occasion showed that the gentleman thought it necessary that the army should be reduced. He complained of being abused by the newspapers in all parts of the United States. Well, [said Mr. D.] cannot he now stand the shot from a paper gun? Has he not sufficient nerve to bear newspaper abuse? I cannot certainly think it. He voted for the diminution of the army formerly, and I hope that he will go with us now, and lend his aid to the accomplishment of so desirable an object. It would be the means of saving the country half a million of dollars annually; and he trusted that it would pass the House. He wished, indeed, that it had taken a wider range. He wished that the resolution had called upon the Secretary to state the number of effective rank and file; and of their officers; of captains of companies, of majors, of colonels, with a view to the establishment of the number of each necessary for the public service. He wished, he repeated, that the resolution had been couched in these terms, and that the principle of the reduction in 1821-'22 should now be acted upon. He was not one who wished to see the country swarming with officers, in a time of peace as well as in war.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. VANCE requested him to withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. STORRS declined acceding to the request.

The motion was, however, negatived without a division.

Mr. VANCE rose to address the House, but the hour expired.

BUFFALO AND NEW ORLEANS ROAD BILL.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HAYNES in the chair, and took up the Buffalo and New Orleans road bill.

Mr. LEA rose, and said that he had hitherto refrained from engaging in this discussion, partly on account of the exceeding reluctance and hesitancy with which he would at any time ask to be heard in this hall. But he had been influenced, also, by a desire to offer an amendment to the bill, at the time of presenting his views on the subject generally. Since an early stage of the debate, this had not been in his power, in consequence of the amendments and motions which had been pending; and he was aware that the same difficulty yet continued; but the manner and progress of the discussion had admonished him that he should not longer refrain, and that he ought to use the contemplated amendment by way of objection and argument against the bill in its present form. He would thus be able to exhibit the comparative advantages of the plan of the amendment for executing this and similar works, and both modes would then be before the committee; so that gentlemen could fairly consider whether they would be willing to adopt either. If so, they would be prepared to vote against the motion now pending to strike out the enacting clause of the bill; but, if otherwise, they would sustain that motion which goes to defeat the whole bill. He thought it particularly proper, in order to test this measure fairly, that both plans, and the whole subject, should be fully developed before the committee, previously to taking a vote on this question, which may be decisive.

I have thus [said Mr. L.] indicated, in a few words, my object generally; and I hope the committee will now indulgently allow me to present my views more at large. The peculiarity of my situation may afford an apology not only for my speaking, but, also, for giving some of my remarks a local direction. With but very humble pretensions, I have desired to be equally unassuming—and I might not have felt myself called on to depart, on this occasion, from my habit of silent voting, if this bill had not addressed itself directly to the homes, interests, and feelings of my constituents. But the proposition of the bill is, that this road shall run through my district somewhere; and (in the "glorious uncertainty" of these projects) that is taken to be almost any where and every where. The engineers, to be sure, travelled along the principal stage road through that country; and that is understood to be the western route indicated in their report. But there are many other roads running in the same general direction, along the extensive valley of East Tennessee, between Kentucky on the one side, and North Carolina on the other; and private surveying has been resorted to for ascertaining the nearest and best way. And how many is it supposed there are of the good people along these respective roads, who have any doubt that the way nearest to their dwellings is the very best way in all the world for this great national road? All but one route (and that one, too, perhaps) must, in the end, be disappointed; but, until the matter shall have been settled, hope will continue the flatterer of all.

This multimorph offer of a road to a people who have never received any thing in this way, and who feel the want of improved outlets to market more than any other part of the Union, has naturally produced uncommon excitement in that quarter. It is not difficult to know the variety and luxuriance of the growth of such a hotbed. Many of my honest constituents have been led away by vain expectations, which they will never realize, and excited by means, some of which it is unnecessary to explain. Not only much speaking and writing have been resorted to, but, also, neighborhood, town, and county meetings have been held, to discuss and decide the constitutionality and expediency of the very bill now under our consideration; and with the view of instructing me, and requesting others to support it, as constitutional and expedient, not merely for making such a road as is proposed in the bill, but a railroad, according to the rage of the times—even a splendid national railroad!

It is not my purpose now to inquire into the motives of any who participated in those meetings, nor am I disposed to be outdone by any of them in matters of civility. I, therefore, take occasion to perform a twofold duty—first, of rendering my acknowledgments to all of them for the attention which they have been pleased to pay to me during my absence from home—and, secondly, of tendering the thanks of some of them to the honorable chairman, and the other honorable gentlemen of the Committee on Roads and Canals, for this precious bill, which seems to be regarded by some as almost a providential means of hastening the millennium itself!

Having discharged thus much of my duty, I should neglect another part of it, were I not to make some further remarks concerning these same meetings; for it so happened that, at some of them, a majority did not feel themselves quite so much flattered by the bill as to give it their approbation. Such was the result, I understand, at those meetings, where the subject was fully discussed before the people. They were a little shy of this proffered favor. The hook must be better baited before they can be caught. I have forbore from censuring any one; but, I should not do justice to my own feelings, considering the extraordinary excitement which this matter has occasioned among my constituents, if I were to refrain from awarding my feeble commendation to such of them as have opposed this bill, so really degrading, and yet so flattering to interested and superficial observers. With such temptations before them, and in the midst of great clamor in favor of the bill, they have manifested that kind of moral courage and political virtue, on which the liberties we enjoy must always depend—and even those who may candidly differ from them in opinion, must acknowledge the sterling patriotism of their course, in adhering to what they regarded as correct principles. Liberty to them is more valuable than gold—and I am proud to have the honor of representing such freemen.

Another consideration adds to the peculiarity of my situation. I find myself the only member on this floor from several hundred miles of distance along the contemplated route of this road, who refuses to take this dose of poison, as it has been prepared. Two of my honorable colleagues immediately to the west of me, and another, with two honorable gentlemen from Virginia, immediately to the east of me, are in favor of this bill, although they have arrived at that point by different roads, some of which are new and untravelled before. For all of these gentlemen I feel a sincere friendship personally, and I have, also, been in the habit of harmonizing with them on political subjects generally.

Perhaps you may consider my situation rather embarrassing, in the midst of such a multiplicity of routes through my district—such a diversity of sentiment among my constituents—and such cross-firing from my friends in this hall. I confess that I derive no pleasure from this confusion—that I regret the conflict of opinion and of interest; but not so much from considerations personal to myself, as from others of public concern. Yet, it is to no purpose to express unavailing regrets; every one must act on his own convictions and responsibilities; and I assure the committee I have not the least doubt or difficulty as to my own course. I will not vote for this bill. I cannot approve either of its principles or of its details. But I am not, therefore, an enemy to internal improvements; on the contrary, I would favor all of a proper kind, to be executed in a proper manner. A good road through my country would doubtless be very convenient; and, certainly, I could have no objections against it in itself considered, but I have some objections against obtaining it at the expense of my own oath and the constitution—our liberties and permanent welfare.

Some honorable gentlemen have told us much of their obedience to the will of their constituents. I, too, acknowledge, to some extent, the force of such an obligation; but not quite so obsequiously, perhaps, as some of my friends. I would not be understood as regardless of their good opinion. I would prize it highly at all times, either in public or private life. Nor will I affect indifference to my own destiny; and it will be my business to satisfy my constituents of the correctness of my public conduct; but, whether I shall be able to do so or not, is to me a secondary consideration; for I hold that no man is fit to be a representative here, who can hesitate as to a choice between his own personal popularity and the preservation of the true principles of our Government. To them I look and adhere, as the best means of promoting the best interests of my people, rather than to delusive expedients for relief or pitiful advantages, resulting in no permanent good, but answering, for a time, the purposes of certain candidates for popular favor.

I was sent here to act on my oath, to do good, not mischief—to execute, not violate, the great compact of this Union.

My constituents, of all classes, have long known that I could not vote for any such bill as that now before us; and, while some of them have been asking me to do so, they must have had other motives than even a hope that I could comply with their request. They know my sentiments, and they expect me to maintain them. A majority of them sent me here as a State right republican, as contradistinguished from a national republican. They are jealous of the assumed, overgrown, and increasing powers of this splendid Federal Government; and they are not willing to look to it as the “dispenser of every good and perfect gift under heaven.” They see that it is becoming more and more the fashionable idol of the times, especially among those who desire to be initiated, or to continue priests at the altar; and they fear the danger that a new and ponderous machine will be fabricated as a substitute for the beneficent original; and that the idolatrous worshippers of this political Juggernaut, in whole communities, are to be crushed beneath its wheels. The thing has progressed some distance already; the devotees are assembling; and new converts, even from those who were thought to be steadfast in a better religion, are prostrating themselves before it. I yet belong to another faith; and, instead of these imitations having any tendency to proselyte me, they render the scene appalling indeed, and establish me in my own creed.

It cannot be expected that all will agree in opinion, either as to politics or religion; but there are, nevertheless, in each, both positive and comparative differences between right and wrong, on which must depend the fate of individuals and of nations; and it should be the effort of every one, at all times, to attain the nearest practicable approximation to truth. But while important differences must exist, a spirit of toleration, and even conciliation, is indispensably necessary to prevent ruinous distraction! Who can look to the vast and various interests by which different portions of this extensive country are influenced—by which their representatives here are propelled in different directions, without discovering the utter hopelessness of long managing the great concerns of this Union to advantage, or even continuing the partnership, without exercising the utmost forbearance, and executing a determination not to push matters to extremity? When this General Government moves on the border of the constitution, even then prudence gives a caution; when it unscrupulously passes over a doubtful boundary, and occupies every inch of disputed ground, harmony and good feeling must yield to jealousies, animosities, and contentions; but whenever it shall boldly, deliberately, and perseveringly march further, and invade the undisputed territory of others, then the natural consequences must be, (as when the Rubicon was passed, and Rome was no longer free,) anarchy first, and despotism next.

This Federal Government has often sported wantonly on doubtful ground; occasionally, but inadvertently perhaps, it has trespassed further; but if the bill now under consideration should ever become a law, in its present form, it would be idle, insulting, to pretend that we aim at any thing short of consolidation, and a complete conquest of the State authorities.

I consider this bill as the most direct and daring attempt upon State jurisdiction and authority, that was ever before a Congress of this Union. Is it not? What does it amount to? Nothing less than a positive direction to the President to take prompt and effectual measures to have a road made from the northern lakes to New Orleans, near the southern gulf, without saying one word as to the manner in which the jurisdiction or rights of States, or corporations, or individuals, are to be regarded or adjusted, in cases of difficulty. The strong arm of power must not be stayed, but must act promptly and effectually to accomplish the object, no matter whose rights or what obstructions may interpose; for gentlemen have tauntingly told us, here and elsewhere, that an act of Congress cannot be controlled, unless the political omnipotency of the Supreme Court shall condescend to advise us of error. And is such a power as this to be put into the hands of the President of this Union, at this early day? Is he to be authorized, commanded, to go forward and make this road, without regard to the rights of any body? The like of it never was heard of in any country that was not a downright tyranny, or where there was even a decent respect for the rights of man. Some mode of ascertaining rights, and compensating for damages, would seem to be indispensable. I have no disposition to push scruples or apprehensions beyond due bounds, but this bill has no bounds as to principle—and when or where are we to stop?

At a proper time, it is my intention to offer an amendment, with a view of saving the rights of the States, of corporations, and of individuals, as far as practicable. At present I can only urge it as an argument, to show that the bill is not as it should be, and to point out a better mode of executing this and all similar works. By contrasting the amendment with the bill, the imperfections of the latter will appear more strikingly, perhaps, than by any other means; while there will be exhibited a plan for conducting internal improvements, under the auspices of this Government, by which many and serious difficulties will be obviated, and which I think well worthy of the most deliberate consideration of every citizen of the States of this Union. We are told that this Government will progress in the business of internal improvement, and some gentlemen seem very confident in this opinion. If its progress in that way should be very extensive, it must be matter of great importance that some plan should be adopted to attain the ends in the least exceptionable manner. The amendment which I expect to offer, will be a test of the political principles of gentlemen on this floor. It is of a character too distinctive to be mistaken by any politician, and the people at large will understand the vital difference between it and the bill, in their respective tendencies. I avow my objects frankly: first, to put the bill right as far as possible; and, second, if its friends will not adopt a better plan, to put them thoroughly in the wrong.

That I may give my views to the committee with greater facility and distinctness, and exhibit the proposed contrast in a manner more pointed and practical, I beg leave to read the contemplated amendment:

"Strike out the fourth section, and insert the following:

"SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the several Boards of Commissioners, to the extent of their respective surveys, shall report to the President a detailed plan of the manner in which said road ought, in their opinion, to be constructed, without the application of stone or gravel, except where indispensably necessary for its convenient use; and, also, a particular estimate of the expenses of completing said road, according to said plan; and, also, a moderate and uniform rate of tolls, which they may deem proper to be collected on said road; and the several Boards of Commissioners shall have the aid of such of the Engineer Corps as the President may direct, in making their examinations, surveys, plans, estimates, and reports; in all of which the President may direct such alterations as he may deem proper, until they receive his approbation.

"SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That copies of the reports approved of by the President, shall be transmitted to the Governors of the States, respectively, through which the surveys may have been made; and, for the purpose of aiding those States in making the road, there shall be paid, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as shall be equal to fifteen hundred dollars a mile of said road, to be paid in the following manner, and on the following conditions, viz. Whenever any of those States shall have passed a law providing for the construction of so much of the road as may be within the limits of that State, according to the survey and plan approved of by the President, as far as the funds appropriated by Congress will enable it to be done; and, also, providing for the repairs, preservation, and improvement of said road, after it shall have been made, so far as practicable, from tolls at the rates approved of by the President, as aforesaid, which tolls may be collected on any part of said road from the time at which it may be in suitable condition for convenient use, and which shall not be altered without the assent of Congress; and, also, providing that the mail, and property, and troops, in actual service, belonging to the United States, may, at all times, pass along said road free from any toll whatever; but, having due regard, in all of said provisions, for corporate rights, derived from charters, as they exist at present, or as they may be modified in said law; and, also, designating the person or persons to whom such money may be paid: then, on the application of such person or persons, the President shall cause to be paid to him or them one-third of the fifteen hundred dollars a mile of so much of said road as may be within the limits of that State; and, on similar applications, equal sums, respectively, at the end of one and two years thereafter: Provided, That the person or persons applying for the second and third payments, shall, before receiving the same, submit to the President a satisfactory report of the manner of disbursing the funds received, and of the progress and condition of the work; and the President is required to withhold any of the payments in case such State should apply any of the funds to any other purpose than the making of said road, or should fail to prosecute the work with reasonable expedition."

The committee will perceive that the three first sections of the bill, concerning the survey and location of the road, would not be affected by the amendment, which relates to the manner of execution and preservation, rather than to the plan or kind of the road; but some subsequent parts of the bill would require alterations, which would occasion no difficulty, however, as they would be but natural consequences from adopting the amendment.

I am very desirous that the amendment, and the whole plan, of which it is a part, should be well considered and understood, not only for the present occasion, but, also, for all future subjects of similar kind. The committee will, therefore, indulge me in giving a condensed and connected view of the whole plan, that the various parts may be more properly estimated.

An outline of the plan is simply this:

1. Let this Government survey and locate the road precisely where it may desire to have one made.

2. Let the commissioners, with the aid of suitable engineers, report to the President the survey and location; also, a detailed plan of the manner of making the road of the kind indicated in the law, with a particular estimate of the cost; and, likewise, a uniform and moderate rate of tolls—all of which to be subject to alterations and approval by the President.

3. Instead of the President's going on to have the road made by the direct authority and action of this Government, let copies of all the reports, approved of by him, be sent to the Governors of the different States through which the road is to pass, as the bases of a proposition from this Government.

4. Let that proposition be, that this Government will furnish the necessary funds, in reasonable and regular instalments, to any of those States, whenever it shall have passed a law, (with due regard to existing corporate rights,) first, to make the road, as proposed, to the extent of the funds furnished; second, to keep it in repair by the moderate and uniform rate of tolls proposed, and not to be altered without the assent of Congress; third, to exempt the mail, and property, and troops, in actual service, belonging to the United States, from all toll whatever; but that the President should so far exercise control over the funds, as to withhold any of the subsequent instalments, if the former should not have been wholly and promptly applied to the work.

After much reflection on the subject, but with great deference to others, I submit to the committee, and to the nation, if the plan proposed is not the most eligible which has been devised for accomplishing internal improvements under the auspices of this General Government. It challenges scrutiny, and appeals to every motive of prudence and patriotism. It will attain the ends more completely—with greater certainty—with less danger. I doubt not that these positions will be maintained by further investigation and reflection.

Having given the substance of the plan, connected with the amendment, it becomes my duty now to contrast it with the bill, more particularly and practically.

A superficial observation of the amendment has caused some to object, that it amounts to nothing more than conferring power on the States to make works of this kind out of the common funds. As the distinction is important, I beg leave to correct this mistake. I hold that this Government can do directly whatever it can authorize others to do; that the constitution is the only source of our powers; that we can neither give nor take any, except as provided in that instrument; that the powers of the respective Governments, either delegated or retained, are perfect of their kinds, within the legitimate spheres of their action, but utterly void when extended further; and that, if we have the power to make roads, the assent of individual States is wholly unnecessary; but that, if we have not such power, we cannot confer it on the several States which have it already. On the question whether this Government has such power, we have had much of argument and of authority. I have enough to do, on this occasion, without entering minutely into a discussion of that point, which has been, however, and will incidentally be touched in the course of my remarks. But I could not fail to notice the pleasure with which the chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals, and other gentlemen, have pressed on our attention the sayings of certain great men (Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe) concerning the advantages which might attend the exercise of such a power by this Government. Yes, which might attend it, if not abused; but there is the danger. I have lived long enough, however, to know how easy it is for the greatest men to throw out obiter dicta, either as judges or politicians, not much to be regarded, even, by themselves, and often repudiated after more reflection and greater experience. But if these sayings are of high authority as to expediency, I would ask gentlemen to reflect, if the argument as to power is not proportionally stronger against them, when these same individuals, and sometimes in the most solemn manner, with all their partiality for the power, have felt themselves constrained to deny its constitutional existence, as claimed in this bill. We have no evidence that any of them ever changed his opinion as to the power; but it is well known that Mr. Jefferson, at least, became perfectly satisfied that the evils from exercising such a power would far overbalance the advantages. If no such power exists, this Government ought to seek some other mode of attaining its ends, continuing to act in its own sphere, and attending to its own business, without interfering with that of others, even by permission. But, whether it exists or not, it is a mistake to suppose that there are not very important differences, both in principles and details, between the plan of the amendment and that of the bill.

The bill proposes that this Government shall exercise entire and absolute control and jurisdiction over the whole subject. On the other hand, the amendment contemplates, that, when the General Government, for its own legitimate purposes, shall desire an improved road in a particular direction, it will indicate its wish to the State authorities, and offer the necessary funds, on terms advantageous to all. In this way neither Government would confer any new powers on the other. The State would not give its assent for the General Government to do that which was to be done by itself; nor would this Government confer on the State any authority to do that which the State had an undoubted right to do before. In making and preserving such a road, any State would exercise precisely the same powers as are in operation every day, and would use the money from this Government precisely as if it had been derived from any other source. On the other hand, this Government would use the road as it now uses all the roads made by the States throughout the Union; and, in its lawful operations, instead of using bad roads without pay, or improved ones by paying tolls as it now does, would have given so much money for the free use forever of a good road. As to jurisdiction, the whole community and the respective Governments would stand precisely as they do at this day, without any controversy whatever on that subject, while the object of all would have been attained. Not only would all collisions and difficulties as to jurisdiction be obviated by the plan of the amendment, but that patronage, which is inseparable from the subject, would remain scattered in the hands of the State authorities, instead of being transferred and concentrated here. All agree that the patronage of the President is great, as it now is; and I know of none, who avowedly advocate its enlargement, when there is no necessity for doing so. There is no necessity for it in this case—and I put this point home to every member of this committee. We are told that this Government is to go on making internal improvements all over the Union—and that, after the payment of the national debt, millions on millions, every year, are to be expended in this way. If so, what will the patronage of the Executive come to? Or rather, what will it not be? Can the opponents of any administration ever wish to see it possessed of such power? And no friend of his country ought ever to desire it for a President of his own choice. But the gentleman over the way [Mr. MEXCER] has told us that there is no danger at all on the score of patronage—and he says, that this system will give us opportunities of doing some good while we enjoy our places on this floor, and tend to prevent members of Congress from running to Executive bureaux in search of offices. I confess that I am at some loss to comprehend the honorable gentleman's meaning. But I am apprised of his profitable experience on this subject, and doubt not that he might be able, from that, to inform us more fully how to provide for ourselves, so as effectually to prevent the necessity of running to the bureau. It may be that there are ways and means for getting such things done—and, possibly, that gentleman may understand, better than any other, how a member of Congress, by using extraordinary exertions to obtain from this Government a million of dollars or more for some project of internal improvement, might get himself into a birth worth fifteen hundred or two thousand dollars a year, in addition to his pay here—and thus be freed from the necessity of running to a bureau to get an office worth less than the double business of President of a Canal Board and member of Congress. I am not satisfied, however, that such successful adventures of members of Congress would tend much to diminish the patronage, or any other evils which may have been apprehended.

Economy is another consideration which ought never to be overlooked. No proposition, I take it, is better established, both by reason and experience, than that, with equal means to accomplish a given work, the General Government would be less economical than the State Governments, and they less than corporate companies, and they less than individuals. What the difference would be, can, of course, be only matter of conjecture, as the means of calculation are vague and contingent; but it is fair to suppose that a third or a fourth would be saved by expending the money under State authority, instead of this Government; or that the road would be in that proportion better, if any particular sum by the mile were applied to the work. But there is one feature of the amendment which I consider peculiarly felicitous, in its tendency to economy, security, and faithfulness generally, in the disbursement; and that is the power of the President to withhold the subsequent instalments, if the former should not be properly applied. While the money would be expended under the superior economy of State authorities, on an object desirable to have accomplished, a reasonable security for this Government, and restraint on others, would exist in the salutary supervision and conditional control of the President.

It seems to me that, on the great points of jurisdiction, patronage, and economy, the plan of the amendment is unquestionably preferable to that of the bill, and that, if the road is to be made, it had better be done under State authority. But as some gentlemen still think, no doubt, that this bill may answer the purpose, I must ask their attention to some further particulars. This bill is a legislative curiosity. It must be kept in mind that the President is directed to take "prompt and effectual measures" to have the road made from one end of the United States to the other. I beg to know what measures he is to take. I cannot see; the bill does not tell us. Yet they are to be

"prompt," and such as shall be "effectual." We are to pass the bill into a law; it is not to be controlled—its operations must not be stopped—the work must go on, regardless alike of States, corporations, and individuals. A road must be had by some means. But how? It is easy to make one on paper; but what is to be the process in practice and reality? It is time to think of things as they are and will be in fact. "Can the President do any thing that we may choose to direct him, without our providing any of the ordinary means? Let me ask gentlemen how he will manage to condemn the lands of individuals for this road? How is he to call a jury to assess damages? Not a syllable do we find on this subject. All is to be done by the fiat of the President, who is to go on, it would seem, and take the property without judge or jury. But the commissioners, forsooth, are to make contracts with the owners of the lands. This is all very well, as far as it goes—but how far is that? It is said that the road will be about fifteen hundred miles long—and does any practical man suppose that the commissioners will be able to find all the owners of the various tracts of land over which the road ought to run? Most of the owners are, doubtless, near to the route of the road; but who can tell where many others may be in different parts of the Union, and in other parts of the world? If, however, they could all be found, I would next inquire who they are, and what powers they have to make the contracts desired. Many of them, probably, would be laboring under some legal disability, of infancy, or coverture, or insanity. Some of these difficulties might be obviated; but others might be absolutely insurmountable. Of those who could be found, and would be capable of making contracts, there might be some inclined to charge exorbitant damages, and especially when no means were provided for condemning the land at a fair price.

The terms of this bill would require of the President to do that which it might be impossible for him to perform, and would, probably, accumulate difficulties and expenses utterly intolerable. But those which I have just suggested would all be removed at once by adopting the amendment. The State authorities are in the habit, as occasion may require, of condemning the lands of any person whatever for the purposes of roads, and of paying the fair value, without being imposed on—and they would exercise the power for this road, as in any other case. It might be useful for the commissioners, as far as practicable, to receive from the owners, respectively, such statements, in writing, as would show the amount of damages which they would be willing to receive; and those statements, as far as they were reasonable, would be data for the State authorities.

The claims of individual owners of land, however, are not all that must be adjusted on this road. Turnpike companies have rights of peculiar and embarrassing character. How many there may be on the whole route, I do not know, but enough to make fact supersede speculation, as there are certainly some at important places in the State of Virginia, on the route proposed in the bill, at and near the Blue Ridge and the Alleghany mountain. Have gentlemen examined the extent of the duties and rights of these companies what they are bound to perform, how much they have expended, and what exactions they may make? It might be well to reflect, too, that Virginia has a standing law for the State to subscribe part of the stock in such companies—two-fifths, I think, after individuals shall have taken three-fifths—and I am well informed that she has such an interest in some of the very turnpikes to which I allude. Their roads are not in conformity with the one proposed, and, in some respects, may be very inferior. Of course, they would not come within the exceptions, or escape the operations of this bill. How is the President to manage these parts of the concern? Shall he fix up an opposition road hard by, at unnecessary and enormous expense? Or shall he assume jurisdiction and control of the present road? In either way, the company's charter would be virtually repealed—a resort would be made to Virginia to maintain those vested rights which she had given—and, let me tell gentlemen, she would maintain them. But, suppose all other parts of this road should be completed, and the turnpikes not interfered with, then they might continue to be in very inferior condition, while their owners would receive an enormous amount of tolls, in consequence of the general improvement of the road.

None of these consequences could be tolerated; and every gentleman will perceive at once how desirable it would be to have those charters modified to suit the occasion, as to the kind of road and the rate of tolls. But how could it be done? The General Government has no right to grant such charters, and, of course, none to modify them. The power to do so is not only omitted in the constitution, but it was expressly proposed in the convention, and positively refused. Such a refusal to grant power has always been regarded as conclusive against its exercise, in the opinion of every sound expositor of the constitution. I am aware, sir, that this argument, as applied to various parts of the proceedings of the convention, militates against the power of the General Government over the subject of roads, far more than is necessary for my present purpose, which is to show that this Government cannot interfere with these road charters, and that the State Governments must be resorted to for such a purpose. I would persuade gentlemen to leave the adjustment of these turnpike charters to the State legislatures that made them, and could modify them, according to such understandings with the companies as might be easily obtained, with the means at command, if those legislatures had the management of the road. There is a clause in the proposed amendment, to save the rights of these corporations, and to give opportunity for an adjustment of them, beneficial to all; but no such provision either is or can be in the bill, on the principles involved in making the road by this Government.

If the plan of the amendment be so decidedly preferable on the great points of jurisdiction, patronage, economy, the rights of individuals and of corporations, I would ask why it ought not to be adopted? Will any gentleman say that it is not a practical plan? Why not? If any State has a right now to make a road, in its own territory, where this Government desires one, as well as any where else, surely the right or power to do so will not be diminished by the aid of money from this Government; and, as far as the respective States might be willing to perform the work, it is morally certain that it would be well done in a reasonable time.

I have occasionally heard it suggested, however, that some one or more of the States might not be willing to accept of the proposition, and parts of the road might not be made. In the first place, I would say, if the whole road would be worth the money advanced, part of it ought to be worth its proportional share. As to the residue of the road, I would ask the objector this plain question, if he is prepared to vote for making it, by the direct action of this Government, through any State of this Union, that might be opposed to the exercise of such a power? If there be any such politician here, I would suggest to him with how much greater plausibility he could urge that it was "necessary and proper" to do so, after the refusal of such State to execute the work under a fair proposition from this Government. But, if any State would refuse to accept the money, and make its own part of the road, can it be supposed that the same State would quietly acquiesce in its being done by this Government? The chances are certainly the other way, and I speak, in some degree, advisedly on this point. In this view of the matter, sustained by facts which cannot be overlooked, I ask gentlemen, who really desire this road, to reflect on the choice which it will be most prudent for them to make. On which side lies the probability of success? And on which the strongest apprehension of danger?

To pass such a bill as that now under consideration would be nothing less, sir, than invoking a direct collision with some of the States of this Union. Have gentlemen forgot the quarters from which we have been admonished not to exercise this power? Or are they determined to push on to extremities, regardless of the admonitions, and without necessity? If they "love power and forget right," let them at least remember prudence. Sir, I will name no other State than my own—and I admit that her legislature has not been entirely uniform in its resolutions; but my colleagues cannot have forgot that the very last one it adopted on this subject, denies, most emphatically and unequivocally, the power assumed in this bill. Tennessee did right to deny it, sir; and it will be for her to determine when occasion may require her to maintain the position. As the constitution of this Union now stands, she ought never to surrender the jurisdiction and control of her roads to any Government on earth.

I am willing that this Government shall always exercise fully and perfectly its lawful authority; but more than that I cannot knowingly either assume or agree to, without detracting from those rights which belong to that State which has been my home through life. However much I may love the true Government of this Union, I yet have a stronger attachment to that of my own State. I take pride in the name of American, but I glory more in the name of Tennessee.

This General Government is well while acting as outposts to guard and defend our liberties; but my State is an important apartment in the citadel itself; and to that I am to retire in the last extremity, whenever the outposts shall yield to a foreign force, or shall turn themselves, and become assailants.

In the politics of this great Federal Republic, Tennessee is my first love, and my last hope!

I call on the friends of harmony and good order, generally, to beware. I show them a plan of conciliation—a way in which the object may be attained, without sending our President on the Quixotic adventure of a tournament with some of the States. I am not disposed to engage the President of my choice in any such unnecessary and hazardous business. His enemies may do so, if they choose. I ask gentlemen why they are so pertinaciously opposed to altering this bill. There must be something more involved than the particular road in question. They go for principle, forsooth; but they ought to remember that others, also, have some regard for principle, and cannot go with their neighbors beyond certain bounds, while those neighbors have no necessity for going so far. They contend for the right of this Government to make roads, and seem determined to exercise it, even without necessity, and in defiance of the supposed rights of others. It might be well for gentlemen not to forget the moral of our own revolutionary struggle. Great Britain contended for principle, and insisted on the right of taxation. She would not listen to the remonstrances of the colonies. She claimed the right, and would exercise it. Nor would she be admonished by the fable of the madman, who would shear the wolf, simply because he claimed the right to do so. Some gentlemen seem to think lightly of any opposition to their career; but let me tell them, that no community of freemen will patiently endure to be continually intruded upon, when they believe that every intrusion tends to affect, and eventually to destroy, their rights and liberties. While those, who feel their own power, are displaying it wantonly and tauntingly, they are sometimes but little aware of the consequences of their own conduct. And if a majority are determined to force this bill through, I wash my hands of it, and shall be under no obligation to maintain the usurpation.

Lest any one should suppose that the completion of the road might be retarded by having it done under State authority, and that the President might begin the work under the bill before the legislatures could act on the subject, so as to make a material difference as to time, I have procured authentic information to remove such an apprehension. If any gentleman supposes that this work would be done in either way, in a few months, or even years, he is much mistaken; and it is proper to know the truth on this point, whatever may be the effect. For that purpose, I beg leave to read a note which I have received from the Engineer Department.

"TOPOGRAPHICAL BUREAU,
March 29, 1830.

SIR: In answer to Mr. Lea's letter of the 25th instant, which you referred to me, I have the honor to state, that, taking into consideration the distance, the necessity that the level should accompany the compass throughout, the time lost by Sundays, wet weather, and accidents, the usual average of miles per day in doing such work in the field, in which a sufficient number of details will have to be collected to form a correct basis for estimates and plans of construction, and the usual time required in composing the drawings of the survey and the reports, and that there may be but three parties employed on the entire distance between Buffalo and New Orleans, I do not think it would be safe to estimate, for the completion of this labor, less time than two years.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN J. ABERT,
Lieutenant Col. and T. E.
Gen. C. GRATIOT, Chief Engineer U. S. A."

From this letter it appears that, with three companies of commissioners, the surveys and estimates would require two years. The bill proposes but one company; and so, I presume, it would be six years before the work would begin, as the whole would have to be first surveyed. It is said, however, that, in this particular, the bill is to be amended, so as to allow three companies. It seems to me that it might be better to have more. Why not a dozen? The money would be scattered along the road so much the sooner; and that, after all, I take to be the most persuasive argument in favor of the nationality of this and other roads. I hope, however, that the surveys might be completed in time for the legislatures of 1832 to act on the subject.

I have a few words to say concerning the kind of road contemplated. It will be observed that my amendment adopts the same kind, and same price, proposed in the bill. I was desirous that the principle should be fairly tested, and was unwilling that the amendment should carry heavier weight in the race. But I would not, therefore, have it understood that I am satisfied with that sort of road or that price. No, the inequality is too great. While others are to have railroads, and Macadamized roads, with stone aqueducts and magnificent bridges, I want something better for my country than a mudpike and corduroy causeways. The refinement of some gentlemen here perhaps may not apprehend the meaning of these terms, but no matter—I can assure them that we of the backwoods have experienced enough to understand them perfectly. My people are poor, I admit; and gentlemen seem to take it for granted that they will be thankful for small favors. Fifteen hundred dollars a mile, at most! And this is to pay for all damages to land, for grading and shaping the road, for materials, for travelling where necessary, and for making culverts and bridges! How can any gentleman believe that such a sum will answer all these purposes? It is not half enough to do the work as it ought to be; and less than three thousand dollars a mile ought never to have been proposed, if a good road was intended, even of second rate. Yet, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MENCHER] has said that, if he had been on the Committee on Roads and Canals, he would not have been willing to report the bill with more than a thousand dollars a mile, as that was as much as we ought to have, and that fifteen hundred dollars a mile was very extravagant, indeed! And this, too, is from the same gentleman, (but not the only one,) who stated that gentlemen from other quarters ought to vote for this bill, to show their liberality and generosity towards the West! I will not deny that I feel indignant when I hear such insulting mockery. In one breath we are told that the road will enrich the country, and, in the next, that a few dollars will make it.

I have another objection to this bill. It neither makes any provision for the preservation of the road, after it shall have been made, nor gives us any intimation of the mode that is to be hereafter resorted to for that purpose. If this road is to be made, I wish to understand the whole concern, from the beginning. Are we to have appropriations made from year to year? Or shall we hereafter establish a system of toll gates? Or will a surrender be made to the States? I ask gentlemen to tell us, if they please, which of these modes is to be adopted. Are they afraid to do so? I am afraid to risk it without. This physis, which is to cure the body politic, may be vitally dangerous, if we take it thus in broken doses. Sir, the manner in which this measure and its policy is to operate hereafter, is of its essence at present. If any gentleman is opposed to annual appropriations, how can he know but that mode may be adopted? If any one is in favor of a surrender to the States, has he any assurance that it will be done? If another is adverse to a toll gate system, by this Government, as most odious and dangerous, has he not evidence enough before his eyes to make him fear that this will be the favorite plan? How many are prepared to leap in the dark? Sir, if I had no other objection to this bill, I would scorn to vote for it with such deception stamped on its face. You offer me a road for the benefit of my people; and what then? You fix a system of tolls at what rate you please, and send your federal officers there to collect them in the federal courts, from any body and every body, if you choose, without regard to persons or business. And these tolls, for any thing we know, may be applied to making roads in other parts of the Union. Sir, I desire the Legislature of Tennessee to judge of the tolls which her citizens are to pay within her borders; and, with that precaution, they will never complain of moderate tolls to keep up the road after it shall have been made.

I invite attention particularly to the provisions of the amendment in relation to tolls, as containing a plan quite practical and safe. The commissioners, who will have so much else to do with this matter, and will therefore be able to perform this duty to great advantage, are, first, to report a rate of tolls to the President. He will have the different reports compared and made uniform, profiting by the suggestions of all, before he gives his sanction. The State Legislatures are afterwards to judge of these tolls, as a part of the proposition for them to accept. Approved by the commissioners, the President, and the State Legislatures, these tolls may be collected from any part of the road, as soon as it may be fit for use, and shall be entirely applied to the preservation and improvement of the road. They will also be uniform, and cannot be changed, without the assent of Congress, so that no State may impose unreasonable tolls, or speculate on any other. What better plan for repairing the road can any gentleman devise or desire? And why might it not be adopted at once, and thus prevent all future controversies on this part of the subject? This Government would have the use of the road, toll free; and what more could it desire?

One of my honorable colleagues, [Mr. ISACKS] for whom I have much respect, seems to "halt between two opinions," and while he contends most manfully for the power of this Government to make roads, nevertheless admits that it cannot afterwards exercise jurisdiction over them, so as to keep them in repair. It would seem to be a pity, indeed, that a fine road should have to be abandoned to chance as soon as made. This concession is full of argument in favor of all the views which I have presented, and must lead that gentleman to adopt them, if he will preserve his own consistency. Let the powers to make and to preserve be in the same Government.

I have endeavored to give a practical view of the bill, and of the contemplated amendment, in relation both to the making and the preservation of this road. I have compared the two plans, on the points of jurisdiction, patronage, and economy; the condemnation of lands and the rights of turnpike companies; practicability and probability of success; the time of execution, and kind of road; tolls and repairs. In exercising my own opinion, I cannot doubt that the amendment is decidedly preferable, in every particular wherein it differs from the bill; but every gentleman will judge and decide for himself, and I have done with this comparison.

I beg leave now to make a few remarks concerning the route of this road; but I am sensible that it would be a waste of time to detain the committee long on this point, after so much has been so ably urged concerning it by others. In estimating the general as well as comparative importance of the road, I think gentlemen have gone to extremes on both sides. But I confess that my knowledge is very limited indeed as to the part of the road from this city to Buffalo; and, I must, in some degree, follow the example of others, by attending chiefly to my own end of it. These two projects, which have heretofore been separate, are this year linked together. One gentleman gets up and tells us all about the ways from here to Buffalo; but as to the other end of the concern, he knows very little. Another can make us a speech for hours concerning the various routes from here to New Orleans, while he admits that he scarcely knows any thing of the opposite end. Thus we see that the interests and motives connected with the one, have no sort of natural association with the other. And yet these two opposites are united in the same picture, "a horse's head and fish's tail."

How is it, then, from here to New Orleans? What is the best route?

It is said that more people will be accommodated by either the middle or southern route, than by the western. I admit that it must be so, if you take either the southern or middle route, and give to it all the people east of the Blue Ridge; but if you divide them, and give to each of those routes only its own share, then, I suppose, neither would have more than properly belongs to the western route at this time. We ought, however, to look to the future; and I have no doubt that, by the time the road could be completed, the population to be accommodated by the western would exceed that of either of the other routes, and, in time, might be nearly or quite equal to both of the others. But the people on the western route would be more accommodated, in proportion to their numbers, whatever that might be, than the people east of the Blue Ridge, for various reasons. The western route lies through a newer country, in which it is natural to suppose that the roads are not as good as in an older one, if all other things were equal. The southern country also is naturally more advantageous for common roads, though less so for making well improved ones; and thus, while the western route labors under great disadvantages at present, and would, of course, be proportionally benefited, it presents greater facilities for making a first rate road. The western route would afford greater accommodations, moreover, on account of the great land carriage of merchandise, which has long existed and must continue, from the cities north of this place, along that route as far as Alabama. If this road were made south of the Blue Ridge, it has not been pretended that it would be used for such a purpose, as merchandise would continue to pass coastwise, by water, to the southern ports, and thence, by rivers and roads, into the interior. But it has been said that the road would answer well in the South, for carrying surplus productions to the navigable rivers. If such neighborhood nationality is to be regarded in this case, it would answer a similar purpose on the western route, perhaps to a greater extent. The western route would be fairly commercial, from this vicinity to Alabama; but no southern route would be so regarded.

For military purposes, I cannot see that a southern route would afford any very valuable facility. The natural course for supplies of troops and provisions is from the upper country to the seaboard, and not parallel with it, at a very respectful distance in the interior. That chivalry which really belongs to the South, would not, I am persuaded, recognise this as a military road, which would not lead towards the enemy. But how would the western route be in a military point of view? From the Tennessee line, upper Virginia might send down supplies of troops and provisions, inferior to none, even to this place, or to others more south, by obliquing in that direction from various points. Southwest from the same Tennessee line, the road would lead directly to that part of the Union most exposed and most needing assistance; and this is true of any branch which may be selected, of the western route. But it has been said that our rivers supersede the necessity of this part of the road. It cannot be denied that they do, to some extent; and that our rivers must always be relied on as our principal channels for throwing military aid to the defence of the Gulf frontier, as well as for commercial purposes; and if they were properly improved and connected, the road would be of comparatively less value, but would continue to furnish important additional facilities, in connexion with the rivers, and, sometimes, as a substitute for them.

As to the mail, it is admitted by all that the advantages would be great on any of the routes. I argue, however, that the advantages on the western route would be greatest, because the southern roads are now better than the western, and most would be gained by making improvement where most needed, especially where the means are better for making it permanent. How much might be saved in transporting the mail is uncertain, as well as the other benefits from expedition; and every gentleman must conjecture and calculate for himself. I have not considered it important to make a particular comparison of distances, not regarding the differences as great enough to influence materially the final decision.

When viewing this road in its military aspect, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEXER] adverted to some circumstances as connected with the defence of New Orleans. I omitted to notice his remarks in mine under the same head, and I would not now stop to retrace my steps for the purpose of setting him right, if I did not think part of what he said was too unnecessary and inaccurate, in the best view of it, to let it pass without some reply. That gentleman took occasion to step out of his way, it seemed to me, for the purpose of giving us a fact which happens to be no fact; and an opinion based on that unfortunate foundation, that if Colonel Thornton, who commanded the British forces on the opposite side of the Mississippi from New Orleans, had not been guilty of one of the grossest military blunders, the American forces on this side of the river must have been driven from their entrenchments, and compelled to retreat to the city, with all the consequences. That gross blunder was in not turning against our troops, on this side of the river, some of the cannon which had fallen into the British colonel's hands, at the post necessarily abandoned by Commodore Patterson, when a single piece thus turned would have accomplished the overthrow just mentioned. Sir, it may suit the fancy or purposes of that gentleman thus unjustly to tear laurels from the brows of brave men; but I am unwilling to tarnish the reputation of even an enemy, by such a ridiculous and wanton error. It is matter of history, notorious to the very schoolboys of the country, that Commodore Patterson spiked those very cannon, when he was compelled to abandon his position; and yet he is to be charged with the high criminality of neglecting his duty to do so, and the British colonel with the gross blunder of not turning one of them on his adversary, and the countervailing measures of the American commander-in-chief are to be forgotten. Even if that gentleman has such a desire, he need not expect thus to extinguish or darken the glories of that day.

If the comparison of routes, which others have made more at large, and I have briefly presented, be not very erroneous, (and I think it will puzzle gentlemen to show that it is so in any particular,) then the inference is easy, that the western route is preferable to any southern route, on all the three great points of commerce, war, and the mail.

I have given you some of my views on the best mode and the best route for making this road, and it remains to inquire whether it ought to be made in any way.

There are two aspects of this part of the subject. In the one, the particular measure may be looked to as a means for promoting the efficient action of this Government in its own legitimate operations. In the other, it may be regarded as part of a system of raising and disbursing money.

The first view of it is strictly governmental, which I take to be the true meaning of the term national, as applied to these subjects, as well as to all others under the action of this Government, whose powers extend only to the means "necessary and proper" to accomplish certain specified objects, with a view to general consequences. We ought to look to the uses which this Government, as such, (and not any portion of the community,) may have for a particular work, to determine its character. It is national or not, as this Government may or may not have use for it, in as much as the States and people can know nothing of this aggregate nation, except through the action of the General Government, in which alone consists the identity or nationality of this Union itself. If a work is desired for such purposes, the extent of it is entirely indifferent, and the whole of a long road used for governmental purposes is no more national than any part of it used in the same way, as a large ship of the navy is no more national than a small one. The inquiries, then, ought to be: First. What use will the Government have for the work? Second. Has it a right to apply money to such purposes? Third. Will its advantages be equal to its expenditure? All private or local concerns are out of the question, and every gentleman should put it to his conscience to determine the case without regard to them; and, at the same time, with an eye single to the particular measure in question, as standing on its own intrinsic merits. Where the advantages to this Government, in all its legitimate operations, could be fairly estimated as worth more than the interest of the money, it might be difficult to show that it would not be a judicious, permanent investment. Whether this bill presents such a case, depends on calculations of economy and security, which every gentleman must make for himself, in connexion with the ultimate extent of the work and the manner of its execution. Whenever these shall have been ascertained and fixed, then the means will be at hand for a final decision.

Having said thus much of the road as a strictly governmental measure, and abstracted from others, permit me now to notice it as part of a system of raising and disbursing money. It has not been, and will not be, denied, that it is the policy of many gentlemen to raise a great revenue for the purpose of expending, and to devise almost every possible means of expending for the purpose of continuing to raise it. One of these means is a general system of internal improvements, not for the proper purposes of the Government itself, but for distributing the money that more may be raised. Various contrivances are resorted to for scattering some of it among the people, in order to flatter and tempt them to sanction this insidious and ruinous policy. As long as the national debt shall be unpaid, a powerful argument will exist for continuing to raise a large revenue; and, therefore, it is the business of the politicians of whom I speak, to delay the final payment of that debt as much as possible. Although every dollar which is not necessary for the ordinary expenses of the Government, might be applied to that debt, so as to have it paid off in a short time, yet the utmost ingenuity and invention seem to be resorted to for draining the treasury, to postpone the payment of the national debt, and for committing the Government, in the mean time, in various projects of enormous expenditure, so as to create a necessity for continuing high duties. Co-operating with these politicians, on the one hand, there are some who look more to the effects of raising than of disbursing the revenue; while, on the other, there are some who look more to the disbursing than to the raising of it; but the joint operation is a grand system of ins and outs, calculated to increase the powers of this Government from year to year, to an unlimited extent, while its controlling influence will be felt in all our concerns, until distraction and disunion may follow from the gross inequality of its exactions and favors.

Although it is apparent, from what I have heretofore shown, that the payment of the national debt would be very little retarded by making this road alone, yet the danger is, that so many other projects might be adopted as to delay the payment until this road would come in for its full share in the work of procrastination. In this connection, too, it is worthy of remark, that, while other parts of the Union, in various projects now before Congress, are ready to receive and use whatever they can get, to the amount of millions, as fast as laws can be passed to give it to them, the people on this road would have just begun to receive something two or three years hence. What would then be their condition, if this Government were to go on from this time in a system of internal improvements, and other liberal expenditures? Could they expect, although thus postponed, that any other improvements would be put into operation near to this road during its progress in making? No, sir. Its importance has been so magnified by its over-zealous friends, that they could look for nothing, or but very little more, in a long time. But the Government, in the mean while, would be involved in projects enough to exhaust all the surplus revenue for many years to come, and the people near to this road would have it, and nothing else, probably, as their only consolation for millions on millions, paid and to be paid by them, in support of the darling system which I have already described.

I would ask some of my colleagues, especially, to pause and reflect on this system; to calculate its supposed advantages and real burdens. General principles are sometimes best understood by particular examples; and I will, therefore, apply a few remarks to that section of country in which I live. How much will this whole road give to East Tennessee? Not more than between three and four hundred thousand dollars; and that would not all get there in less than six years. On the other hand, how much does that same East Tennessee pay every year into the treasury of the United States? If we pay at an average rate with other parts of the Union, our contribution is about four hundred thousand dollars every year. The calculation is so plain and easy that no man can misunderstand it. The whole number of people in the United States is about twelve millions, and the revenue from commerce is about twenty-four millions—making twice as many dollars as people. The population of East Tennessee is about two hundred thousand, and two dollars a head amounts to the four hundred thousand before stated. About half the whole revenue from commerce goes every year towards paying the national debt; and, if that were paid, the one dollar a head, or two hundred thousand dollars every year, might be returned to East Tennessee as its proportion of the surplus, if the duties and revenue should not be diminished, deducting from that amount the expenses of collecting and refunding. Or, if the revenue should be diminished to the ordinary expenses of the Government, the surplus two hundred thousand dollars might remain in the pockets of the people, without any deduction for collecting and refunding. In this way it appears that the surplus revenue for between eighteen months and two years would be equal to the utmost amount that this road could ever bring into East Tennessee; and, as the national debt might be paid, but for this system, about as soon as the making of this road would commence, the people of East Tennessee might have as much money in two years, after paying the debt, as they would get in four, by means of this road; and, in the one case, by reducing the revenue, they would have kept their own money; while, in the other, they would have to work for it.

Will any gentleman from that quarter say that we do not pay our average share of the common revenue? I apprehend that any one would hesitate to give such an opinion, looking to the condition of the southern and southwestern States, as compared with others; and it might be a pity thus to spoil our own arguments in favor of getting a full share of what is going. It is impossible to ascertain the precise proportion paid by any part of the Union; nor is it my purpose now to attempt a general development of the various operations of our revenue and protecting systems united. It is enough for my purpose to say, what candor ought always to admit, that the burden falls and remains on three classes of our general community: First. The producers of the articles sent to foreign markets, including not only those who are immediately engaged in raising those articles, but also such as furnish them with food and other necessary supplies. Second. The carriers. Third. The consumers of the goods brought back in return for our produce. We all know that the southern country produces about two-thirds of all the articles taken from the United States to foreign markets, and the cotton planters alone more than half of the whole. Thus we see, at once, how East Tennessee, of which I have been speaking, sustains, both directly and indirectly, as a producer, far more than its proportional share of the common burden. But the disproportion does not stop here, and reaches beyond what we pay into the treasury, also, on account of the distance and difficulty of transportation between us and our seaboard markets. Some of the improvements contemplated would diminish this evil, but it must always continue comparatively great. The duties on the goods originally paid by the importing merchant grow with every change of owners, and with the progress of distance and of time, until the consumer makes his payment. This is substantially true, too, whether the consumer indemnifies for actual duties paid on foreign articles, or is compelled to give a higher price, on account of such duties, for articles made in our own country, as is the case in the indispensable item of salt. Whatever may be the condition of others, it is absolutely certain that the people of East Tennessee bear these burdens: First. In the higher prices which they have to pay for what they buy and consume; their tools, clothing, and food, even in every mouthful, if they can get salt to put in it. And, second. In their diminished sales and lower prices for what they may sell to those who are less able to buy, for similar reasons.

I hope to be pardoned for adducing these commonplace ideas; for, after all, they contain truths which ought not to be forgotten; and on the neglect or correct application of which depend some of the most important results. The section of country in which I live, as well as other parts of the Union, has been for years laboring under the consuming influence of the policy alluded to, and without even the semblance of any correlative advantage, until its pecuniary resources are almost exhausted, and its spirit of industry and enterprise, beyond absolute necessity, is almost extinguished. It is withered, like the leaves in autumn, by the frost of this chilling policy. The smooth, plump figure of health and plenty is wasting away to the mere skeleton of what it once was. How long will we continue to attribute our disease to something else than the true cause, and consequently fail to apply the proper remedy? Shall we look to favors from this Government, to compensate for the evils? What will all the promised or expected disbursements amount to in that quarter, compared with our burdens? Who is so stupid as to suppose that East Tennessee could get even two hundred thousand dollars a year expended in it, although an absolute gift of that sum would be far, very far, from equal to its share of the burden in sustaining this intolerable policy? But even an equal distribution of the treasury would not indemnify that country, which would continue to suffer more than an equal share of the injury.

It is only necessary to understand the facts, in order to know, with perfect certainty, what ought to be our policy. Instead of continuing, beyond the ordinary necessities of the Government, to raise money in order to scatter it again over the country, we ought to let it remain in the pockets of the people, and save them all the expense, and trouble, and difficulty of collecting and returning that, which, as a general rule, had better have remained where it started. Nor should the old adage be forgotten, that "a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush." The money might never return; much of it would be sure to stick by the way; and those who have, or can get any, had better keep it, than send it here under the hope of getting it back again at some future day. In the hands of individuals, it will generally be used to best advantage; but, if either the General or State Governments should have any extraordinary or special object to accomplish, enough will be always at command, when every man could rub together a few dollars in his pocket. Nearly every improvement, however, of public importance, and which would be worth the cost of making it, might be accomplished by individual enterprise and corporate companies. The wealthy would vest a portion of their capital in public works, and thus distribute their treasures among the poorer classes, when the Government had ceased to give direction to that capital, and, at the same time, freed the poor as well as the rich from unnecessary taxation.

Towards attaining these ends, the first great step is to pay the national debt as soon as possible. If that were done, every citizen would at once inquire, why the revenue might not be reduced one-half, and let the people keep in their own hands the amount which goes every year to that debt. To get the nation properly to this inquiry, is a matter of the very first importance; and, therefore, every dollar that can be spared, ought to be applied to the debt, and every unnecessary expenditure avoided. The work of reduction might then be completed, as it should be; but it ought to progress from the present time. It is not my purpose now to say on what articles, or how low, the duties ought to be reduced, but to indicate a principle to be extended as far as the various interests of the country will allow—as far as propriety will justify.

It is astonishing to hear gentlemen talking of our distributing money, as if we had the faculty of speaking it into existence, or obtaining it from some foreign country. If this Government really got its money any where else than from our own people, it might be a blessing to them, even to squander it in a general system of internal improvements. But it is the kindness of cruelty itself to wrest it from their hands, where it is worth, for example, six per cent. in order to spend it in projects, which can never yield to the Government and the community any advantages equal to three, or two, or even one per cent. I ask, emphatically, if the people would submit to it—if they would allow this Government to carry on a general system of internal improvements, if the money had to be raised from them by direct taxation? No, in that case there would not be on this floor even one advocate for the system. My honorable colleague [Mr. BLAIR] told us frankly and plainly that he would be far, very far, from thus taxing his people for any such purpose; and yet, direct taxation to the same amount with unrestricted commerce, would be preferable for all that portion of the Union, to the present mode of raising our revenue. If none would be found favorable to the system with direct taxes, are we, nevertheless, to be told, that these same people ought to be taxed to the same amount, and for the very same purpose, but in a different mode, which is more oppressive in some respects, notwithstanding the delusion by which it flatters us to the contrary? Do gentlemen intend to deceive their constituents? Or do they think the people incapable of examining this thing to the bottom? If they are, sir, it is vain to hope for preserving their liberties, as secured by our present forms of Government. We all see how fashionable it is becoming to look on State Governments with jealousy, if not contempt, while this Government is regarded as the exhaustless source of favors. The former raise their revenue by direct, the latter by indirect taxation. If the people will not understand and feel that indirect taxes are a burden, what is to restrain us from raising them to an indefinite extent, if for no other purpose than to squander them among those who regard themselves only as receivers, and not as payers? And what could then prevent this Government from extending its powers without limitation, and to the utter extinction of all State authorities? After what I have seen—what every citizen ought to know—tell me not of constitutional barriers—of cobwebs—as opposed to such an influence. Every day's experience confirms the awful truth, that our liberties depend on a correct understanding by the people of the principles of taxation by our respective Governments. And, if our political system shall ever fail, its ruin will be traced to this difference between direct and indirect taxation.

We are warned by every thing dear to man, against being deceived ourselves, or attempting to deceive others. We ought to rely on the intelligence of our constituents, and not practise on their supposed ignorance. They have placed honorable reliance on us, not merely to serve them faithfully here, but, also, to profit by our situation in obtaining information for them. While we respect their opinions, let us perform our twofold duty with becoming firmness and candor. Whatever may be our votes on the particular subject before us, let us tell our people the undeniable truth, that the contemplated system of internal improvements cannot be supported, except with their own money drawn from them in some way. Then, after they shall have reflected on it maturely, they will respond to us in the significant phrase of the sagacious Franklin, "it would, indeed, be paying too dear for the whistle."

Mr. NORTON said, that, representing as he did the district in which this great national road was contemplated to be commenced, and knowing that his constituents felt a deep interest in the passage of the law authorizing the construction of it, he was not at liberty to follow his own inclination by giving a silent though an affirmative vote.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [said Mr. N.] who reported this bill, having gone at length into the constitutional question—a question that never fails to arise whenever any project of internal improvement is pre-presented to this House; and having, in my opinion, shown, most conclusively, that no one provision of that constitution will be violated by the passage of this act, it would be obtrusive in me to say one word upon that subject; and that gentleman, as well as many others, having also clearly pointed out the advantages that would accrue to almost every section of this Union, both in a mercantile and commercial point of view, it would be trespassing upon the indulgence of this committee to compel them to listen to further argument upon that division of the subject.

But there is another branch of this imposing project that I must not pass over in silence; indeed, if I were to do so, I should be greatly wanting in courtesy to the honorable gentleman from Virginia, who opened the debate in opposition to this bill. I mean, that division of the argument which particularly relates to the military operations of this Government.

The honorable chairman of the Committee on Internal Improvements, in opening this debate, portrayed, in strong and persuasive language, not only the facilities that would be afforded for defence, but also the duty that this and every other Government owes to its citizens, or to its subjects, to render them efficient protection whenever dangers arise from abroad.

The answer to this, by the gentleman from Virginia, was, that heavy ordnance, and other munitions of war, would never be transported by land, while there was a safe, cheap, and expeditious communication by water; and that, by the enterprise of the citizens of the great and powerful State of New York, the General Government had been furnished with such a communication, from the seat of Government to the northwestern frontier.

And now I do assure this committee, that no part of the gentleman's argument, however eloquent and imposing, created in my mind the least alarm, except the one now under consideration; and I confess that there was a plausibility displayed by the contrast drawn between water and land carriages, that could not fail to catch the ear of every careless observer; and at this late hour in the debate, I should not have claimed the attention of the committee, had I not felt a full confidence that I should be able, in a very few words, to show the total fallacy of all the gentleman's reasoning upon that subject. And here let me assure the gentleman that I intend no disrespect to him, when I say that he seemed to have forgotten the latitude of the New York canal, and that it was actually blocked with ice almost one-half the year; and that, too, in the season when we should be most likely to be invaded from the North. Sad experience has taught us this lesson. Climate will have its influence upon the minds of gentlemen. And here the gentleman will excuse me for suggesting another difficulty, which, also, escaped his critical observation. It is well known to almost every gentleman in this House, that the Hudson and Erie canal, more than one-half of its distance, runs parallel with the Canada line, and in many places contiguous to it; and I do not hesitate to say, that, in one hour, with a spade or a hoe, I could make such breaches in its embankments, as could not be repaired in a whole campaign; and this may be done either by soldiers from the enemy's camp, or by traitors in our own.

There is one important fact to which I beg leave to call the attention of the committee, before I quit this branch of the subject. It is this: If we should be again involved in a war with Great Britain, and should determine to invade the Canadas, our preparations must be made in the winter season, when not only the canal, but all the water-courses in my section of the country are closed by ice. It is during this season that our troops must be enlisted, drilled, and marched to the frontier; that our provisions, camp equipage, military and hospital stores, ordnance, and ammunition must be collected, and placed in deposit, at or near the place of embarkation. And there is another fact, which I request the committee to bear in mind. In that northern region we generally have good sleighing three or four months in the year; and, when that is the case, all your supplies for an army, with the exception, perhaps, of very heavy ordnance, can be transported, upon a good road, cheaper and more rapidly than they can upon the canal, where it is navigable. And, again, says the gentleman from Georgia, suppose there should be an invasion of the western part of the State of New York, they would need no aid from us at the South, or from the seat of Government. They have the means at hand of repelling it, vested in the patriotism of a dense and hardy population. All this it suits my pride to admit, so far as it relates to defence. But suppose it should be determined in a grave council of war, here at Washington, that Canada must be invaded, and orders given to the general officer who happens to be in command on that frontier at that time, to call to his aid all the hardy sons of the North for the purpose of making the conquest, first of Upper, and then of Lower Canada; and suppose that this whole population does, in fact, obey this call, as they would be very likely to do, and all rally round the national standard at Lewistown, or at Buffalo, as the case may be. What then? Why, they would be first paraded, and then, according to custom, they would be formed into a hollow square; and, after having listened to an appropriate address from the commanding general, they would be marched to the banks of the river Niagara, and there they would be called upon to survey the proud conquest before them. But, while contemplating this mighty conquest, and their fancied laurels, with the banner in one hand and the constitution in the other, they are saluted from the other shore with the sound of the bugle and a shower of Congreve rockets, which unexpected and unwelcome salutation throws the camp into some confusion, and finally results in a conference between citizens and soldiers; at which conference they gravely determine that they are not bound by any law, nor called upon by any duty, to cross the line—that the constitution of the United States does not require the militia or volunteer citizens of the State of New York to seek foreign conquest—and that they have the same good right to avail themselves of the benign provisions of that constitution, and particularly when life is at stake, as the people of the middle or even the southern States have, when a turnpike road or canal is projected.

Now, for the sake of argument, we will suppose that this road is not essentially necessary to transport troops or munitions of war from the seat of Government to the southern or eastern frontiers. But may we not suppose a case, where it would be of vital importance to make rapid movements from the frontiers to the seat of Government? Is it not possible that even this proud city of Washington may want aid? The time has been, when a few thousands of these patriotic sons of the western part of the State of New York would have received a most hearty welcome in this hospitable city. Yes, I repeat, the time has been, when a portion of the hardy yeomanry of the North, and of the West, would have been hailed here as deliverers in warding the bayonets of the invading foe from the hearts of your citizens, extinguishing the torches of foreign invaders, and saving your country from the deep humiliation of surrendering its capitol to the pillage of the common enemy.

Much has been said about the expense of making this road, and many predictions have been indulged in, and many calculations made, varying from two and a half to fifty millions. The calculation of the committee is two and a half millions; and I have more confidence in that calculation than any other that I have heard. If that is correct, it falls greatly short of the value of the public buildings in this city, which I understand have cost more than five millions. But I do not mention the expenditures in this city in the spirit of retrenchment, but for the purpose of showing the vast importance of making early preparation to defend the public property, in case this city should be again assailed. If we differ in opinion about the propriety of making this road, we must agree in this, that we all have a deep stake even in this single monument of national grandeur; and that we have a much deeper one in guarding the national character against the effects of another farce at Bladensburg.

I now owe it to the committee, and to my own character, to say, that, in the description I have given of an army constituted of the volunteer citizens and of the militia of our country, I have intended nothing in the spirit of ridicule. I have taken the last war as my text, and the commentary is a literal history of what has happened. And it is what will always happen, when you rely upon such a soldiery, either for attack or defence; and the officer whose misfortune it is to be in command, whatever may be his merit, as a man or as a soldier, is certain to meet with discomfiture and disgrace.

Mr. MUHLENBERG, of Pennsylvania, rose to claim the indulgence of the committee for a few moments only, as he did not wish to enter into a lengthy discussion of a subject which had already been more than sufficiently discussed. He presumed every member of the committee, who had given it any attention whatever, must, by that time, have made up his mind upon the question; and he could not flatter himself that any thing he might say, for or against the measure, would change a single vote. He rose merely to express a regret at the vote he found himself obliged to give if he wished to satisfy his own conscience, and promote, in his view of things, the best interests of the whole people of the Union, as he considered himself a representative for the whole, and not for a part only.

Sir, [said Mr. M.] I must, when called upon, record my vote against the bill on your table. I regret this circumstance, because I shall thereby vote against a measure which my much esteemed friend and colleague, [Mr. HENRILL] the honorable chairman of the Committee on Internal Improvements, seems to have much at heart. He, no doubt, sincerely believes that it is a measure which will tend to the general welfare, and promote the good, not only of his native State, but of the Union at large; that it will further the interests of commerce, of agriculture, of manufactures, add to the comforts of the people in peace, and their security in time of war, as well on the southern as on the northern and northwestern frontier. A more amiable man, a more patriotic and disinterested legislator, may not be found on this floor. He may possibly be correct in his views, and I in error. It is, however, human nature to differ; but every honest man must be guided by his own convictions of right and wrong, of the expediency or inexpediency of any measure upon which he is called in duty to decide.

I regret [said Mr. M.] the vote I must give, because it is in opposition to the opinion of many, perhaps in opposition to the opinion of a large majority of my colleagues, who have more experience in legislative matters than myself, and for whose opinion, collectively and individually, I have the highest regard.

I regret it, because it is apparently against the immediate interest of a considerable portion of my native State, which I have the honor to represent, in part, on this floor, so far at least as the expenditure of a considerable sum out of the common fund, within the boundaries of that State, may be considered a benefit.

But [said Mr. M.] duty compels me to overcome these regrets. What I owe to the people and their welfare, calls upon me to lay aside all personal feelings, and vote against the bill under discussion; not, indeed, because I think a measure of this kind unconstitutional. No, I have no scruples on that head. If that were the only point in dispute, I could have no hesitation and no regrets in giving a vote on the question. It would afford me pleasure. I consider it a point long since settled—a point which, at this day, should not be called in question. If Congress have not the right to authorize internal improvements, for the purpose of regulating commerce and promoting the general welfare, to render the transportation of the mail more easy and rapid, to contribute to the comforts and happiness of the people in time of peace, and their security in time of war, it has no rights whatever; it might as well not exist—it might as well be expelled from this hall. I vote against the bill; not on constitutional principles therefore, but because I think its passage unnecessary and inexpedient, at this time at least.

The passage of the bill, I contend, is unnecessary. It is not necessary, as some gentlemen who have preceded have asserted, to establish a constitutional principle, the right of the General Government to make internal improvements. No, this question, as I have already said, has, in my humble opinion, been long since settled. Whatever this Congress may do, it will neither tend to settle or unsettle it. The express words of the constitution itself; the opinions of our ablest men on the bench; the opinions of all our Presidents, from him who was deservedly first in the hearts of the people, from Washington down to the present illustrious Chief; the opinion of the lamented Clinton, undoubtedly a statesman of the very first order; the opinions of a large majority of our State Legislatures—all have established it beyond a question, except with a few, who, although no doubt sincere in their opinions, and on that account ought to be respected, are yet too much in the habit of splitting hairs, both on the north and south side, to have much reliance placed on their judgment. Neither [said Mr. M.] does the passage of the bill appear to me necessary, as is further contended by some gentlemen who have been in advance of me, to promote the interests of commerce and agriculture, the transportation of the mail, the comfort of the people in peace, their security in time of war. No, I am far from admitting this. From this place to Buffalo, we have already more than one road, and probably as direct as any can be made. None certainly can be made better for less than three times the sum fixed as an average for the mile in the bill now before us. Indeed, we have, by taking a circuit of a few miles, an excellent turnpike for at least one-half the distance. We want, at present, in our section of the Union, no more roads for the accommodation of trade, or the transportation of the mail, or even for the comfort and convenience of the travellers; and as for the conveyance of troops and munitions of war, it is futile to speak about it. I have, to use the words of the venerable gentleman from Rhode Island, who sits on my left, [Mr. BROWN] “been utterly astonished and confounded” at the assertions of some gentlemen in this respect. How long could a mud road, costing only fifteen hundred dollars a mile, be used for such a purpose, in the spring and fall, if Government chose to use it, which I strongly suspect will never be the case? The situation of the South and West, I will admit, may be different. They may be more in want of roads than the northern section of the Union. I do not pretend to pass a positive opinion. But grant to the States, south and west of this, through which the road is proposed to be run, the sum to be expended under the bill, and the road will be infinitely better made, at much less cost, and in one-half the time. Indeed, admitting the road to be made, I know not what you are to transport upon it, either in peace or in war. Not only the cutting of innumerable roads, the opening of canals, the improvement of our rivers in every direction, the use of all-powerful steam, has, within a few years past, since the conclusion of the late war, upon which gentlemen have harped so much to show the necessity of this road, entirely changed the whole situation of our country as regards internal communications. Produce will no longer be conveyed by land for any distance. It will every where seek the watercourses, and they are every where near at hand. Troops and munitions of war, if they should hereafter be required at extreme points, will be moved upon these three times the distance in one-half the time that would be required upon land, where, with the best of roads, railroads excepted, the practical result of these, carried to a distance, has not yet been fully ascertained.

It would appear, then, [said Mr. M.] that the passage of the bill under consideration is unnecessary. And not only that; it appears to me extremely inexpedient at this time. Our first object (it strikes me at least in this light) should be to pay off the national debt, then to reduce—I will not say entirely take off—to reduce the duties on all articles which we can neither manufacture nor grow, or which no longer require protection, that the burdens of our people may be lightened, if not entirely taken away. And burdened they must be, in some instances, when our annual exports amount to little more than fifty millions of dollars, and the duties on the return cargoes to twenty-four millions. The district I have the honor to represent must pay an enormous tax upon the single article of salt—a tax amounting to not much less than thirty thousand dollars per annum. Can the agricultural interest—the interest which should be most cherished in our country—flourish under such circumstances? If we enter into the measure under discussion now, if we continue appropriating such enormous sums as we have heretofore done, both the one and the other, I mean the payment of the public debt and the reduction of unnecessary duties, will be materially retarded, perhaps never accomplished. This road will cost, not as is estimated in the bill, two and a half millions, it will cost fifteen or twenty millions before we are done with it. Are the people of this country forever to be taxed heavily for their tea, their toffee, their sugar, their salt, their spices, and other articles which have become necessities of life, that the sums thus taken from the sweat of their brow may be squandered upon the useless and worse than useless projects of wild theorists? I hope not. Let us be just before we are generous. Let us pay our debts. Let us reduce our duties where they are not necessary to aid and protect internal industry. This internal industry must be supported at all costs and at all hazards; upon it ultimately depends the salvation and permanent welfare of the country. Then let us divide, honestly and equally, our surplus revenue. Let this be used for the purposes of internal improvements by the States, and with one dollar we shall effect more, than in the mode now contemplated with three or four. We shall, by this course, at the same time, allay sectional jealousies. We shall promote concord and harmony in our great family, between our brethren of the North and the South, of the East and the West. We shall promote the interests of agriculture, undoubtedly the first of our country, the interests of commerce, of manufactures, the welfare of all our people in peace, and their security in war.

I will not [said Mr. M.] tax the indulgence of the committee any longer, and am grateful for the kind attention I have received. I repeat, it is with regret I shall vote against the bill under consideration, but vote against it I must, or vote against the convictions of my own mind, and what I deem the best interests of the country.

The question being then loudly called for from various parts of the House, it was put, being on the motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, (to destroy it,) and negatived: yeas, 75—nays, 77.

The blank for the per diem allowance to the commissioners was filled with four dollars.

The committee then took up, successively, the amendments offered by Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD, Mr. CARSON, and Mr. BARRINGER, to change the proposed route of the road, the last named gentleman being for the eastern, or metropolitan route—all of which were rejected by large majorities.

An amendment offered by Mr. McCOY, to give discretionary power to vary the route through Virginia, was also negatived—as was also Mr. RICHARDSON'S amendment to provide for a road from the lakes to Boston.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill to the House.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 14, 1830.

THE ARMY.

The House next resumed the consideration of the resolution introduced by the Military Committee, calling on the Secretary of War for a plan to reduce the number of officers in the army, without injury to the public service.

Mr. VANCE said, he thought if the House reflected on the principles on which the army was organized at its last reduction, it would come to the conclusion that that organization should not be disturbed. He then explained the principles on which it was then established—its necessary expansion over the country, and the necessity for the present proportion of officers. It had been said by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. DESHA] and from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE] that the present ratio of officers and men was as one to seven and a half. He did not know where these gentlemen procured their information, or from what data they reckoned. He had, himself, taken much pains to satisfy himself on this subject, and the result of his examination was, that there were now employed in the service only one commissioned officer to each eighteen and about a third of the men. He then gave a history of the service of officers, compiled from the last Army Register, stating the number employed in the several departments of the army, making a total of six hundred and twelve. From these he deducted seventy belonging to the Pay and Purchasing Department, leaving only five hundred and forty-two. He next deducted forty for those employed in the Engineer Department, leaving but five hundred and two officers in actual command. He went on to show the various duties assigned to some of these by the nature of their offices, as belonging to the Ordnance, Engineer, and Subsistence Departments, stationed at the Military Academy, on the recruiting service, &c., making one hundred and ninety-nine; and, when deducted from the aggregate, leaving only three hundred and three officers to be stationed at the several posts. He would ask what officers the gentleman would dispense with in the contemplated reduction? Would they take them from the Quartermaster's Department? It is but a few days since a bill was passed to increase the number in that branch; and it is now complained by the Quartermaster General that there are not now enough to perform its duties. Would they dispense with the services of those engaged in the Ordnance Department? By examination, it would be found that they had in their care more than twelve millions of dollars worth of property, and had charge of the disbursement of one million per annum; and he asked if these men were to be discharged, and inexperienced persons appointed to do the duties with which they had become familiar. He believed they would pause before they took such a step. Should they then be taken from the Engineer Department? Why, [said Mr. V.] we have lately increased their numbers by the addition of thirty officers; and if you proceed with the system of erecting fortifications, a much greater number will have to be added to the corps. He presumed the choice of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] would be, if any officers were to be dispensed with, to take them from the corps of topographical engineers, as he believed he had opposed all surveys that had been directed; but he doubted whether the people would consent to this; and the House had already taken measures for the increase of that corps. Mr. V. proceeded at some length to show the extent of essential fortifications now in progress, and said he had intended to say more, but indisposition prevented. He would, however, say a few words in reply to the observations of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE] on the subject of the West Point Academy, and the errors into which that gentleman had fallen in relation to it. It appeared that the chief objection he had to that institution was, that it shut out from appointment in the army all who were not educated there. He would ask, what had ever been the system pursued in the army? Did not all its officers advance by the regular line of promotion? He conceived, when those scholars entered the school, they became attached to the junior class of the officers of the army. If they proved to be qualified, and kept up with their classes, they were commissioned; if not, they retired to make room for others. The doors of the institution, he contended, were open to all classes, even to the poorest boy in the country.

Mr. V. remarked that his indisposition was such as to prevent his pursuing the subject further at present.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, he was opposed to the present organization of the army, and it never had been suited to the feelings of the House. It was fastened upon the House by the vote of the Senate. All the military experience of the House condemned its features; but they were compelled to accept of it at the time, as they were convinced that otherwise no reduction would be effected at that session. Mr. W. said, there appeared to be a contest between the gentlemen belonging to the Military Committee, on the subject of the proportion which the officers in the army bore to the men—one calculating it at one to seven, and another at one to twenty. In either case, he contended, the proportion of officers was too great—the army should be reorganized, and the number of officers reduced. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VANCE] had, in the course of his remarks, alluded to fifty posts to be garrisoned. He would have been obliged to that gentleman if he had, at the same time, named these posts. The House had on a former occasion received a report, stating that there were seventy posts, requiring twelve thousand men; but, on examination, the number of essential posts bore but a small comparison with the report. He did not believe that there was need of fifty posts in the United States—indeed, he knew of no none excepting those of the northwestern frontier, and the frontiers of Arkansas and Missouri. He could not admit the necessity of even these, for he had ever believed that keeping up an armed force in the vicinity was more likely to bring on Indian wars, than to prevent them. Such had been the experience of the country at all times, and in all cases; and he would not vote for keeping up a military force to provoke Indian hostilities.

In relation to the engineer corps, Mr. W. said, he could not see the propriety of so many surveys by the General Government. If the several States wanted these surveys made, they would doubtless see that they were performed. He said he believed, from the examinations which he had made several years ago, that three thousand men were amply sufficient for the army. He was convinced of this at that time, and he knew of no reason why more should be required now than were then. He thought the Military Academy at West Point should also be reduced. He had long been of the opinion that this institution should be placed on the peace establishment. He thought it should be confined to one hundred, and then it would not be so apt to prove a nursery for the education of those who were not designed for the army; indeed, its utter annihilation would be far preferable to its continuance in its present condition. He hoped the House would determine on its reduction.

Mr. DESHA rose, but the allotted hour had expired.

JUDGE PECK.

The SPEAKER presented to the House a letter from Judge Peck, accompanied by a written statement or argument, in explanation and defence of his official conduct in the case complained of by I. E. Lawless, communicated in pursuance of the permission given by the House some days ago.

Motions were made to commit the argument, and to print it, without reading, as it appeared to be a voluminous statement; but

The reading was demanded, first by Mr. WICKLIFFE, and withdrawn, then by Mr. DANIEL, and, after proceeding some time, by him withdrawn; next by Mr. WILDE, and the reading continued some time longer, and then withdrawn; then by Mr. STORRS, of New York; and, after the reading had progressed some time longer, (in all an hour and a half,) Mr. S. withdrew his motion, and the further reading was suspended.

The statement was then ordered to be committed to the Committee of the Whole to which was committed the report against Judge Peck; and

Mr. CLAY moved that it be printed, with one or two of the papers which accompanied and were referred to in it.

Mr. McDUFFIE moved to print, also, the memorial of Mr. Lawless, complaining of the conduct of the Judge.

Mr. STERIGERE moved to lay both motions on the table. Negatived.

Mr. DAVIS, of South Carolina, moved to except from the printing the papers accompanying the statement of Judge Peck, which was agreed to; and

The statement of the Judge, and the memorial of his accusers, were ordered to be printed.

BUFFALO AND NEW ORLEANS ROAD BILL.

The House then took up this bill, as reported by the Committee of the Whole yesterday; and, having concurred in filling the blank with four dollars, as the daily allowance to the commissioners,

Mr. SPEIGHT moved to lay the bill on the table, with the view not to take it up again.

Mr. WHITTLESEY demanded the yeas and nays on this question, and they were ordered; when

Mr. SPEIGHT, to accommodate his colleagues, who wished to renew their amendments, withdrew his motion.

Mr. CARSON then renewed the motion which he made in committee, to amend the bill, by striking out the part prescribing the route for the New Orleans road, and inserting a provision, directing the adoption of the "most direct, practicable" route.

Upon the amendment, Mr. CARSON offered some observations on the length to which the discussion upon the subject had already extended, and asked for the yeas and nays.

The call being sustained, they were ordered.

Mr. BLAIR, of Tennessee, said that he was aware that it would not now be in order to reply to what had been said by gentlemen in the opposition in the committee; but as his friend from North Carolina [Mr. CARSON] has now repeated, in part, what he had said in Committee of the Whole, he was gratified in having it in his power to correct that gentleman in a gross error into which he had fallen, as to the organization of the Committee on Internal Improvements, of which he was an humble member.

He has charged that the location of the road upon the western route was the result of combination in the committee, and has parcelled out to each member of that committee his portion of the local benefit to be derived from that combination. Sir, I cannot, I will not, believe that my worthy friend intended to impugn my motives in this matter, though such would be the irresistible conclusion, from reading his printed speech. I take this opportunity of informing my friend that I am the only member of the committee who voted in favor of reporting the bill, who was in the slightest degree interested in its location on the western route, or resided on or near to any part of that extended line. It is true that my colleague on the committee [Mr. CRAIG] represents a district in Virginia, which is intersected by the road, but it is due to that gentleman to say, that his determination to support the bill has been made since it came from the hands of the committee, and was reported without his support. No other member of the committee resides on or near to this road, or the branch contemplated from Zanesville to Florence; hence, if a combination of interested persons produced the location in the bill, I must have combined with myself, and with no one else.

To relieve the present committee from imputation, I can inform my friend from North Carolina, that this bill was reported by the Committee on Internal Improvements of the last Congress, as it now is, upon the western route. Will he look to the organization of that committee, and inform me who were the parties in interest then, and why and wherefore was it that that committee selected the western route? If I am not mistaken, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BUTMAN] is now the only member of that committee who voted for the road, who was of that committee last Congress. This bill had been reported by our predecessors, (not one of whom resided on that route,) giving preference to the western route; and my friend from North Carolina will believe me when I say that their having given preference to the route on which I resided was not likely to call forth any objection from me. Nor am I at liberty to suppose that the location of the road upon the route on which my friend resides, would have been calculated to give offence to him, were I to judge from the pertinacity with which he clings to his amendment for changing the route to his own district. I have felt it due to the committee and myself, as well as to that substantial friendship which has subsisted between the gentleman from North Carolina and myself, to make this statement and correction, believing that if I were to suffer myself to lie under the imputation to which his remarks would subject me, I would be in danger of forfeiting that good opinion which I am convinced he now entertains of me.

Mr. CARSON shortly rejoined, urging the advantages of taking the direct route, which it would be a truism to say was the nearest route. It would shorten the distance by fifty miles. The West, he observed, in the course of his argument, the West had received its full share, in the way of appropriation for their benefit, by the grants of public lands, for the purpose of improvement within the States, in that section of the amendment. To show the influence which had been brought to bear upon this matter, he might perhaps mention that it had been said by one of the members of the Pennsylvania delegation, that if Mr. CARSON did not vote for the bill, he [the person speaking] should not give his sanction to a bill, for the passing of which he [Mr. C.] was anxious. He also instanced a case in which a member from West Tennessee had used language of a similar import.

Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD thought the order in which the amendment should be proposed should be the same as had been followed in the committee. He therefore moved to strike out the word "western," in the fourteenth line of the bill, [respecting the location of the line of road] and insert "middle" route.

Mr. VINTON made a few remarks on the subject of himself and his constituents being entirely uninterested as to what course it might be decided by the House that the road should be run. He lived upon the banks of the Ohio, the great channel of intercourse between the East and the West, a circumstance which he felt it due to himself, and those whom he represented, to mention, with a view of showing that the vote he should give upon the question could not possibly result from any prospect, on his or their part, of reaping any advantages from the proposed road.

Mr. RAMSEY explained, in reply to Mr. CARSON. The observations alluded to by his friend from North Carolina were merely jocular; they occurred in the course of a passing conversation between himself and a gentleman from Tennessee. He was exceedingly sorry that his estimable friend from North Carolina could, by any possibility, construe them otherwise.

Mr. CARSON said that they had not been mentioned to him as such. He was happy, however, to find that it was so, as, indeed, had just been stated to him by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. DE WITT moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, moved the previous question.

Mr. LETCHER, after a few observations, stated that his district did not approximate to the line which it was proposed to trace for the road in contemplation.

Mr. SCOTT hoped that the gentleman from New York [Mr. STORRS] would withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. STORRS declining to do so, the call for the previous question was sustained by a vote of yeas 117, nays not counted.

Mr. J. S. BARBOUR asked for the yeas and nays on the main question; but the motion was not adopted.

The main question, which was upon the engrossment of the bill for a third reading, was then ordered to be put.

Mr. BARRINGER, Mr. ISACKS, and Mr. DWIGHT simultaneously rose to ask for the yeas and nays upon this question. They were ordered.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR suggested that there were several members probably absent; and as he wished the question to be fully and fairly decided, he moved a call of the House; which was agreed to.

The roll was called, when it appeared that nine or ten members were absent, most of whom, it appeared from explanations given, were detained at their lodgings by indisposition.

The main question being put, was decided in the negative by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Noyes Barber, Baylor, John Blair, Boon, Brown, Burges, Butman, Cahoon, Clark, Coleman, Condict, Cooper, Coulter, Robert Craig, Crane, Crawford, Crockett, Creighton, Crowninshield, John Davis, Denny, Doddridge, Duncan, Edward Everett, H. The Army.

So the House decided against the third reading of the bill, and it was, of course, rejected.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, thinking [he said] that the House had done enough for glory for one day, moved that it now adjourn.

Mr. ISACKS demanded the yeas and nays on this question, which, being taken, were as follows:

For adjourning,	78
Against it,	111

After, on motion of Mr. VANCE,
The House adjourned.

THURSDAY, APRIL 15, 1830.

THE ARMY.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution directing the Secretary of War to report a reorganization of the army, with a view to the reduction of the number of officers.

Mr. DESHA said, he regretted very much that the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TAYLOR] and of the chairman of the committee, [Mr. DRAXTON] had made it necessary for him again to trouble the House with any remarks of his, but he was not willing that the vote should be taken without briefly replying. He would, however, promise the House that he would consume but little of their time upon this subject.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. TAYLOR] the other day, in order to satisfy this House that the army, as at present organized, is more suitable to both peace and war times, than any organization that can be given to it, had a report read at the Clerk's table, made by a former Secretary of War, upon a call of this House. The report goes upon the principle, that it is politic for this Government to keep on a peace establishment a number of officers sufficient to command fifteen thousand, instead of five thousand four or five hundred, the number fixed upon for the peace establishment. Now, [said Mr. D.] this is what I deny; and however high I may estimate the opinions of the Secretary of War, alluded to, I decidedly differ with him in the organization he would give to a peace establishment. He, with a great many others, thinks it necessary to keep an officer in the army a length of time, to prepare him for a state of war, and this with a view to have skillful officers to command. This is in accordance with the views of the gentleman from New York, over the way, [Mr. CAMBRELENG] who says, that, in the event of a war, we shall have nothing to do but fill the rank and file of the army, and we shall have experienced officers to command our forces. He says that privates can be had without difficulty, but that officers cannot. I will state to the House what I have stated on a former occasion. It is, that, from my experience, I do think, if an officer remain any length of time inactive, upon a peace establishment, that inactivity has a tendency to disqualify instead of qualifying him for active service in a state war; and that there is more difficulty in obtaining private soldiers than officers. I would ask the House, how it has happened that the expenditures of the army have been increasing for the last several years, if it be not owing to the nature of the present organization, and to the very great number of officers who have been breveted since the war, and received the additional pay which their brevet rank entitles them to. I will state that, if there is not some radical change made, this expense will continue to increase. In a few years the colonels will all be brigadier generals; the lieutenant colonels, colonels commandants; the majors, lieutenant colonels; captains, majors; and the lieutenants, captains by brevet; and all of these will, in every instance, when on detachment, receive the pay attached to such brevet commission. I am satisfied that the present regulation of brevetting an officer according to the length of his continuance in service, will make brevet rank too cheap, besides involving the nation in an unnecessary expense. I would only brevet an officer for distinguished service performed by him in a state of war—an arrangement which would stimulate him to the performance of daring and gallant acts.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. TAYLOR] in reply to some remarks I made a few days ago, said, that we are compelled to educate our sons at the West Point Academy, provided we intend them for the army. This I am aware of; and that is the very great objection I have to the institution, and it is the ground upon which I predicated my remarks the other day, when I stated I was opposed to all exclusive privileges. But the gentleman contended that it does not give exclusive privileges to any class of our citizens, for the institution is open to all. I would ask, how is this? If there were a vacancy from my district, and there were twenty applicants, could more than one be appointed? No, sir. Well, would not the balance be excluded in this case? Most certainly they would; and in making this selection of one, should I not be apt to select the one whose parents would be able to serve me the most effectually at home? This is reasonable.

The gentleman from New York asked if I, together with my political friends, who had the power in their hands, am disposed to break down all the institutions in the country. I will say, in reply to that gentleman, no; that I do not know the opinions of but few of the friends with whom I act upon this floor; but will say for myself, that I am ready at all times to lop off all useless expenditures of public money, or to put down any institution where the sons of the wealthy and influential are to be educated at the expense of the people. I have no doubt but the gentleman from New York understands the details of this West Point Academy much better than I do, as it is located in his State; and, moreover, I have understood that the gentleman has been so fortunate as to get his son admitted into the institution, notwithstanding he informs us that there never had been but one young man at the institution from his district, and he was in the senior class. I must confess I could not exactly see what bearing that remark of the gentleman had upon the subject, and must believe the gentleman intends it as a compliment to himself.

The gentleman took occasion to say further, in order, I suppose, to show that no abuses had been practised by appointing to that institution more than a fair proportion of the sons of members of Congress, that there never had been more than sixteen boys appointed who were the sons of members of Congress. I do not know how this is, but I heard a member of Congress say, he could count twelve, from Kentucky and Ohio, who are sons of men who are now, or who have been heretofore, members of Congress. But for the existence of this institution, which I so much deprecate, private institutions would spring up in the country, whence we should have an ample opportunity of preparing our sons to enter the army, at our own proper expense; and then let vacancies in the army be filled from the most worthy amongst the applicants who present themselves.

My friend, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. DRAXTON] says, that the Military Academy is the bulwark of our defence, and that all our Presidents have been in favor of it. Now, in answer to this, I deny that the nation will have to rely upon those educated at this institution, which has been so highly spoken of, for the defence of the country in the event of war, or upon your regular army. No, sir. I consider the militia the bulwark of the nation; and, in the event of another war, we shall have to place our reliance upon them for defence. It is true that some of our Presidents have recommended this institution to the fostering care of Government; but I will state that it was not contemplated, when this institution was first established, that it should be more than a school of practice for a few officers of the army. But what has it grown to be? Two hundred and sixty or two hundred and seventy young men, preparing, by receiving a military education, to fill vacancies in the army, when half the number would be sufficient. Another objection which I have to the institution, is, that when a young man is educated at some thousands of dollars expense to the Government, he is permitted to return home, without rendering to the Government any services in return. Yes, sir, three-fourths of the number of young men who go there, do not intend, when they graduate, to remain in the army; but to return home, and adopt some other profession. It is very convenient for a man to have his son educated at public expense, and then put him to the study of law, medicine, or some other of the liberal professions. I therefore would say, that when a young man enters the institution, he ought to be bound, when he has received his education at the public expense, to render the country some services as a remuneration.

The chairman of the committee also denies that any preference is given, in the appointments to that institution, to the wealthy and influential classes. Sir, that gentleman certainly has not examined the report laid on our tables a few days ago, or he would not hazard the assertion. If he will examine the appointments that have been made to the institution, he will find the number from the indigent but small, when compared with those from the wealthy and influential. I do not care what the Secretary of War professes, when he says the object is to appoint poor boys, if they are qualified, when I see the practice is at variance with the profession. I can point my finger to a number of boys who are there at this time, whose parents are immensely wealthy. In order to satisfy gentlemen that the adoption of the resolution cannot operate injuriously, I will read it.

Now, sir, the resolution does not require of the Secretary of War to propose such an organization as will possibly destroy the efficiency of the army, but such a one as will dispense with the services of a portion of its officers without injury to the public service. The expenditures for the army, it will be found, have rapidly increased for the last several years. The sum of four hundred thousand dollars annually is expended now more than was some years ago, and it will be found that the present peace establishment costs the Government as much as when the army consisted of one hundred thousand strong. These facts ought to satisfy the House that something ought to be done in the case.

The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, in his remarks, stated that it required much time to learn the art of war. I admit, sir, that it does in time of peace; but I am satisfied that our officers will, when in a state of war, learn as much in six months as in that number of years during peace. The chairman also informed this House that the defeats which our army sustained at the commencement of the last war were attributed to the want of skilful and experienced officers. In reply to this remark, allow me to say that the gentleman is certainly advised of one fact, which is, that the army was officered at the commencement of the last war from men who had seen service. In saying this, I mean the officers of high rank, superannuated old men, and to this circumstance I attributed the many defeats of the last war. The gentleman says, General Washington was in favor of a standing army in time of peace, and that the present Chief Magistrate, likewise, is in favor of a standing army. It is true, sir, that the present Chief Magistrate does not recommend a reduction, nor does he an increase of the army; from which I imagine the gentleman from South Carolina has come to the conclusion that the President is in favor of a standing army in time of peace. If I do not mistake, the President of the United States, in his message to this House, says something about the reliance we may place on the militia for the defence of the country in the event of war. My friend from South Carolina says, besides, that General Brown, too, was in favor of a standing army in time of peace. I have no doubt of it, sir; this I conceive to be natural enough; and you will not hear an officer in the army say that the number of officers ought to be reduced. My friends certainly would not expect it, for it is not reasonable to expect an officer in the army, more especially the general in command, to say that his command ought to be reduced.

My friend [Mr. DRAYTON] said that I was in error when I stated what the proportion of the officers were to privates, and, instead of seven and a half or eight privates to each commissioned officer, there are twenty. Now, I stated, distinctly, there was one commissioned officer receiving pay for every seven and a half or eight privates; and one for every nine or ten, to count the non-commissioned officers and musicians. I did not say this was the proportion between the officers doing duty in the line, and the privates; but I here assert, without the fear of contradiction, that, to calculate the whole number of officers in commission, who are attached to the army, and in the receipt of pay, I am right in my calculation. My friend went into a long calculation to show that we had not officers enough to command the military posts, and that I ought to have made a deduction in my calculation of the number of officers on furlough, sick, courts martial, and on the recruiting service, and then I should be satisfied myself that we have not a sufficient number to command five thousand eight hundred men; and further, that in one or two instances companies had to be commanded by the graduates from West Point. To obviate that difficulty, I would suggest to the Secretary of War to order the officers, wherever they may be, to appear in their uniform. If this were to be done, it would be very easy to account for the scarcity of officers on duty. Yes, sir, you would find a number in this place, during the sessions of Congress, who, if kept on duty, as they ought to be, would prevent your hearing of such a circumstance as that of graduates from West Point commanding entire companies.

The gentleman says that, from the calculation he has made, the proportion of officers now are not greater than when a company consisted of one hundred rank and file, and the regiment of one thousand. In this it appears to me that he is greatly mistaken; and I beg to suggest to him, when he makes his calculation of the absentees, that in war times, when the army had a different organization from the existing one, officers frequently had to be on the recruiting service, were sick occasionally, were on courts martial, and even on furlough; and if it be right under one system of organization, it certainly must be so under another. But, sir, this is not all; the gentleman says, from the fact of the national debt being reduced, and the probability of a speedy payment of the whole debt, a necessity will be created of an increase of the army. I hope not, sir; I cannot, for my own part, possibly subscribe to such a doctrine. An army of six thousand not sufficient, in time of peace, to take care of about fifty little military posts on our frontier! I cannot, I say, see the necessity of such a measure. I am opposed, sir, to a large standing army in time of peace, and so have been the greatest statesmen in our country. The militia will have to defend this country in the event of a war, and the militia, where their services are available for such purpose, will not submit to be commanded by your regular officers. I will not follow my colleague through the war of our own revolution, in as much as I deem it inexpedient.

My friend, in his remarks, paid a very handsome compliment to the description and good order that existed in the regiment to which I was attached during the last war, and accounted for it by saying that the colonel of the regiment had been on the peace establishment before the war.

The Army.

[H. of R.]

It is true, the colonel of the regiment had been in the army before the war; but it is not true that the discipline and good order that prevailed in the twenty-fourth regiment, of which the gentleman speaks, is attributable to the skill and experience of its commander, or to the superiority of any of the superior officers of that regiment; but to two of its captains, who had never been in service before the war, but who were possessed of those natural powers, which, of themselves, render persons eminent as military men; I mean Holmes and Armstrong. I must do my friend, the chairman of the committee, the justice to say, that, notwithstanding he consented to the resolution reported by myself, he was not satisfied that a reduction of the number of officers in the army could be made, with propriety or facility. He stated, distinctly, that it was a subject of great importance, and one that he had not sufficiently examined to come to a conclusion upon. The gentleman now tells us that he has examined the subject, and is satisfied that, instead of too many officers, we have not enough; but that he will vote for the resolution. Now, sir, I have never contended, that, under the present organization of the army, there are many supernumerary officers; but, under a different organization, there would be a number whose services could be dispensed with, without injury to the public service, and would save an immense sum of money to the Government annually. The gentleman says the cadets at West Point are officers of the army from the time they are received into the institution. If so, I acknowledge I have been mistaken in my calculation; and instead of one commissioned officer for every seven or eight privates, there are one for every five.

Mr. D. said, in conclusion, he hoped the House would take the vote on the resolution; that the discussion had already consumed more time than he had anticipated, as the resolution he considered to be one of inquiry only.

Mr. TAYLOR rose in reply to Mr. DESHA, and expressed his hope that, before the House proceeded to act in reference to the resolution, they would hear the views and arguments presented at the time the army received its present organization by a distinguished citizen, then Secretary of War, and now Vice President of the United States. The report of that able officer would be found in the first volume of the Executive papers of the second session sixteenth Congress, number twenty-one. It consisted but of eight or ten pages, which every gentleman would find well worthy of perusal. He would at present request that the two last pages might be read from the Clerk's table. They contained, within a brief space, better views, and expressed in a more luminous and impressive manner, than any which he had to offer.

"No position connected with the organization of the peace establishment is susceptible of being more rigidly proved, than that the proportion of its officers to the rank and file ought to be greater than in a war establishment. It results immediately from a position, the truth of which cannot be fairly doubted, and which I have attempted to illustrate in the preliminary remarks, that the leading object of a regular army in time of peace ought to be, to enable the country to meet with honor and safety, particularly at the commencement of war, the dangers incident to that state; to effect this object as far as practicable, the peace organization ought, as has been shown, to be such, that, in passing to a state of war, there should be nothing either to new model, or to create; and that the difference between that and the war organization ought to be simply in the greater magnitude of the latter. The application of this principle has governed in that portion of the formation of the proposed military establishment now under consideration. The companies, both of the artillery and infantry, are proposed to be reduced to their minimum peace formation, the former to consist of sixty-four privates and non-commissioned officers, and the latter of thirty-seven, which will give to the aggregate of both corps thus formed six thousand three hundred and sixteen non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates. Without adding an additional officer, or a single company, they may be augmented, should a just precaution, growing out of our foreign relations, render it necessary, to eleven thousand five hundred and fifty-eight; and, pending hostilities, by adding two hundred and eighty-eight officers, the two corps on the maximum of the war formation may be raised to the respectable force of four thousand five hundred and forty-five of the artillery, and fourteen thousand four hundred and ninety of the infantry, making, in the aggregate, nineteen thousand and thirty-five officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, (see table E.) The war organization, thus raised on the basis of the peace establishment, will bring into effective operation the whole of the experience and skill of the latter, which, with attention, would, in a short period, be communicated to the new recruits, and the officers recently appointed, so as to constitute a well disciplined force. Should the organization of full companies, on the contrary, be adopted for the peace establishment, this process could be carried to a very limited extent. Six thousand men so organized can be augmented on the full war establishment only to nine thousand one hundred and fifteen, by doubling the battalions, (see table E.) Any additional force, beyond that, must be obtained by adding new regiments and battalions, with all of the disadvantages of experience in the officers and men, without the means of immediate instruction. This was the fatal error at the commencement of the late war, which cost the country so much treasure and blood. The peace establishment, which preceded it, was very imperfectly organized, and did not admit of the necessary augmentation; nor did the Government avail itself of even its limited capacity in that respect. The forces raised were organized into new corps, in which, consequently, every branch of military duty was to be learned by the officers as well as men. But, with all of these disadvantages, the experience and discipline of the old establishment was of immense use, and has not been duly appreciated. The officers belonging to it gradually diffused their military knowledge through the army, and contributed much to the brilliant results of the campaign of 1814. For the truth of this assertion, I might with confidence appeal to those officers who then acquired so much glory for themselves and their country.

"Another reason remains to be urged, why, in the peace establishment, the number of officers ought to be great compared with the actual force. At the commencement of war, an adequate number of experienced officers is of greater importance than that of disciplined troops, even were it possible to have the latter without the former; for it is not difficult to form in a short time well disciplined troops by experienced officers, but the reverse is impossible. The qualifications of the officers are essentially superior to those of the soldiers, and are more difficult to be acquired. The progress of military science has not added much to the difficulty of performing the duty of the soldier, or of training him, but it has greatly to that of the officer. No Government can, in the present improved state of the military science, neglect with impunity to instruct a sufficient number of its citizens in a science indispensable to its independence and safety, and to perfect which instruction, it is necessary that some portion of them (the number to be regulated by the resources of the country, and its relation with other Governments) should make arms their profession.

"Table F exhibits the estimate of the saving which will be made by the proposed organization.

"I have thus presented an organization which I deem the most effective, and which, in the future exigencies of the country, may be of the utmost importance. A different one, requiring for the present an expenditure something less than that proposed, might, in some respects, be more agreeable at this moment; but believing that nothing in our situation or in our relation with other powers, however pacific at this time, can give a certain assurance of uninterrupted peace, a state which may exist in the imagination of the poet, but which no nation has yet had the good fortune to enjoy, I have deemed it my duty to present that organization which will most effectually protect the country against the calamities and dangers of any future contest in which it may be our misfortune to be involved.

"Economy is certainly a very high political virtue, intimately connected with the power and the public virtue of the community. In military operations, which, under the best management, are so expensive, it is of the utmost importance; but, by no propriety of language can that arrangement be called economical, which, in order that our military establishment in peace should be rather less expensive, would, regardless of the purposes for which it ought to be maintained, render it unfit to meet the dangers incident to a state of war."

Mr. TAYLOR resumed. Let it be remembered [said he] that this was the language addressed to the House in 1821, a period in which the condition of the country called for retrenchment quite as much, if not more than it did at present. The nation, in that very year, had been compelled to borrow five millions to meet its current expenses. I, too, [said Mr. T.] am in favor of retrenchment; and when the necessity of the country shall call for it, I shall ever be prepared to reduce the public expenditure, wherever it can with safety be reduced. But I am not for destroying: I am not for pulling down and laying waste what we have built up at so much labor and expense. To retrench useless expenses is one thing; to cut up the best defences of the country, and wantonly destroy them, is another. Retrenchment was called for when this report was made and adopted, more than it is now. There is nothing in the condition of the country at present, which requires us to reduce its establishment yet further than in 1821, nor can it be done without essential injury to the service. A remark was yesterday made by a gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAMS] in reference to the Military Academy at West Point. If I understood him right, that gentleman said that the institution ought not to contain more than one hundred cadets: that that number would be sufficient to meet all the wants of the army, and to provide as many officers as could be needed for the existing establishment. Sir, can the gentleman have forgotten the report which was presented to us last session on this very point? The report of the Secretary of War (which will be found in the second volume of Executive papers, second session twentieth Congress, number 41,) states that the number of cadets graduated from that academy within eight years, was two hundred and eighty-seven; and a very singular fact was, that precisely the same number of vacancies had occurred in the army, so that the number supplied from that seminary was just sufficient to meet the actual wants of the service—the corps of engineers having required eleven appointments, the artillery one hundred and ten, and the infantry one hundred and sixty-six.

The respectable gentleman from Tennessee says that he will not consent to educate young men at the public expense, to make them officers of the army. Sir, he cannot help it. He must do it; he must educate them either as cadets, or as lieutenants. He has this choice, and this only. He must either educate them as cadets before they are commissioned in the army, or he must admit them ignorant, and educate them in the army as lieutenants: and which plan is the cheapest? To pay them as cadets, or to pay them as lieutenants? Which method is most for the economy of the army? Will he put the public property into the hands of men well disciplined and thoroughly instructed in every part of their duty, or will he commit it to ignorant and undisciplined men? The gentleman says, let their parents educate them, and not the public. Shall we listen to the gentleman, or shall we listen to the voice of experience, which has taught us an effectual lesson on this subject?

Sir, we have tried the gentleman's plan. We did formerly appoint those who had educated themselves, and we found that their education, however good, was not a military education, and did not fit them for the wants of the army. Nor is a military education to be obtained in any other way than at a military school. The gentleman has also expressed his regret that places in the army are given to the rich, and not to the poor; and yet he is for giving those places to such only as have been able to obtain a good education for themselves. Does not the gentleman see, and must not the House perceive, that the tendency of his plan must effectually exclude the poor? Should such a plan prevail, you must either put ignorance in commission, or confine your commissions to the sons of the rich. The gentleman's plan is a plan pointed directly against the poor, but the existing system throws open the military employments of the Government alike to poor and rich. Like the gentleman, I am not in favor of a privileged order, but I am equally opposed to making a privileged order of the poor as of the rich. The son of a rich man has as good right to be admitted to the service of his country as the son of a poor man—as good, and no better. But let us have no privileged order, either of rich or poor; and I insist that there is no plan which can be devised, that is so truly and perfectly republican in its principle as that of our Military Academy. How is it supplied with its students? Every congressional district in the United States is or may be there represented by one cadet. That is the principle of the institution. There may at some particular time be a slight departure from it, but that can be only because there have been no applications from particular districts. There never has been but one cadet educated at that institution from my district. He is now there, and in the senior class; and, when appointed, there was no other candidate for appointment belonging to the district. Can the gentleman devise a system better calculated to spread its benefits equally over every part of the United States? For my part, I can conceive of none which provides such an entire exclusion of every thing like an aristocratic principle. But, sir, if there be abuse, such as the gentleman apprehends, it is not for us to correct it—there is another and a higher power, which will do that effectually. I refer to the sovereign people at home, who have both it and us in their hands. If a member of this House gets a warrant for his son or other relation, when there are more worthy applicants within his district, doubt not that he will hear of it. The people who are the sovereign depositaries of power, will take good care to tell him of it, and that in a way that he will remember. We need not trouble ourselves on the subject. There is a far more powerful principle that will regulate that matter.

Sir, the gentleman's plan of an army, with a reduced number of officers, and with no major general, was before this House when it gave the army its present organization. A plan something like that did pass this House, and was taken up in the Senate; there it was met by the plan of the Secretary of War. That body compared the two, and after mature deliberation adopted his scheme in preference to ours. It was sent back to this House in the form of an amendment, and here it was long and gravely debated, and, notwithstanding the extreme pressure of the times, this House concurred in the judgment of the Senate, and finally adopted the Secretary's scheme. In 1815, when we were cheered with the news of peace, and were permitted to reduce the army, a question arose between the two Houses as to the number to be retained in service. This House passed the bill fixing the military peace establishment at six thousand men, with one major general. The Senate amended it, by raising the number to fifteen thousand, with two major generals. This House disagreed to the amendments. The Senate insisted. The House insisted on its disagreement, and asked a conference, which was agreed to by the Senate. The brave and patriotic gentleman from Kentucky, who sits near me, [Col. JOHN-SON] was a member of the committee of conference. That committee agreed on the number of ten thousand, with two major generals. Their report was confirmed by Congress, and the peace establishment was fixed accordingly. It continued thus until 1821, when it was reduced to six thousand, with one major general. If that number was only adequate then, it is certainly not too large now. With so great a number of posts, and an army dispersed in small detachments over so wide an extent of territory, it is indispensable that we should have a large number of officers. Let any gentleman deliberately weigh the reasoning of the Secretary's report, and he must, I think, become satisfied that an army on the present system is better adapted to the situation and wants of this country, than one either larger or smaller. I, for one, am prepared to be contented with whatever the House may finally conclude to do. It may, however, seem somewhat extraordinary that the gentleman from Kentucky, and his friends, should be endeavoring to put down the strength of the army, when they are in power, when I, who am considered as being opposed to the reigning administration, should be found endeavoring to sustain it; but it is with a view to the interests of the nation at large that I take the ground I at present occupy. In a matter of such moment, we should all consider ourselves as called to act for a great people—for this free and powerful nation; and not for any particular administration, which may happen this day to be in power, and may lose it to-morrow. The great sovereign predominating power is in the people themselves. It is their interests, and not those of any administration, that we are sent here to sustain; and we ought to provide, according to our best judgment, for their safety and happiness, without regard to any ephemeral fluctuation among those who may chance to be in the possession of political power. [Here the debate closed for this day.]

COLLECTION OF THE IMPOSTS, &c.

On motion of Mr. MALLARY, the several bills which by special order came up for consideration to-day, were postponed; and

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MANNING being called to the chair, and took up the bill reported by the Committee on Manufactures, "in alteration of the several acts laying duties on imports," [the more effectually to enforce the collection of the duties.]

Mr. MALLARY, chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, who reported the bill, rose to address the committee in explanation and support of the bill.

I will now, [said Mr. M.] with the permission of the committee, endeavor to assign as briefly as I can those views which have been entertained by the committee who reported the present bill. I am aware that the subject has an important relation to the policy of the country, but, as to the present bill, it does not involve any of the principles or questions which grow out of what has been denominated the tariff policy. Its one object and only purpose is to provide a remedy against an abuse of the laws of the country. I shall not disguise the fact, that the principal object of the bill is intended to enforce the tariff law of 1828: but there is no need, in discussing it, to enter into the policy of that law. It has passed. It has become a law of the land. It has received the sanction of this Government; and the question now is, shall it be carried into execution, or shall a law, thus solemnly and deliberately sanctioned, be suffered to be every day violated with impunity, when the Government which passed it is aware of the violation? This question each gentleman must settle in his own bosom. Because he happens to be opposed in sentiment to the policy of that act, ought he, as a good citizen, as a member of Congress, entrusted by the people with the solemn duties of legislation, to withhold his aid toward carrying the laws of the country into execution? I present this simple inquiry to every candid mind. The tariff of '28 was enacted for the protection of the domestic industry of the Union. Have not those for whose benefit it was passed, a right to come to this House, and ask and demand of us that the faith of the Government shall not be violated, nor its benefits lost, for want of our vigilance and care? Is it not derogatory to the honor of this Government, that it should pass an important law on which the people have relied, as it was their duty to rely, and then the law should be flagrantly violated, and that the people, disappointed and deceived, shall ask in vain that we will enforce our laws? I need not say that the faith of the Government, that its dignity and honor, all forbid such a disgraceful state of things. Would not the world declare it degrading for legislators to reply to such a demand, that all that they have solemnly done means nothing; that when they passed the law, they knew and intended that it should prove a delusion, that it should carry the appearance of doing something for the domestic industry of the country, while the real purpose of those who passed it was to confer no benefit, but to practise a delusion on our fellow-citizens? Sir, there is no man on the floor of this House would dare utter such language to the people of this Union. They would teach him a lesson that he will not readily forget. But we have not yet arrived at such a crisis, and I trust we never shall. I have said that the tariff law is grossly violated; and the interposition of this House is called for, to put a stop to its violation. I acknowledge that it is incumbent on those who make this assertion, to show that it is true. It is for them to prove before this House that its laws are evaded and violated, and that the evasion and violation can be prevented. I place the cause of this bill on that ground; and if I cannot make out such a case as will prove that this bill, or something like this bill, is called for by the state of the country, let it be rejected. On that issue, I am content that the question shall rest. But if I can and shall show that the law is violated, violated grossly, openly, and in the most shameful manner, then I appeal to gentlemen to say whether they can reconcile to their sense of duty, rendered doubly sacred by the high station they here occupy, to vote against a measure whose only object is to prevent the most alarming evils.

I have alleged that one of the most important laws of the country is violated. To prove this, it may be proper to show that both disposition and interest exist to do so, to show who they may be who have that interest and disposition. On this point I will make a few brief observations. They allude, chiefly, to other nations. In this, it is not my intention to examine minutely their domestic policy, but shall refer to views and feelings which exist among them in relation to the domestic policy of this country. If we look to France, we find her pursuing her own way—executing her own policy, undisturbed. She has taken a firm stand for herself, and remains unmoved by the flattery or menaces of any other nation. Her Government and people allow others to do the same. This may be also said of Holland, of Prussia, of Russia. These nations undertake to judge for themselves of the best means to promote their own interests. They are willing that all others should enjoy the same privilege. They are not engaged in harassing all the world with their doctrines of political economy. But can this be said of England?

All know the course that nation has pursued towards this country, and all other countries, for the last twenty years, when the encouragement of domestic manufactures was discovered. When the United States were her colonies, they furnished her with one of the best markets in the world for her various manufactures; after the war of the Revolution, our markets were again thrown open to her trade. This continued until our late restrictions on commerce, and war closed our markets against her. In the mean time, most of the great nations of Europe became determined to rely on their own resources, and sealed their markets against English manufactures. When our late war had terminated, the market of the United States became doubly interesting to England. Her people poured into this country their immense surplus of manufactured goods, which could find no other market in the world. She discovered that our people and the Government showed strong determination to give aid and encouragement to our domestic industry.

She was alarmed, and we were soon overwhelmed with her doctrines of free trade. Our policy is represented by Englishmen as absurd, old fashioned, and that it would be monstrous folly to continue it. It is denounced in every corner of England, and its violation and evasion openly recommended in every town and city in the kingdom. It seems as if all classes of her people considered they were doing God's service to render ineffectual the protecting laws of the United States, and prostrate all our manufacturing establishments. Under such circumstances, influenced by the most powerful considerations of her mighty interests, we can well comprehend the exertions her people would make to accomplish the ruin of the rival industry of this nation.

I shall now [said Mr. M.] proceed to examine some of the provisions of the existing revenue laws, under which the alleged frauds are perpetrated. They have been found, in practice, to be wholly ineffectual. By the fifteenth section of the act of 1823, "the collectors of the revenue shall cause at least one package out of every invoice, and one package at least out of every twenty packages of each invoice of goods, &c. which package or packages he shall have first designated on the invoice to be opened and examined; and if the same be found not to correspond with the invoice thereof, &c. a full inspection of all such goods, &c. as may be included in the same entry, shall be made; and in case such goods, &c. be subject to ad valorem duty, the same shall be appraised, and subjected to the penalties provided in the thirteenth section, in the case of suspected or fraudulent invoices," &c. I am sensible, sir, that this is a dry subject, and somewhat difficult to be understood by those who have not devoted to it their particular attention. I will endeavor to make myself understood as well as the occasion will permit. The collector designates one package of goods out of every invoice at least, and at least one package out of every twenty packages of each invoice. These selected packages are sent to the office of the appraisers, for them to examine and appraise, according to the provisions of the sixteenth section of the act of 1823. The collector, also, if fraud was suspected, might send all the goods to the appraisers contained in the same entry.

The appraisers are bound by law "diligently and faithfully to examine and inspect such goods, &c. as the collector may direct, and truly to report, to their best knowledge and belief, the true value thereof," &c. On their report the duties are computed.

By the thirteenth section, the penalty is prescribed in case goods are invoiced below their true value. It provides that "if the value, at which the same shall be so appraised, shall exceed, by twenty-five per centum, the invoice value thereof, then, in addition to the ten or twenty per centum, as the case may be, laid upon correct and regular invoices, according to law, there shall be added fifty per centum on the appraised value," &c. By the tariff of 1828, the difference between the invoice price and appraised value, in order to incur the penalty, was ten per cent. But this seems to have been as inoperative as the difference of twenty-five per cent. in the act of 1823.

It will be observed, and to this I would call the most steady attention of the committee, that on those goods which have not been appraised, no penalty is incurred, if the entry were ever so fraudulent, where the law ever so flagrantly violated. The committee are most respectfully requested to bear this in mind, as, by the practice at the most important custom-house in the United States, it will be shown that the penalty can never reach any goods except the package sent to the appraisers' office. Here arises one of the great causes of complaint. It would be inferred from the law itself, that the collector retained the custody of all the goods contained in the entry until the appraisement was made. But this proves to be a mistake. Neither the collector nor any officer has the control of any except the package which has been sent to the appraisers. The penalty reaches these, and these alone. This will be more fully explained before I close my remarks.

I will now proceed to explain the proceedings at the custom-house in New York. The information I possess is derived from the highest sources of respectability, and on which I feel confident the fullest reliance may be placed. Indeed, it may be substantially obtained from numerous American merchants engaged in our European trade. That our laws are evaded, and the manner by which it is done, are well understood by a vast proportion of the business men of New York. It is a common remark—it is in the mouth of almost every one in that city. But being in possession of full, ample, and accurate information, I will present such as the time and occasion may require for a full understanding of the subject. It will not be required of me to give a history of a vessel from a foreign port, from the time she is first boarded by an officer of the customs, until the goods imported in her are sent into the market. I will give all that is necessary to a full understanding of the subject. After the bond is given in an estimated amount of duties, an order is made to send the designated packages to the appraisers' office, which is done; a permit is then granted for all the goods not ordered for appraisement. Before the appraisement is made, and before any fraud can, consequently, be detected, if any exists, I am well informed that most or all of the goods contained in the entry and invoice, except those in the public store, are sold, and distributed in the shops throughout the city, or sent in various directions out of the city, and, of course, out of the control of the collector. It should also be observed that a large amount of goods is imported into New York on account of houses in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Boston, Albany, &c., and these are frequently taken directly from the vessel in which they were imported, in vessels destined for those respective places. So far have delays taken place in presenting invoices to the appraisers to have sample packages examined, that instances have occurred of their being left for eight or nine months in the public store before the appraisers were called upon to make the examination. It is also to be observed that the appraisers make no examination until the invoice is presented to them, and that the final adjustment of duties cannot be made until they report to the collector the result of such examination.

To illustrate this subject still further, I will present still further evidence, which I will read from the paper before me. It is derived from a source on which, I assure the committee, the fullest reliance may be placed. It is contained in answers to questions proposed, in order to obtain full and precise information. "If, on examining the sample packages, the goods be found invoiced below their value, can the collector order the other eighteen packages to be sent to the public store, they having been bonded under the permit?"

This requires a word of explanation. The present collector, for a time, sent two packages out of twenty to the appraisers for examination. He was determined to execute the law. He had reason to believe that frauds were perpetrated, and he wished to use all reasonable means to prevent them. He therefore sent two packages out of twenty, instead of one, as had been the practice before. But from the clamor of the importers, and under the advice of the Secretary of the Treasury, he had to return to the old practice.

[Mr. CAMBRELENG here interposed, and inquired on what authority the evidence alluded to by Mr. MALLARY rested.]

Mr. MALLARY replied that the authority was of the most unquestionable respectability.

Mr. DRAYTON made a question of order. The gentleman from Vermont was about to read a document to the House, of the most important character. When the authority is demanded on which it rests; the gentleman pledges himself that it is good and respectable. I do not doubt that such is his opinion, but I have a right to doubt the act; and I inquire of the Chair whether any member of this committee has not a right to demand on what authority a paper rests, which is used for the purpose of having an influence on the action of this committee?

The CHAIRMAN decided that a member, while addressing the committee, might read in his place any paper containing respectful language, and could not be required to give up the authority on which it was founded. It was for the committee to judge of the value of what is disclosed.

Well, [said Mr. M.] if the coast is clear, I will proceed. I stated that the authority on which the evidence is founded, gentlemen might be assured, was of the highest character. The subject was one to which I have paid the strictest attention, and, for the present, my representations, it is presumed, may be sufficient. Now, sir, the answer to the question to which I referred some time ago, will be given:

Answer. They cannot; for the goods are not under his control, and no provision has been made by law for him, in such case, to enter the warehouse of the merchant, and take away the goods to be appraised.

Q. May not the eighteen packages, as soon as they are landed, be sent by the consignee to auction, and sold?

A. They not only may be, but frequently are, put on board of packets or steamboats direct from the ship, and forwarded to the purchaser, owner, or ultimate consignee.

Q. What remedy has the Government other than by adding the penalty of fifty per cent., and that, too, though the goods are invoiced at one-fourth of their value?

A. The Government has no remedy—none even that which you seem to suppose it to have; for the fifty per cent. cannot be added until the goods are examined, appraised, and declared to have been invoiced below their true value.

This answer has reference to the acts of Congress to which I referred in the former part of my remarks.

Q. Does not each package of woollens usually contain goods of different qualities and value, often varying in the invoice price from fifty cents to two dollars and fifty cents or more, in the square yard?

A. They do. Of late, whole packages are frequently invoiced, all at one price per yard.

On this, [said Mr. M.] he would give a brief explanation as to the effects. By including in the same invoice different qualities of cloths, and then making an average of the price, the whole package is brought, for instance, under the dollar minimum, and charged with duty as having cost a dollar the square yard. The effect is obvious. By placing in a package a few pieces—five or six, costing not more than fifty-five or sixty cents the square yard, the same package may be completed with goods which cost above one dollar the square yard, and legally chargeable with duty as having cost two dollars and fifty cents, whereas the whole package is charged with duty as having cost one dollar the square yard. The result is, that goods costing fifty-five or sixty cents, and legally chargeable with duty as having cost a dollar, are employed to bring down under the dollar minimum goods that should be charged as having cost two dollars and fifty cents. The evasion is so plain, that further comment is totally unnecessary.

Q. What evidence does the sample package afford of the quality and actual value of the other packages included in the invoice?

A. None at all; nor does it afford any evidence of the quantity beyond this—that if a man is found honest in one transaction, it is a fair presumption of his integrity in others.

Q. Is there good ground to believe that invoices are made out in fraud of law, by some agent of the owner in New York, without the direction or knowledge of the owner himself?

A. No doubt but that fraudulent invoices are made out in New York; they have been detected by the appearance of the writing, paper, &c. Latterly it has become more difficult to detect those cases from the appearance of the invoice, as the paper is sent out with the caption either engraved or written in Europe.

The committee [said Mr. M.] can at once see the operation of the existing laws, which I have presented, both on revenue and manufactures. One package in twenty sent to the office of the appraisers, the officers of the Government have no control over the remainder, but they are scattered to the four winds. They are beyond the reach of Government. The duty is therefore paid on the nineteen packages, according to the invoice price, let the entry be ever so fraudulent. If the appraisers should find that the sample package was invoiced at fifty per cent. below actual cost, that single package alone can be made subject to the penalty. It is clear that this might be wholly sacrificed, and the importer would still gain a profit. But, as I shall explain hereafter, that single package is in no danger, according to the practice of the appraisers. It has seldom or never happened that they have made an appraisal by which any penalty has been incurred. Such, sir, are the facilities which exist under our laws, for the commission of fraud and evasion. The door is as wide open as the warmest advocates of free trade could desire. It would be marvellous if they did not occasionally pass through it.

I shall now proceed to show that the facilities have been pointed out, have been well improved, and describe the means which have been employed. It cannot be expected that a full development of all the evasions can be made. Those concerned are not among the most ready to make disclosures. But I am in possession of some facts which most clearly show that fraud and evasion do exist, and how they are managed. The ship Silas Richards entered New York last spring. It was believed that many of the goods imported in that vessel, as in all others, would be found invoiced with a view to evade the legal duties. A rigid examination was desired and allowed, and suspicions were fully realized. I have before me a letter addressed to the collector of New York, signed by several of the most respectable merchants of that city, which will explain the result of that examination. The names will be given to any member of the committee who may desire to see them. I will read what may be material.

“NEW YORK, 9th July, 1829.

DEAR SIR: We were invited a few days since to examine, at the public store, a quantity of broadcloths, just imported in the ship Silas Richards, and which, we were informed, were invoiced at less than one dollar per square yard. After a careful examination of several bales of said goods, we are decidedly of the opinion, that, although a few pieces in each bale might possibly, under the present extreme depression of trade, have been bought in England at a dollar per square yard, yet that the principal part of them could not have cost less than one dollar twenty-five, to one dollar and fifty cents per square yard. We have been informed that these goods have been admitted to an entry with an addition of but nine per cent. to the invoice, and that this addition will bring but a few pieces of them over the minimum of a dollar per square yard. We are also informed, that, of the two appraisers called in to say what addition, if any, should be made to the invoice, one was an agent of the British manufacturers, who is constantly receiving and selling large quantities of cloth at auction, the other an auctioneer, both of whom have a strong interest in passing goods at the custom-house at less than their value. Now, sir, as we are constantly in the business, and have been for years past, of purchasing in England for cash, on our own account, or of receiving goods to sell on account of our friends, and feeling confident, as we do, that the goods referred to were invoiced at from twenty to fifty per cent. below their value, we cannot refrain from most respectfully inquiring if it be true that but nine per cent. has been added to the invoice, thereby screening the owner from the penalty which would have been incurred had ten per cent. been added, and still leave the consignee to pay a duty of but forty cents per square yard on the principal part of these goods. If it be so, our friends and we must abandon the business of importing cloths, for we are paying a duty of one dollar per square yard on the same quality of cloth, as a large proportion of the goods in question are, while the foreigner is sending them in and paying but forty cents per square yard. We deem it a duty we owe to our Government, as well as ourselves, most respectfully to protest against such a course of business; a course which has driven many, and will drive every honest man, out of the importing business, and by which Government is defrauded of the revenue.

SAMUEL SWARTWOUT, Esq.,

Collector, &c. New York."

I shall now proceed to give the committee a few instances, out of hundreds I possess, of evasions of our laws, and the manner by which they are accomplished. My authority is derived from most respectable merchants of New York. I shall not use their names on this occasion, in public debate. I see no necessity, at present, to make the designation; yet they will not be withheld, on the application of any gentleman of the committee who desires to see them. I shall read the printed statements which have been placed in my hands. The authenticity, I am confident, cannot be denied. My authority, as I have before stated, is ready to be disclosed.

"A dealer of this city purchased at auction a case of goods, which were sold entitled to debenture. Having made previous purchases of the same kind of goods at private sale, and being thus acquainted with the original cost at the place of manufacture, he could judge, with considerable accuracy, what amount of debenture they would yield to him on their shipment to a foreign port. After making the necessary entries at the custom-house, for the purpose of shipment, he was much surprised to find the amount of debenture so small; and, on a further examination, found that this was owing to the very low price at which the goods had been entered at the custom-house. It appeared strange to him that one foreign importer should be able to buy the same article in the same market thirty to thirty-five per cent. cheaper than another, both having received the same kind of goods by the same vessel. To test the matter, however, as to the actual cost of the goods in question, a pattern was cut from several of the pieces, specifying the number and length, the vessel by which they had been received, &c. &c. These patterns were sent to Europe, to the place where the goods were made and purchased, and very particular directions were given to ascertain the actual cost paid by the agent of the importer. The information returned was of the most positive and unquestionable character. It stated, among several particulars of minor consideration, the time when the goods were bought, by whom, and of whom they were bought, and the exact net price paid for them. The result was (as anticipated by judges) that they actually cost the importer twenty-five to thirty per cent. more than he had paid duty on at the custom-house."

"A merchant of this city happened to go into the store of an importer, who does the bulk of his business by auction, and, seeing a package of desirable goods, inquired the price of it. The invoice was exhibited, through a mistake of the importer. It happened to be that by which the goods had been entered at the custom-house, and by which they had paid the duty. It was at least thirty-five per cent. less than many other importers paid for the same description of goods at the same time. As a proof of this, and to try whether the cost exhibited was fictitious, the dealer offered to the importer twenty-five per cent. profit on the cost exhibited. This was refused, with his assurance that at that rate he should lose money, which he could not afford to do. Had the custom-house invoice been the real cost, would he have refused this enormous profit? This act speaks for itself, and does not need further elucidation."

"It is a common custom, and one well understood by merchants, that many foreign importers, resident in this country, and who do nearly all their business by auction, are in the constant habit of receiving two invoices of each parcel of goods. One of these is made out at a very low rate, and is used to enter the goods. The other contains the actual cost. A foreign importer, by accident, sold a package of goods at a certain advance on the cost, and this cost unfortunately happened to be that by which they had been entered and the duties paid. Shortly after making the sale, he discovered that he had sold the goods at an advance on the fictitious cost, or, in other words, on the custom-house invoice. He therefore goes to the buyer, and informs him that he had made this mistake, and insists that he should make up the difference between the actual and false cost. The buyer, who had got a good bargain, and was much surprised at the novelty of this request, refused to allow any thing, and informed him that, if he persisted in this claim, he would go to the collector of the customs and expose him. The importer was prudent enough to pocket the affront, and went about his business."

"The foreign importers of woollen goods drive an enormous trade by means of auctions. Indeed, they scarcely sell any thing at private sale. When they do so, their invoices are never shown. In a confidential conversation (as regards names) with a man of integrity, dependant on a clerk's salary for support, I obtained some insight into the manner in which these woollen dealers manage their frauds. The common custom amongst this class of importers is, to enter goods on an invoice made out expressly for this purpose, and which is always much less than the actual cost. He assured me that he never made out a custom-house entry but from an invoice of this description, during the time that he had been so employed. These invoices he believes to be thirty-three and a third per cent. at least under the real cost at the place of manufacture."

"As a proof of this, and most conclusively proving that goods are entered at the custom-house on spurious invoices, the following fact is given:

"A piece of broadcloth, costing four to five shillings per yard, as entered at the custom-house, and paying a duty of thirty per cent. under the old tariff, would frequently be bought in at auction, on account of the importer and owner, at two dollars and a quarter to two dollars and a half per yard! Would not any person in his senses gladly sell at this price, if the piece of cloth did not actually cost him more than the price at which it had passed the custom-house, and on which the duty was paid? This fact does not need further explanation."

"Messrs. ———, merchants, in Pearl street, called on a commission merchant here to buy bombasins. He offered to sell them at cost and charges, which he supposed would be sixty-five per cent. advance on the sterling cost. The goods were shown, and the sterling invoice exhibited by the salesman. The merchants, seeing that the article was charged low, offered to buy three cases, at sixty per cent. advance. This offer was accepted, and the goods were to be delivered. The buyers asked and obtained the privilege of taking the balance of the invoice, (about nine cases,) if, on examination of the article at their own store, their impressions of the goods being low charged should be confirmed. About an hour after the purchase was made, the salesman waited on the buyers, to say that the goods could not be delivered, as he had made a mistake in selling them by the wrong invoice. The buyers replied that they would take the goods by the prices at which they had been entered at the custom-house; but the commission merchant refused this, saying that his instructions were to sell them at an advance upon the prices put down on what had the form of an invoice, but was called a 'statement' of twelve cases of bombasins, consigned to ———, &c. &c. in which the prices were charged one hundred per cent. above the invoice entered at the custom-house; that is, goods charged in the custom-house invoice at sixty shillings per piece, were put down in the invoice called a 'statement,' at one hundred and twenty shillings.

"When the purchasers remonstrated, upon his refusal to deliver the three cases already bought, he replied that it was ungenerous and unjust to desire a confirmation of a sale made by mistake; and, to convince them that the purchase would be a good one at the highest prices, stated that a retailer, who does the largest business in this city, and is presumed to be a good judge, had offered to buy one case at sixty per cent. advance on the 'statement' prices, but he wanted six months' credit, which was too long to be given on a single case."

I will state another case, for which I have the most unquestionable authority. An Englishman, who has resided in New York for a number of years, and was a very large receiver of woollen goods, principally cloths, all of which were sold at auction, had, some time last spring, a serious misunderstanding between himself and his chief clerk, which resulted in some disclosures being made by the clerk to the custom-house, and he fled to Canada.

In the second, third, and fourth quarters of the year 1829, there were imported into New York about five thousand dollars worth of woollens above the four dollars minimum. I have reason to believe that one person alone bought and sold a greater amount during the same time. Again, sir, I here exhibit samples of broadcloths, which (and I have the best authority for stating it) passed the custom-house in New York under the dollar minimum, and sold in the Boston market at five dollars the running yard, or three dollars and thirty-four cents the square yard. I leave every person to judge if such goods were fairly valued in the invoice, and paid the legal duty. Again: I shall now refer to more evidence. I offer it to show what is the impression that prevails amongst the most intelligent citizens of New York on this subject. I will read an extract from a paper placed in our hands, to which is attached a responsible name—Jeromus Johnson, formerly a member of this House. He, as the chairman of a most respectable and intelligent body of the citizens of New York, and by them sanctioned, made the following public declaration:

"The revenue is largely and systematically defrauded by means of the concealment afforded by auctions. The proofs of this alarming truth are so abundant, that it has long been a settled point among the intelligent merchants.

The Committee of Ways and Means, from the same conviction, have reported the present bill, which does not tax public sales, but only restores those responsibilities and usages which formed the common practice of importers in those prosperous times when smuggling was unknown—before auctions had destroyed regular trade. If these usages had never been interrupted, many millions would have been saved to the Treasury of the United States. Formerly, smuggling, like other great crimes, was of rare occurrence, and perpetrated under accidental temptations. Now, by means of auctions, it has become a system, matured in all its parts, with a mechanism as carefully adapted to its purposes, as in the most regular and lawful occupation.

"The officers of the customs in this city, whose experience has been on the largest scale, and who have devoted much attention to this subject, concur in the opinions and facts which we have now stated."

I shall remark on auctions hereafter.

I now appeal to every gentleman in the least acquainted with public opinion in New York. Is it not generally understood that our laws are evaded? Is it not the prevailing impression of the community that the revenue is defrauded—that the laws of the country are violated, and this in the most flagrant manner?

Again, sir: The President in his message clearly intimates that our revenue laws are evaded. I know that he is anxious that provision should be made to carry them into execution. From the Secretary of the Treasury we are informed that the laws are evaded, and that the attention of the Government is required. The collector of the port of New York, I know, is perfectly satisfied that continued violations of our laws take place. As a faithful, vigilant, indefatigable officer, he has no superior under the Government. He fearlessly executes the laws to the extent of his power. Give me such men, whatever political power controls the affairs of the nation. But his authority is deficient. He has not the means.

We have now seen how affairs are conducted at the custom-house, how invoices are made; let us notice what takes place in the appraisers' office. The office of appraiser was created by the act of 1818, for the purpose of aiding the collectors of the revenue in the prevention of frauds. The office was provided for by the act of 1823, and has continued to the present time. I have already stated the proportion of ad valorem goods sent by the collector to their charge, that is—one package out of every invoice at least, and, if more are contained in the invoice, at least one package in twenty. The appraisers, as has been stated, require the invoice to be produced before they decide on the value. I am informed by one of the appraisers, that the invoice is used as evidence of the value of the goods which it contains. It is well known that, in common practice, it is the only standard of valuation. Not more than seven or nine thousand dollars of woollen goods have been found by the appraisers undervalued in the invoice for the year past, although millions have passed through the custom-house. A part, if not all, of the undervaluations were discovered by an open examination of the goods imported in the ship Silas Richards, to which I have before referred. It may therefore be considered as the general practice of the appraisers to take the invoice value as the real value on which duties are to be assessed. I have already shown how invoices for the custom-house are prepared, and every one can judge how much credit should be given them. There is too much intelligence in this committee to require any further explanation. Under the existing state of things, what is the security for the revenue? What for the protection intended to be given to the domestic industry of the country? There is no check, no barrier, to the unprincipled adventurer. The door is thrown wide open. A mammoth might pass without touching his sides. It has already been decided by a large majority in the House, that Senators and members of Congress cannot be trusted to compute their own mileage—that we cannot trust the presiding officer of the House of Representatives with the appointment of a draughtsman. If so, what are we to think of a Liverpool invoice?

I will now call the attention of the committee to another important point. It is as to the number of the regular American importing merchants engaged in the woollen trade as their principal business. The story is a short one. It is the result of an anxious inquiry. Previous to the war, the woollen trade was almost exclusively in the hands of our own merchants. The number was about one hundred and sixty in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. Of the same class of importers, at this time, about twenty. As I am informed by a most intelligent merchant, there were in New York, at the period to which I have alluded, forty-three, whom he recollects; now only five. One of the appraisers recently informed me that there were, at least, six! Such is the mysterious change of trade in the great emporium. These remarks are in a great degree applicable to all American merchants engaged in other branches of European trade. If they have not yet suffered as much, they clearly see before them the secret, silent, fatal approach of annihilation. The strong arm of Government must be extended to their rescue.

Again, sir: What is the condition of the American merchant? No better illustration can be given, than what is contained in their repeated memorials to Congress. To one at least I will refer. It is signed by thousands of our fellow-citizens of New York. It now remains on the files of this House. It was presented in 1820, when the evils of which they complain were far less withering to commercial enterprise than at the present day. I will read the conclusion.

“Your memorialists will no longer detain your honorable bodies with a detail of the evils flowing from public sales—from which we can never be relieved, until our merchants share equally in our importations, until every trader is held accountable for the quality as well as the quantity of his goods, and integrity in dealing is properly rewarded by being considered a sufficient guaranty; that, under a sound, equal, and permanent system, your memorialists most sincerely believe that fabrics, from whatever source they may come, will be improved, corruption in trade will be diminished, the consumers throughout the land will, on an average, buy cheaper, the farmer will be better paid for his produce, bankruptcies will be less frequent, and our commercial character consequently restored.”

This is language common to all the memorials on the great and interesting subject of auctions. They all speak of corruption in trade, and suggest means to produce a restoration of commercial character. All know, when American trade was conducted by American merchants, their characters stood before the world untarnished by the suspicion of corruption. At home, and abroad, it commanded the most perfect confidence and respect. Prices were steady, profits uniform, deception unknown. In the present confusion of business, in the untiring efforts of foreigners to supplant our own merchants, and to drive them out of employment in our own country, it is not surprising that commercial character should have suffered in public estimation. The present state of trade must produce this effect, however pure may be individual integrity and honor. I am well aware that the alarming evils which exist, are supposed, by the mercantile community generally, to be produced by the auction system. I have no doubt but it has been one of the principal causes of ruin and desolation to a high and elevated class of our merchants. It keeps trade in perpetual change. It invites to the most ruinous speculation. It affords the most ready facilities for violating our revenue laws; and, above all, it tends to destroy all confidence in commercial reputation. But suppose that sales at auction are abolished, that honest and honorable merchants take their former station. Under the existing law, and the practice of the custom-house, what could they do? Could they measure consciences with the maker of a Liverpool invoice? Must they not yield to circumstances, or again be ruined? Something else must be done, or the foreign adventurer will command our trade. The subject of auctions is in able hands. It is a great cause—it is a good cause. I have no doubt but it will be well sustained by the honorable gentlemen who have it in charge.

Now, sir, we will consider how the woollen trade is carried on. With this subject all are familiar. In New York, as well as in most of our cities, woollen goods are generally sold on foreign account. As near as I can ascertain, four-fifths; many suppose nine-tenths. Part is consigned to American merchants; a great proportion is in the care of foreign agents. They come here to superintend the sale—have no interest in the country—take the place of the American merchant—many, it is said, live in garrets, make out invoices for the custom-house—publish essays on free trade—gather up the spoils and profits of business—abuse the Government, and—go home. After all, they are not so much to blame, if we continue to nod assent. But, under this state of things, we all see that our own merchants are compelled to perform a miserable part. They have to wait the motion of their masters at the auction room. They are active, intelligent, enterprising; why are they driven from trade? They cannot, will not, dare not, resort to means which those who reside abroad are ready and willing to use.

Now, sir, shall we suffer such a state of things as has and will continue, unless checked, to produce such consequences? Is it sound policy to allow transient, wandering foreigners to usurp that employment which belongs to the American merchant? Is it patriotic? Is it consistent with just national feelings to permit the great commercial interests of this country to be controlled by foreigners? When I allude to foreigners, I mean those whose home is abroad; whose allegiance still chains them to another country. In short, sir, I wish to see American merchants transacting American business. I hope to see the day when this will be accomplished; when our merchants will occupy their former standing in the estimation of this country and the world. We have of late heard much of the transcendent importance of navigation—of shipbuilding. I respect its value as much as any one should. But I had rather see all we receive from abroad introduced by foreign navigation, than see the internal trade of the country conducted by foreign agents. I had rather have for the country a good, substantial, upright, Pearl street merchant, than the best Liverpool packet that ever sailed. We can have both.

It is constantly alleged by many, that the evasions of our revenue laws are caused by the high protecting duties imposed by the tariffs of 1824 and 1828. To this subject I would call the attention of the committee. The charge is erroneous. Evasions of our revenue laws existed to a greater extent previous to the passage of those acts. Under the mild and moderate tariff of 1816—a tariff lower than has been proposed by the warmest opposer of the protecting system during the present session, the most flagrant evasions were known to exist. They cannot be better explained, than by a reference to the report of Mr. Crawford in 1818, while Secretary of the Treasury. He says, after alluding to the course of trade, “there is abundant reason to believe that it is customary, in importations of this nature, to send with the merchandise an invoice considerably below the actual cost, by which the entry is made and the duties secured. Another invoice, at or above the actual cost, is forwarded to a different person, with instructions to take and sell the goods by such invoice." This practice, as I have fully shown, still continues; and if it has increased, it arises only from improved skill and experience. Constant practice makes the trade more perfect. If the tariff of 1816 had remained unchanged, foreigners would have gained the advantages they now possess. We also see in all the memorials against auctions from commercial cities, as early as 1820, the most frightful frauds on the revenue are described. It makes little or no difference whether the duties are twenty or fifty per cent.; the same relative advantages exist in favor of the foreigner. That is, he dare verify an invoice in Liverpool, that an honest American merchant dare not do in New York. If the invoice is made out in this country by an agent, he can swear as to his belief of the cost abroad—the American merchant, who purchases, does know the actual cost, and honesty will require him to declare truly—if he does not possess honesty, danger will compel him. He is within the reach of our own laws, where perjury is sometimes noticed. But you cannot reach the person who swears falsely to an invoice in a foreign country. There he is perfectly safe. The truth is, sir, that the foreign valuation is the rotten part of our system. But so it is, and we must make the best of it.

Now, sir, I will allude to the effects which fraud and evasion must have had on the revenue. The amount of ad valorem goods imported into the port of New York, for each of the last ten years, at the invoice price, will not vary much from twenty-five millions of dollars; the whole amount, two hundred and fifty millions of dollars. The average rate of duty may be estimated at twenty-five per cent. The amount of duty for ten years would be sixty-two million five hundred thousand dollars. We have already seen how goods are valued in the invoice—the low price at which they pass the custom-house. The average cannot be more than two-thirds of the real cost or value in the foreign market. Goods which cost abroad three hundred and seventy-five millions of dollars, have been invoiced at one-third less than the cost. This would amount to the two hundred and fifty millions as I have stated, on which duties have been paid. Duties should have been paid on the three hundred and seventy-five millions of dollars, which would have produced ninety-three million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, instead of sixty-two million five hundred thousand dollars, a difference of thirty-one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. This in the port of New York alone. I am ready to admit, that if the laws had been fully enforced, the importation of many articles would have diminished, yet the treasury would have gained millions, and the domestic industry of the nation would have been secured. I will pass to another topic—smuggling.

When any charge is made that our laws are evaded through the custom-house, the cry of smuggling is raised from a certain quarter. If a foreign agent presents his well made invoice—good looking invoice—to the collector, and the collector has some doubts whether all is right, you might well suppose he would say, sir, can you think I would do any thing wrong? Will I cheat, sir? Smuggling, you may depend, sir, is carried on only on the northern frontier. There is the place to look for rogues; I am honest. Mischief is on the northern frontiers; that is the place. If he presents an invoice that would make the spirit of mischief blush, he declares that he is honest; smuggling is only found on the northern frontier. So his invoice passes. Newspapers opposed, all opposed to the protecting policy, testify that no evasions take place, except on the northern frontier; every where else, all perfectly honest! This is a capital way to escape.

Now, [said Mr. M.] I have taken much pains to learn the truth of this matter. I have resorted to every source of information; to the officers of the customs, to our merchants, to all who are best acquainted with the course of the Canada trade. The charge is wholly incorrect, that illicit trade in that quarter makes any impression on the revenue or market. There may be along the lines a little petty dealing, that would always exist whether duties were high or low. Efforts have been made on a large scale. They have been, and will be, unsuccessful. The reason is obvious. The great marts for the northern merchants are New York and Boston. When they go into market, they obtain a full assortment for the season. A few pieces of woollen goods is all that each merchant may want. There can be no motive for smuggling. It certainly can be no great object to the foreigner to smuggle cloths to a small extent. If to a large amount, of course he must send his goods to the seaboard market. His goods are exposed to the weather, to damage, to expense and seizure. Besides, in the country any movement out of the usual way is observed. Curiosity is excited. If mischief is on foot, it will be discovered. Again, sir, the people in that part of the Union are friendly to our domestic policy. The farmer and manufacturer are awake. Here is a great security. You might as well smuggle straw as broad-cloths. In great ports, like New York, where all is bustle and confusion, illicit trade is comparatively safe. You might smuggle a ship load there more easily than you could send a wagon load from Canada to the same place. After the passage of the tariff in 1828, in England smuggling was practised on a large scale across the lines. The attention of Government was called to that subject. Among other precautions, a confidential and most intelligent agent was appointed to observe the operations of trade on the northern frontier. From him, sir, I have a statement, which fully and amply sustains what I have mentioned before. He has ascertained that our exports to the Canada market, for the year 1829, amount to two million forty-four thousand dollars. That near two millions of this has been paid for in specie, or drafts, in favor of our exporters, on our seaboard cities, mostly on New York. If required, a full detail could be given. I well recollect, on a former occasion, the same charge was made. It was said on this floor that we exported annually about two millions to Canada, we paid duties on a small amount of importations, and smuggled the balance in returns. It so happened, that, when the charge was made, I had in my possession evidence that one house alone in New York had, annually, for three years, accepted and paid drafts to the amount of one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, the proceeds of the Canada trade. Then, I hope the fears of smugglers on the frontiers may be quieted, for the present at least.

I will now advert to another point. The people in the interior of the country have never been aware of the mischiefs that have been practised at the custom-house. The Government has not been fully apprised of them until lately. Darkness had enveloped them. Strong reasons exist. Let us look at them plainly. Twenty-five millions a year of ad valorem goods imported into New York; in the market, worth thirty-five to forty millions; three-fourths, perhaps nine-tenths, owned by foreigners, hostile, I repeat, to our policy, intent on gain, and using every exertion to save the last farthing. Here is a cordon around the custom-house. If any power on earth can overawe a department of the Government, here it is. You can see it, if you have the least knowledge of human nature. If its officers perform their duty, they are assailed; they are represented as harsh and tyrannical. I will give an instance. The present collector of New York—I wish all officers of the Government were as faithful—knowing that goods were dispersed in all directions before the appraisers had made their report on the sample package, required of the importer the following simple obligation:

"I, ———, do promise that all or any part of the merchandise mentioned in the annexed entry shall, at the request of the collector, be immediately delivered up for examination by the public appraisers."

The object of this was, to have imported goods, in some degree, under his control, in case fraud should be discovered in the sample package. This made such uproar that he was compelled to abandon it. This was too much for free trade to endure. Foreigners declared that the collector was unfit for the office, he gave such unnecessary trouble. Under existing laws and established practice, Liverpool has repealed our revenue laws in New York. Vigilant and honest officers cannot prevent it. They have not the force, the aid that is required. Government alone can afford a remedy. The bill under consideration is intended to accomplish a part at least. I hope something may be done. The interior of the country have a deep interest in this matter. The custom-house belongs to the nation. It belongs to Ohio, to Kentucky, as much as the city of New York. We have the power to correct abuses. Let it be used.

I will now proceed to consider the provisions of the bill before the committee. It is confined to woollens. The committee did not wish to propose any measures, except when required by clear and palpable necessity. One of the great objects of the tariff of 1828 was to protect the woollen manufacture. At the time, it was feared and believed by many that the dollar minimum would destroy all intended benefit. As it passed this House, the duty was specific. In the Senate, the duty was changed to ad valorem. Yet, by a most erroneous decision of Mr. Secretary Rush, the ad valorem principle was not allowed to apply. The ten per cent. in addition to invoice cost was disallowed, which most materially diminished the intended protection. This affected the fabrics composed of the raw material which is produced by our farmers in the greatest abundance. They have been made to suffer, even more than the manufacturer. All that is now asked, all that is humbly required, is to give really, honestly, in good faith, what the Government has promised, pledged itself to give. That is all.

The first section provides for having a copy of the invoice delivered to the collector. This is indispensable for the correct estimate of duties, as well as a guard against frauds. The value of this is admitted by the custom-house and Treasury Department.

The second section requires that woollen goods should be placed in the public store. The object is apparent. It is for the purpose of giving power to the officers of the Government to keep them safe until the legal duties are ascertained. Our revenue laws now require it, in my opinion. The practice is otherwise, as I have shown. There will be no difficulty; the delay trifling. It will operate equally; no advantage will be given in the market by any. The rights of the Government will be safe.

The third section provides for the examination of the goods by the appraisers. It requires that they should be marked with the evidence of the minimum class to which they belong, and on which duties should be paid. In this there will be no difficulty. Every cask of wine and spirits is examined and marked. Every chest and box of tea is examined, whether it contains five pounds, or two hundred. Every bar of iron is weighed; every bushel of salt measured. Every piece of cloth can as well be examined, valued, and marked. It can be done with the greatest expedition. It will be a great security to the honest merchant, and to purchasers. Each will be able to compare qualities and prices. Fraud will be exposed to public observation—the surest check. I will pass on as rapidly as possible; will give more explicit explanation when desired. As to measuring goods, no more is required, perhaps not as much as is required by the law of 1828. The next provision of importance is that which declares that the appraisement shall be made without the invoice. Their value, their correctness, I have described. If appraisers understand their duty, a fair valuation can be made without the invoice; if they do not, they should be discharged. If the duty cannot be performed, the office should be abolished. With skill, attention, integrity, the Government would be safe; without these qualifications, their employment would be useless.

The greatest objections I have heard urged against the bill have arisen from the penalties to be incurred in cases of appraisement above the invoice price. I do not think they are indispensable, and shall, at a proper time, submit a motion to strike them out. My desire is to remove all the objections that may exist, provided the main object is accomplished.

The fourth section contains but one alteration of the existing law, that I consider material. By the revenue laws now in force, when the importer, his agent, or consignee is dissatisfied with an appraisement, he may require a re-appraisement. In such cases he may "employ two respectable resident merchants," who, with the appraisers, shall re-examine and re-appraise the goods in question. The consequence is obvious. The importer will employ the person most favorable to his interest. Now, sir, the change proposed by the bill is, that the collector shall appoint the merchants to be associated with the appraisers in cases of re-appraisement. The collector is bound to do justice to all—to the Government as well as to individuals. He acts impartial. It is known, it is expected, that, when the importer employs persons to join the appraisers, he will select those the most partial to his interests. At any rate, he has the power to do so; human nature prompts it; it is not forbidden by the law or the doctrines of free trade.

The fifth section is but a consequence of the one preceding.

The sixth section provides penalties for counterfeiting and changing marks. If goods are marked, as is provided in the third section, this provision is necessary.

The seventh section is important. It provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall assign one of the appraisers, now appointed, to take charge of the goods deposited in the public store, according to the third section of this bill; and that the Secretary shall appoint assistants to the appraisers, for the purpose of securing a full and faithful execution of the laws. It is considered by all, it is well known, that more aid is required at the custom-house in New York. Considering the immense business done in that port, the appraising department is totally unable to perform the duties by law required to be performed. Further force must be allowed, or the laws, even as they at present exist, cannot be executed. The Secretary of the Treasury has earnestly recommended this in his report. The collector of New York considers it indispensably necessary. The Committee on Manufactures were fully convinced that further assistance should be given. Since the bill was reported, as an individual member, I have become satisfied a more efficient arrangement may be made, than that contained in the bill. It is, that the President of the United States, by the consent of the Senate, shall appoint an additional appraiser for the port of New York. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall distribute among the appraisers the classes of business to be by each performed. One can be assigned to the examination and appraisement of woollen goods; one to hardware and other articles; one to silks, linens; indeed, the distribution may be made in such way as that there may be a full superintendence over all ad valorem goods. This can be arranged as the occasion may require. Also, that the Secretary of the Treasury shall appoint such number of assistant appraisers as the public service may demand. It is my intention to submit, on a proper occasion, an amendment for this purpose. I am confident it is the better plan, and will better meet the views of the Treasury Department as contained in the report on this subject, and more effectually accomplish the object which all must desire.

I will now explain the ninth section of the bill. By the eleventh section of the act of 1823, a part owner residing in the United States may verify the invoice. Let his interest be ever so small, he possesses this right. It may be created for this purpose. The great object of the foreign resident is to pass his goods through the custom-house as low as possible. He sends his goods to a part owner, with such representations as to cost as he pleases, with a blank invoice. The part owner in this country very honestly swears to his belief of the value in the foreign market. That value may be as low as the standard of his conscience, very low, as low as will pass the custom-house. Very low. Now, if invoices are worth any thing—and it seems to be admitted that when made by foreigners they are not worth much—the buying partner should do the swearing, and not the selling partner. The buyer may be supposed to know the price better than the seller.

The remainder of the bill relates to the disposition of the penalties, and the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to provide regulations for the full execution of the act. They are the usual provisions in our revenue laws.

Now, sir, I hasten to a conclusion. I have stated that our revenue and protecting laws are evaded. I have given the evidence. The measure proposed contains no new principle. The object is to enforce what the Government has decreed. I am not tenacious of form. What the Government has promised, let it be fulfilled. If a better mode can be devised, it shall have my hearty concurrence. The question I propose is, shall the laws of the country be executed? Every gentleman of this committee will consult his own heart. Let it come home to his own bosom. Let his honest conscience give an answer.

TEA AND COFFEE.

When Mr. M. had concluded his speech, Mr. McDUFFIE moved that the committee lay by the above bill for the present, and proceed to the bill "to reduce the duties on tea and coffee;" which motion was agreed to, and the bill was taken up.

On motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, the bill was amended, by substituting a specific duty of two and a half cents a pound on coffee, instead of the ad valorem duty, and the period for the commencement of the reduction changed from June 30 to December 31, 1831.

On motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, the bill was further amended, by substituting a specific duty on the various teas, (amounting generally to about half of the present duty,) instead of an ad valorem duty, and the period for its operation made the same as that on coffee.

Mr. CONNER, of North Carolina, then moved to insert a clause to reduce the duty on salt to ten cents a bushel.

Mr. McDUFFIE beseeched his friend from North Carolina to withdraw this amendment. The merchants had been suffering for years for this bill; vessels were now coming in, and insolvencies must be the consequence of further delay. The amendment would bring up a tariff discussion, and, although as much opposed to that whole system as any one, he deprecated bringing up the question on this bill. He, therefore, begged the gentleman to withdraw it.

Mr. CONNER, not apprehending that his amendment would embarrass the bill, and deeming it a proper opportunity for trying the question, declined withdrawing his motion.

Mr. BARRINGER, of North Carolina, then moved so to amend the amendment of his colleague, as to make the reduction of the duty on salt gradual—first to be fifteen cents till December 31, 1832, and after that time ten cents.

The question being put on the propositions successively, they were both negatived by large majorities.

On the suggestion of Mr. GORHAM, and after some explanation from him, the bill was so modified as to apply to teas imported from "any place east of the Cape of Good Hope," instead of "from China" alone.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to amend the bill, so as to put coffee on the same footing, as to the privilege of being deposited in the public stores, as tea.

This motion brought on some discussion between the mover and Messrs. McDUFFIE and C. P. WHITE, in the course of which, the last named gentleman, in illustration of the subject, read the following statement:

Coffee imported in 1827	50,051,986 lbs.
Exported	21,697,789 lbs.
Consumed	28,354,197 lbs.
Coffee imported in 1828	55,194,697 lbs.
Exported	16,037,964 lbs.
Consumed	39,156,733 lbs.

The amendment was ultimately agreed to.

Mr. PEARCE made an unsuccessful motion to insert a clause, to allow, after a certain period, a drawback of nine cents a gallon on rum; when

The bill having been gone through, the committee rose, and reported the bills to the House.

RECONSIDERATION OF THE ROAD BILL.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, rose, and moved that the vote of yesterday, by which the Buffalo and New Orleans road bill was rejected, be reconsidered. Mr. S. stated that he did not make this motion because his opinion in regard to the bill had undergone any change, but he made it in compliance with the request of a gentleman who desired to revive the bill, not again to discuss or examine it, but merely to lay it on the table, with the declared intention of not calling it up again during the session. In courtesy to that gentleman, Mr. S. made the motion for reconsideration.

Mr. CAMBRELENG—Have not several bills just been reported to the House from the Committee of the Whole House?

The SPEAKER—There have.

Mr. CAMBRELENG—Is not their consideration now in order?

The SPEAKER—Certainly.

Mr. CAMBRELENG—Then, sir, is the motion to reconsider the vote of yesterday in order?

The SPEAKER—Perfectly in order.

Mr. BUCHANAN, understanding that the object was merely to get the bill laid on the table, and not to revive the discussion of it, would vote for the motion, not that he was friendly to the bill, and especially to authorizing such a road as was proposed by the bill. The decision of the House on this bill, he understood, was claimed as a victory by the opponents of internal improvements. It was not so. He himself was a friend of internal improvements, although he had voted against this bill; but he was in favor of encouraging them by distributing among the several States the surplus revenue. The bill had been rejected, because many members friendly to the principle of internal improvement thought the scheme wild and inexpedient. He repeated that he was willing, for the reason already stated, to vote for the reconsideration, although he was opposed to the passage of the bill.

Mr. POLK was opposed to the reconsideration. After the long discussion of the bill, and the decision of it by a full House, he had thought the matter would be allowed to rest. It was said by gentlemen that the decision of this bill involved only the question of expediency, and not the constitutional principle. He presumed that the decision resulted from the combined motives of inexpediency and unconstitutionality, and not from the simple objection of inexpediency. However that might be, as the subject had been solemnly disposed of, he hoped it would not be revived. If, however, the reconsideration was carried, he should be in favor of again taking a direct vote on the bill, and not laying it on the table; and, with that view, he moved a call of the House.

Mr. GORHAM demanded the yeas and nays on this motion; which being taken,

The motion of Mr. P. prevailed: yeas, 99; nays 81; and the call of the members proceeded for some time, when it was, on motion, suspended.

Mr. CARSON then rose, and said, he understood that this motion was made and had been supported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, expressly on the ground that the vote of yesterday was claimed as a victory by the opponents of internal improvements. I, for one, [said Mr. C.] do claim it as a victory. It was a victory that will redound to the lasting honor of this House and this nation. Yes, sir, it was a victory over a monster which has been lapping the life-blood of the South. Yesterday, sir, we harpooned the monster, and made his blood spout gloriously. It appears, however, that his last convulsive agonies have excited the sympathy of some gentlemen, and they are now willing to put him into the hands of political doctors, to have all his wounds healed, and his health, strength, and venom fully restored by next session. Sir, I hope the bill will not be laid on the table. Should it be reconsidered, as I know it will be, (for the arrangement is already made,) I am ready to meet the question again, and dare the friends of the bill to the contest; then let us see who will retreat from that gallant corps who faithfully united their hands, and bravely and successfully contended for the constitution. If the bill shall be reconsidered, and its friends then lay it on the table, we shall again claim the vote as a victory. When I see men flying off from our ranks and deserting to the other side, it does but increase my desire for the fight. Yes, sir, we will try it manfully, hilt to hilt. We have won the victory once—we have got the monster down—he is struggling and ready to expire, and I, for one, will keep my foot upon his neck, and hope to witness his expiring gasp.

Mr. SPENCER said, if the member from North Carolina meant to apply his remarks to him, he repelled them. He had not changed his opinion respecting the bill; but he held himself at liberty to do so if he saw fit. He had made the motion, not in consequence of any change of opinion, but from courtesy to the gentleman who requested it. He himself entertained powerful objections to the bill, but he had not thought proper to trouble the House with them. These, however, should not restrain him from performing a customary act of courtesy. He regretted that his motion had given rise to any angry feelings, but these should not induce him to retract it.

Mr. MERCER said, there was one peculiar reason which ought to prevail with the House to reconsider the vote of yesterday. A gentleman, who was very desirous of proposing an amendment to the bill, had, in his hearing, been assured, that, if he would not insist upon offering it then, he could have an opportunity of offering it when the bill came into the House. The call for the previous question had cut off all opportunity of amendment, and all further debate, so that the bill had never been submitted to the test of amendment, which might have put it in such a form as to obviate the objections of some of its opponents, and thus to have ensured its passage.

Mr. TUCKER said, he had been here thirteen years, but had never witnessed any thing like what he had heard on this bill, and he prayed God he might never see the like again. He would notice a remark of a gentleman from Tennessee, that, if they had had Tennessee boys here during the war, they would have saved the capitol. Mr. T. admitted that if one from Tennessee had been here, called "Old Hickory," he would have saved the capitol with one-half of the militia which was present. The militia who were here were brave enough, but they wanted some body to head them. As to the present motion, [said Mr. T.] he hoped, if the vote was reconsidered, that the question would be tried on the bill again, and not have it laid on the table.

Mr. CROCKETT remarked that he had always been in favor of the road, and had exerted himself to have it carried through his district, if the western route should be selected. He never had believed that the bill would pass, if at all, by a great majority. For his part, he had no opinion of this Government's giving away power to the States. Suppose the States should turn round, and say, you shall not make the road. He would vote to go through any gentleman's State with a road or a canal, that was for the good of the Union. He did not believe he should ever give up that doctrine.

[Some mutual explanations here took place between Messrs. CROCKETT and TUCKER, in reference to previous remarks.]

Mr. WILDE had regretted to see the House falling into a temper but little calculated to advance the public business. He hoped the subject would be considered calmly, and decided without passion. The motion, he observed, was supported on two grounds: First, that the rejection of the bill was claimed as a victory by those opposed to it on principle; and, secondly, as an act of courtesy to the gentleman who had the bill in charge. If the reconsideration were asked merely as an act of courtesy, [said Mr. W.] he would not refuse it. As to the other ground, he said the majority against the bill did not consist altogether of those affirming the principle that the Government has no constitutional right to construct roads; the majority was made up of all parties. But, [said Mr. W.] while it is conceded that the rejection of the bill is not claimed as a victory by those who oppose the power, will not the reconsideration be claimed as a victory for the party which affirms the power? At any rate, the effect of a reconsideration would be to place the bill again on the calendar, where it may be called up again, even during the present session; but if not at this, it will be ready for the next session, when a variety of considerations may have operated on gentlemen to give it increased strength.

Mr. J. S. BARBOUR said, it was not usual with him to consume the time of the House in debate, nor should he now trespass on its patience. I ask, however, [said Mr. B.] that it bear with me for a single moment, while I offer a word of explanation as to the vote I am about to give. My vote stands recorded against this bill in the Journal of yesterday, nor can I conceive any change as likely to occur in the condition of things, that will change that vote. But, respectable portions of those who sent me here, have expressed their wishes in favor of this road, and, whilst I cannot vote for the bill, it is an act of justice to others, as well as to myself, that I should lay their wishes before this House, as well as my own reasons for resisting the bill. I had hoped that this opportunity would have been afforded me yesterday, but I was excluded by the demand of the previous question, and the sense of this body sustaining that demand. In the hope that I may still be permitted to do so, I shall now vote to reconsider the question.

Mr. ANGEL said, as the people of New York felt so much on this subject, and had so large a stake in the question, he regretted that the motion for reconsideration had been made by his colleague, who, by his talents and character, standing at the head of the delegation, venerable for his years and respected for his wisdom, gave weight to his motion. His colleagues, therefore, thought hard of it. The object of those who desired the reconsideration was, by reviving the bill, and then letting it lie on the table for the remainder of the session, to make it appear that this Congress was favorable to internal improvements. He spoke for the people of New York, when he said they looked at this proposed road as an object that was to crush them with taxation.

Mr. MAGEE replied that his colleague was not the sole representative of New York, and could not so speak for the whole State. There were more than a million of the people of New York in favor of internal improvements, and his colleague must not assume the right to represent the whole State, while she had other representatives on this floor.

Mr. ANGEL disclaimed any such assumption. He meant nothing of the sort. He only spoke in reference to the effect of the bill, and the supposed feelings of the people on the subject.

Mr. BURGESS did not rise to make a speech on the motion, but merely to deprecate, not only the feeling evinced, but the style of the discussions on this floor. Was it come to this, that the motives of gentlemen were called in question, and the balances of interest struck for and against themselves, to establish those motives? Not only this, but an act of high and generous courtesy—an act of comity so fitting to the dignity of the representative office; this even was arraigned and opposed as unworthy. Sorry, indeed, [said Mr. B.] was he to witness such a course of procedure. The motion, he proceeded to remark, is opposed, because its success will be claimed as a victory by the friends of the bill, and mar the glory of the victory gained by one section of the country in its rejection. We acknowledge, [said Mr. B.] at least in form, that we are conquered; and we merely ask, when at the point of the sword, a little indulgence. This will not reverse the victory. Yes, sir; the victory. The rejection of a bill is termed a victory—as if we who are met here to consult on the common weal of our common country, were deadly enemies; and all the figures of ferocious war and bloodshed are brought in to illustrate the triumph; not the implements of ordinary battle, the sword and the pistol, but the harpoon is introduced, as if the measure which has been destroyed, was a monster and a curse, instead of an object of great public utility and beneficence. Sir, this evinces bad taste as well as bad feeling. And the triumph of the South is claimed in this decision. Have we lost, sir, any of the points of the compass? Over whom and what is this victory achieved? Is it the North or the West? Is it come to this, that we hear, on this floor, a victory claimed by one part of the Union over others? Sir, it is not true. The whole country is interested in this road—there is no part which would not feel its beneficial effects. Even Rhode Island, remote as she will be from it, will be benefited; for by this road the iron of Tennessee will be brought to the markets of New England. He hoped the motion to reconsider might prevail; that the bill might then be laid on the table until next session, and in the mean time be made a popular question, and, if the sense of the people be in favor of it, their names might be heard, and the bill become a law.

Mr. CARSON said, he wished to address to the House a few words of explanation; and in the first place, he would say to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SPENCER] that it had not been his intention to impugn that gentleman's motives in the slightest degree. He had neither affirmed that the gentleman had altered his constitutional opinions, nor that his vote for reconsideration would be evidence of his having done so. He was also perfectly aware that no change had taken place in the sentiments of the gentleman from Pennsylvania; but he had heard it suggested that morning, before the House met, that this motion was a political manœuvre, and that the bill was to be got up and laid on the table again, for political effect. He had, certainly, looked upon the vote of yesterday as a victory, and he had called it a victory of the South, because it had a bearing on a question in which the whole southern portion of the Union was not only deeply but vitally interested. He had not originated the word victory—it had been used by other gentlemen before he employed the term. He did hope that gentlemen would have been willing to concede something to the feelings and interests of the South; yet, after the decided vote of yesterday, they wanted the question reconsidered. He repeated the declaration, that he was prepared to meet it. He wished to see whether they could pass that bill or not. As to the figure he had happened to employ, and on which the gentleman from Rhode Island had seen fit to animadvert, it was, perhaps, useless for him to say to the House that he had been raised among the mountains, that he had never trodden academic hall or collegiate walks, nor had he studied tropes and figures of rhetoric. It might, perhaps, have been more appropriate if he had spoken of laying the monster low with a rifle. He was sorry that harpoon seemed so disagreeable to the gentleman from Rhode Island; and from the knowledge of that gentleman's literary acquirements, and especially of his taste for tropes and figures, of which he had given that House so many impressive proofs, he would, if he had had the opportunity, have consulted that gentleman, and taken his advice before he made his speech; but, as circumstances had not rendered this practicable, the figure was now past recall, and must go for what it was worth.

Mr. MARTIN, thinking the House might meet in better temper to-morrow for the decision of the question, moved an adjournment; but the motion was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. ELLSWORTH said that it would have given him pleasure to have obliged the friends of the bill, by voting yesterday in its favor, and he should have done so, if he had supposed that it involved the mere abstract principle of the power of the General Government to carry on a judicious system of internal improvements, of a national character. But, after all the attention he had been able to give to the subject, he had been fully impressed with the conviction that it was his duty to vote against the present plan, as unnecessary, inexpedient, and extravagant.

Mr. E. said he was a decided friend to national improvements, if they were of a judicious character. But he would ask, what single consideration had been brought forward to-day, to induce the House, after all the discussion which had led to the vote of yesterday, to revise its decision? He had been sorry to hear from the very honorable gentleman of Virginia, [Mr. P. P. BARBOUR] words which seemed to show that that gentleman harbored a feeling he must regret; and he was yet more sorry to hear the strain of remark which had been indulged in by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CARSON.] What was the reason which had been adduced in favor of reconsideration? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] had declared that he should vote for it, because the decision of yesterday was claimed as a triumph. Let gentlemen claim what they pleased, so long as the nation and the House had sense enough to perceive that the general principle of internal improvement was not involved, or compromised by the bill. He was sorry any gentleman should have claimed a victory on the abstract principle. He did not believe that the decision warranted any such claims. Was any new view of the subject now presented to him, which ought to induce him to reconsider a vote given yesterday, after much reflection, and under a solemn sense of duty? He had then voted according to the lights before him; and, having received no new light, he could not change his vote.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR rose, and said, he trusted the House would bear with him for a few moments. I should not have risen, [said Mr. B.] but for two or three allusions which have this morning been made, or which I understood to have been directed, to a remark which fell from me at the close of the debate yesterday. It would be difficult to express my surprise at the information which I received yesterday, for the first time, from the act of the House, and which has been further confirmed to me by several gentlemen this morning, in relation to the excitement produced by that remark. Sir, I have been fourteen or fifteen years a member of this House, and I think I may appeal to all who have served with me to say whether I have not consulted the decorum of debate to as great an extent as any gentleman who ever had a seat on this floor. During the whole course of the debate on this bill, in which I myself took a part, and in which I felt the deepest and strongest interest, I believe not one solitary word escaped me, at which criticism itself could take exception, as wanting in respect to the House. I have ever pursued one uniform course on this floor. When the final question was about to be taken on this bill, without any knowledge whatever on which side of the question there might be most gentlemen absent, I presented a motion for a call of the House, in order that the question might be fully and fairly taken; and when the decision was announced, I felt, I confess, highly gratified. I had scarcely ever in my life made a motion to adjourn, but it was then past three o'clock; and after the intense feeling and strong excitement which had prevailed, the House was left in a state of apathy which, in my judgment, unfitted it to commence upon another great subject which then came up; and, observing that enough had been done for glory for one day, I moved an adjournment. I had not the remotest conception of the imputation that would be attached to the remark. Nor could I so much as conceive that a mere incidental observation, made without a moment's thought, and in a good humored manner, would be urged now as a reason for reconsidering a great national question, which had been gravely decided after mature debate. I do not know if the gentleman from Pennsylvania alluded to me, when stating the reason which induced him to second the motion to reconsider: (I now perceive from the motion of his head, that he did not.)

Sir, when this House is called upon to reconsider a vote which has passed, it is to be presumed that the reconsideration is for some purpose; that it is to effect some object. But what is to be done in consequence of the reconsideration now asked for? It seems to be avowed, on all hands, that the bill is not to be acted upon at this session, but to be laid upon the table. Why, then, reconsider it? I can well understand a motive for those gentlemen who are in favor of the bill. They will, by this course, instead of a rejected measure, have it still open as an undecided question. But as to those gentlemen who voted against it, and who tell us that they shall again vote against it, I confess that I cannot perceive why they should go for a reconsideration. It cannot be a satisfactory reason, that one of the opponents of the bill claimed a victory. As far as that is referred to the remark used by me, I again disclaim all intention of manifesting any thing like offensive exultation, or saying any thing intended to be insulting to the feelings of the minority; nor could such an imputation have grown out of the remark which I made, either from the matter or the manner of it, had not the feelings of the House been too highly excited to allow it to judge with coolness on any thing that passed. I think that gentlemen, on reflection, will feel the justice of this remark.

Mr. MERCER, in reply to Mr. ELLSWORTH, observed, that he had understood that gentleman to say that the motion in favor of a reconsideration had not been supported by a single argument; and though Mr. M. confessed himself to be the last person in the House who ought to except to such a statement, because it was possible that the gentleman had considered what he had said as no argument at all, yet he must be pardoned for insisting that an argument, and one which he considered as convincing, had been urged. He would like to know why the bill had been committed to a Committee of the Whole; was it not for the purpose of amendment? Yet, when gentlemen were prepared with amendments to offer, it had been whispered to them by others in their neighborhood, "postpone your amendment, and you can offer it in the House." The previous question, in the mean while, had been called, by which all amendment was precluded. He would ask, therefore, as it respected this bill, how had the ends of legislation been attained? Did any one, for example, believe that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SHEPHERD] would have voted for the bill, if his amendment had prevailed? and might not the same be true of others? How easy would it be for the opponents of a bill to destroy any measure whatever, by refusing those amendments which would make it acceptable. The principle of the bill was not settled by the vote. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had said that his objection was founded on the fact that no consent of the States was required. Others were opposed to the bill, because it recommended the western instead of the eastern route. The bill might have been amended so as to leave the route open; and thus that objection would have been removed. If the bill should be taken up, and laid on the table, it would remain open to amendment at the next session, and all that had been done would not be lost. If this was not an argument for reconsideration, he did not know what argument meant.

Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD explained the reason for the vote he should give. If the amendment which he offered had been adopted, he would have voted for the bill; but he was not inclined, for the remote contingency of obtaining his amendment, to vote for the reconsideration.

Mr. ELLSWORTH would detain the House but one moment, while he replied to the gentleman from Virginia. That gentleman had said that Mr. E. had not duly weighed his arguments. He could assure that gentleman that it was not from any want of attention, for he always heard him with great delight; but the honorable gentleman would pardon him for considering the argument not entitled to so much weight as he seemed to suppose. When he said that no arguments had been advanced, he meant that none had been adduced, which, in his opinion, were likely to have weight with the House. The gentleman said there were amendments to the bill, which might render it more acceptable. He put it to the gentleman to say whether, if the vote to reconsider should prevail, it was intended that amendments should be offered. If the House had agreed to the previous question, it was an indication that they wished for no further light. He would ask the gentleman a question. If the House, after argument, had finally disposed of the question, ought it to be urged that the same question should be re-examined? He understood the House as having made up its mind; and as for the claim of victory, it moved him not a whit. If such a claim, on such a vote, gave gentlemen any pleasure, they were entirely welcome to enjoy it.

Mr. STERIGERE was willing to grant the reconsideration if the bill was not to be taken up again during the session; but, from what had fallen from the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MERCER] there seemed to be an intention to go into its consideration again this session. If so, he could not vote for the motion.

Mr. MERCER certainly believed that if the bill had taken a certain shape, it would have passed; but, as the bill would be taken up next session, where it is left at this, it would be sufficient now to reconsider, and lay it on the table. It was now too late to introduce the amendments which the bill required, and he should be in favor of letting it lie, and at the next session modifying it so as to leave to the President the selection of the route from Buffalo to New Orleans.

Mr. HEMPHILL concurred in the purpose of merely restoring the bill to the calendar, and letting it lie over until the next session. All he desired at present was this; he had no intention of pressing its consideration again during this session.

The question was then taken on the motion for reconsideration, and carried: yeas, 99—nays, 91.

Mr. PEARCE then rose, and said, that, as something had been done "for glory," though not as much as he could desire, he moved that the House now adjourn; but, at the request of several gentlemen round, withdrew the motion.

The vote of reconsideration having placed the bill again at its third reading, to cut off any other motion,

Mr. HUBBARD moved the previous question.

Mr. STEPHENS moved to adjourn.

Mr. LECOMPTE demanded the yeas and nays on the adjournment; which being taken, the motion was negatived: yeas, 45—nays, 134.

The call for the previous question was not seconded, the yeas being 82, the nays 93.

Mr. SUTHERLAND then having obtained the floor, moved to lay the bill on the table; which motion prevailed: yeas, 94—nays, 88; and then (at six o'clock) the House adjourned.

THE ARMY.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution proposing a reorganization of the army, with a view to a reduction of the number of officers.

Mr. TUCKER, of South Carolina, made a number of remarks adverse to the West Point Academy, disapproving of its administration, the mode of appointing cadets, &c.; to illustrate which, he referred to the document lately reported from the department on the subject of the academy; which document he had not got through reviewing, when the hour expired.

Adjourned to Monday.

DEATH OF ALEXANDER SMYTH.

The Journal of Friday having been read,

Mr. McCOY, of Virginia, rose, and announced to the House the decease, on Saturday last, of his colleague, [Mr. ALEXANDER SMYTH.] Mr. McC. said, the character of the deceased was too well known to need any eulogy from him, and he would content himself with offering the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of ALEXANDER SMYTH, deceased, late a member of this House from the State of Virginia.

The resolution was unanimously adopted, and Messrs. McCOY, ROANE, CLAIBORNE, ALEXANDER, TALIAFERRO, GORDON, and CRAIG were appointed the committee.

On motion of Mr. McCOY, it was also

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of this House will testify their respect for the memory of ALEXANDER SMYTH, by wearing crape on the left arm for the remainder of the present session.

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of this House will attend the funeral of the late ALEXANDER SMYTH, this day at twelve o'clock.

TEA AND COFFEE.

The House then took up the bill to reduce the duty on tea and coffee, with the amendment reported thereto to the Committee of the Whole.

The amendment respecting tea was concurred in.

The amendment fixing the duty on coffee, at two and a half cents a pound after the 31st December, 1831, coming up,

Mr. SEMMES, of Maryland, moved to amend the amendment, by striking out two and a half cents, and inserting one cent as the duty. This duty [said Mr. S.] was not necessary for revenue, as, under any modification of the tariff that was likely to take place, the revenue would be sufficient to pay off the national debt as fast as it became due; and as the article did not come in competition with any domestic product, the duty was not necessary for protection. Further, the article was no longer one of luxury, but had become one of general and necessary use, and he for these reasons hoped the duty would be reduced to one cent. at the time proposed, and ultimately abolished altogether.

Mr. BURGESS suggested the propriety of fixing the duty at two cents. This would be a very heavy reduction, and he thought would be sufficient for the present.

Mr. SEMMES said he would vary his motion, so as to strike out the two and a half cents, and leave the blank to be filled with two or one, as the House might decide.

Mr. INGERSOLL advocated the policy of gradual, not great and sudden reductions of duties. This was the reason why the Committee of Ways and Means reported in favor of two and a half cents, which was a reduction of one-half the present duty. This alone would probably take off a million of revenue, and, with the reduction on tea, would amount to a diminution of two millions of revenue. The best and safest policy, he argued, was a gradual reduction of duties. He feared the amendment, if pressed, would embarrass, perhaps defeat, the bill; and the agitation of the question so long before its passage had already ruined many merchants.

Mr. SEMMES had abstained from going fully into the merits of the question, when he offered his amendment, supposing that every one was ready to vote on the subject. As it was opposed, however, he would offer a few reasons, more at large, in favor of his amendment. He did so, and avowed that he had himself been in favor of a total abolition of the duty, for the reasons briefly stated above; but had yielded to the suggestions of some members who were practical merchants, and who thought the total removal of the duty might afford opportunity for frauds, &c., and he had accordingly agreed to keep on a duty of one cent. He was in favor of repealing the duty on all articles which do not come in competition with domestic productions.

The question on striking out two and a half was decided in the negative: yeas, 70—nays, 81.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, then moved to strike out the half cent, so as to leave the duty two cents.

This motion prevailed: yeas, 96.

Mr. SEMMES then moved to insert an amendment to reduce the duty to one cent at the expiration of a year after the duty of two cents should go into operation; and, for the first time, asked the yeas and nays. They were ordered; and

The amendment was agreed to by the following vote: yeas, 108—nays, 70.

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, next moved to insert a clause to reduce the duty on cocoa to one cent per pound. The present duty is two cents; and [said Mr. R.] there were last year imported five million three hundred and thirty-one thousand pounds. The common price is only five cents a pound, so that the duty was a high one in proportion, and the article entered largely into the consumption of the poorer classes. He would not argue the question, but hoped the amendment would prevail.

Mr. WAYNE, of Georgia, was in favor of the amendment, for one reason in particular; that as we import cocoa principally from the South American States, the reduction of the duty would tend to increase our commercial intercourse with those countries.

The amendment was agreed to without a division.

SALT.

Mr. CONNER, of North Carolina, now renewed the motion which he had made in Committee of the Whole, modified agreeably to the proposition then also made by his colleague [Mr. BARRINGER] to reduce the duty on imported salt, first to fifteen cents, and at a stipulated period thereafter to ten cents a bushel; and he demanded the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. BARRINGER spoke at considerable length, and with earnestness, in support of the amendment.

Mr. GORHAM was opposed to trying this often debated and long contested question of a diminution or abolition of the salt duty on this bill, which was of great importance, had been reported unanimously, and received the general assent of the House, and might be defeated if this amendment prevailed, or was again debated at large. He, therefore, for the first time in his life, moved the previous question; but withdrew it at the request of

Mr. McDUFFIE, who avowed his opposition to the salt duty as one of the most odious and oppressive features of the system by which the South was burdened; but, if the amendment were adopted, it would not only embarrass the bill, but possibly defeat it. He hoped, therefore, the motion would be withdrawn, and not force a resort to the previous question, especially as there was a bill to come up (which he named) on which the motion would be consistent and proper.

Mr. CONNER denied that the motion would embarrass or defeat the bill, because, if there was a majority for the amendment, the same majority would pass the bill. He, therefore, for this and other reasons which he stated, but could not be distinctly heard, insisted on the amendment.

Mr. McDUFFIE then moved the previous question, which was seconded by a majority of the House.

Mr. BARRINGER demanded the yeas and nays on the previous question; which were taken, and the main question was ordered: yeas, 107—nays, 75.

The main question was accordingly put, (on the engrossment of the bill,) and carried, and the bill ordered to a third reading.

ORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution calling on the Secretary of War to report a new organization of the army, with a view to a reduction of the number of officers.

Mr. TUCKER concluded his remarks. He began by saying he should not have troubled the House at this time, but for the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TAYLOR] and for the purpose of adding a few words to what had been said by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. DESHA.]

Mr. T. said, if he understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. TAYLOR] correctly, (and he believed he did, but, if he had not, he hoped the gentleman would correct him,) that gentleman said that the report of the Secretary of War was a valuable document, in as much as it proves, conclusively, that out of two thousand some odd hundreds of cadets, who had been admitted into the West Point Academy, there were only fifteen or sixteen who were sons of members of Congress; and it proved, also, that the reports against that institution were groundless. Mr. T. said, if this document proves such to be the fact, it proves that which is false. He did not charge the Secretary of War with stating any thing that he knew to be false; far from it; he believed that the Secretary had given all the information in relation to the subject that he could get; but he was of opinion this document proves that some of the officers of the institution had not done their duty: that is to say, they had not given the Secretary of War as much information in relation to this matter, as they ought to have done, or should have been able to do, at least. But [said he] there are some important facts contained in this report, which, in his judgment, made the document of great value. So, whilst the gentleman from New York [Mr. TAYLOR] believed this document valuable, to answer the purpose he seems to imagine, he [Mr. TUCKER] believed it to be valuable, to prove the reverse of what that gentleman seemed to believe. Mr. T. said, he would ask the gentleman from New York to say whether he did or did not believe that as many as one-third of the cadets who had been admitted into this institution were sons or near relations of the characters embraced in the resolution which called on the Secretary of War for this report; and if not one-third, then to say what proportion he does believe.

Mr. T. resumed his remarks, and said, if he had not understood the gentleman at first, in every particular, the gentleman's statement now is about the same in substance as he first understood it. But [said he] the gentleman from New York has been a member of Congress longer than he [Mr. T.] had, and he lived in the State where this institution is located, and ought to know more about it than he [Mr. T.] possibly could. Yet, he was bound to believe that the gentleman was grossly mistaken. Mr. T. proceeded to say, that he had made some inquiry in relation to this matter, and, so far as his inquiry extended, it was demonstrable that he could not be mistaken in his views of it. But [said he] the gentleman from New York [Mr. TAYLOR] said, this is not a matter for us to settle; that it is a subject for the people to settle; that they are the proper judges; and that, if there be any thing wrong in it, they will correct it. Mr. T. said that he did most heartily concur with the gentleman from New York, that the people are the proper judges, and that they are much safer and better judges of this matter than a few politicians who are individually interested in it; and what Mr. T. wanted, and what he believed every other gentleman opposed to this institution upon its present principle, and also opposed to the having more officers in the pay of the Government than is really necessary, want to be done, is, for the whole matter connected with this institution to be published, and for every thing in relation to it fairly and plainly presented to the people in its true colors, and for them to judge of it, and decide upon its propriety and justice. It is on the people [Mr. T. observed] that he depended for the correction of all such abuses as he believes this to be. Mr. T. said, in continuance, that although the report fell far short of giving a full and plain account of this matter, yet, in his judgment, it contained information enough to prove to the satisfaction of the people that this policy was unjust and dangerous in a republican Government; at least, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DESHA] said that the cadets were educated at the public expense; and what Mr. T. wished to add, was, that they are not only educated at the public expense, but that they are also paid sixteen dollars a month and two rations a day, for obtaining their education, making three hundred and thirty-eight dollars a year that each cadet receives from the Government, in addition to their being educated at the public expense. Some gentlemen [said he] try to do away this fact, by saying that this money goes to pay for their board, clothing, and the like; but they cannot change the fact, for they do get the money, [said he] or the same thing, as if it were paid to them in their own hands, and disposed of by them as they might think proper, in as much as this money goes to pay for those things which the cadets would otherwise have to pay for out of their own pockets, and which, in his judgment, they ought to do. Mr. T. said, when this institution was first established, the whole number of cadets and officers, all together, never was to exceed twenty at any one time, and the cadets were to be instructed in the sciences which appertain to the duties of engineers, and not officers to command our armies. And what is it now come to? [said he.] The principle is changed; they are not only to discharge the duties of engineers, but they are also to command our armies; and he believed that much more than one-half of the cadets who had been admitted into this institution, so soon as they acquired sufficient education to answer their purposes, left it, and engaged in such profession as would best promote their private interest; either the practice of law, or the practice of medicine, or some other of the liberal professions which they believed would best promote their own interest. Those young gentlemen might acquire all the education necessary for them to have, in their own States, and at their own expense, and for which the Government now pays, besides paying them for getting it. There is another objection that he [Mr. T.] had to this institution, and that is, [said he] those young gentlemen are selected by the Secretary of War, or rather by the President of the United States, who has the controlling power over it, and who can have but little or no opportunity to know any thing about the talents and qualifications of the applicants, only from such information as they can get from other sources, and which, he believed, was generally received from members of Congress; and, as to their choice, [said he] human nature teaches us whom they will select. Mr. T. believed this principle to be anti-republican.

[Here he took up the report of the Secretary of War, and quoted from it the number of cadets that had been admitted into the institution, and the number who had withdrawn or were dismissed from it, in each year, from its first establishment.]

He then resumed, and, in the course of his remarks, said, that he thought the gentleman from New York [Mr. TAYLOR] had no cause of complaint about the number of cadets received into the academy from his State; he discovered, on examining this report, that there were as many as forty admitted in one year from that State, and he believed, by examining this document throughout, that it would be found that New York had her full proportion at least. [Mr. TAYLOR here explained.] Mr. TUCKER said, he thanked the gentleman from New York to correct him whenever he found him wrong in his statements, as he did not wish to misrepresent any gentleman at any time. But [said he] the statement that the gentleman now makes, does not affect the view that he had of this matter. His principal object in examining this report, at this time, was to show the large proportion of the cadets who were educated at this institution, and who are paid by the Government to get their education, and who have left it at their pleasure, and engaged in such professional pursuits as they believed would promote their private interests.

But [said Mr. T.] I have another serious objection to this institution, on its present plan, at least. I am opposed to having a privileged order of men in our country. There is no man [said he] that, under the present system, is to be appointed in our armies, but those who are educated at the Military Academy. They are to be appointed to command, to the exclusion of all other persons. There are [said he] thousands of other men equally meritorious, equally as well qualified to command, as those young gentlemen who are educated at that institution. Mr. T. said that all the education which is essentially necessary to qualify men to command in time of the greatest peril and danger, can be attained by those who are disposed to get it in their own States, and at their own expense; and in that way, [said Mr. T.] we should have the most efficient and best officers. He said, all the education that young gentlemen can get at the Military Academy, more than is to be acquired by them elsewhere, at their own expense, will never give them additional bravery or stronger nerve. Mr. T. said, it is sound judgment, strong nerve, and inflexible courage, that constitute the essential qualifications for commanding officers. If we will only reflect on the history of our own country, [said Mr. T.] he thought no man could say, but what the most glorious victories that ever have been achieved in our country, and, he believed, in any country, had been gained under the command of officers who never had any military education. In our revolutionary struggle, when we were fighting for liberty, under all the embarrassments and disadvantages that a nation could be placed in, our liberty was gained, all the glorious victories were achieved, under the command of officers who never had any military education whatsoever; that he had heard of our officers and soldiers fighting bravely and conquering nobly; and will not the history of our last war show conclusively that all the most glorious victories were achieved under the command of officers who, likewise, never had any military education? We had one officer in command, he believed, through the whole of the war, high in command; and great confidence and reliance were placed on him, on account of his military qualifications, which he had acquired at the Military Academy in France. And what did he do? What victory was gained under his command? Not one [said he] that he had ever heard of, nor had he ever heard that that officer was in one single engagement during the whole war. The officer he alluded to, was General Izard. Mr. T. said, now compare the services of this officer with the services of the officer who commanded at New Orleans and elsewhere. He said, the commanding officer at New Orleans never had had a military education, and a more glorious victory never had been achieved in this or any other country, than that of New Orleans. There never had been more skill and bravery manifested by any officers and soldiers, than there was by the commanding officer, and the officers and soldiers under his command, at New Orleans; and where will you find an officer in our army, or any other, who has had a military education, and who has exhibited greater skill and bravery, than General Brown, and his officers and soldiers? He believed that there was not one officer under the command of General Brown, who had had a military education; if there were, he had never heard of it; and as for that officer himself, [said Mr. T.] he had been informed he had never received any military education, and but a very limited education of any kind.

Mr. T. said, in addition to all other objections that he had stated against the principles of this institution, he had another, not less objectionable than those that he had before mentioned; and that is, [said he] it is the main prop to this deceptive name called the American system. Indeed, [said he] it is a part of the system itself: it is a delightful name, it is true; and, so far as the name can have any influence, it is well calculated to delude the people, and blind their understanding; and he supposed that that was the reason why the leaders of this unconstitutional and oppressive policy (as he believed it to be) gave it the name of the American system. Mr. T. said, if gentlemen are disposed to keep up this institution, so as to have a certain class of young gentlemen educated, and also paid for getting their education, at the expense of the Government, and then return home, and engage in such professions as they believe will best promote their private interests; and, also, a further privileged order of men in our country, to command our armies in time of peace and war, with nearly an army of cadets, as officers in the pay of Government in time of peace; and, also, a corps of engineers, sufficient to survey all the paths, roads, rivers, creeks, and branches in the United States, as a means to deceive the people, to blind their understanding, and in this way get them to embrace this deceptive American system, with the vain and delusive idea that they are not only to have the public money distributed among them, but that all their watercourses are to be made navigable, their paths and highways made smooth and firm; that all their produce is to be sent to market, and every other facility afforded them that vain hope can imagine; and all this they can call national, because they say it will facilitate the transmission of the mail, or the transportation of our armies and munitions of war, or regulate commerce and the like; so that every thing [said Mr. T.] that can be called by the name national, is then to be national—all is to be constitutional; the will of a majority of Congress is to be the law of the land, without bounds or limitation. He said, that the engineers had made two or three surveys through South Carolina, on different routes, for the construction of this great national road to New Orleans; and he had been credibly informed that they held out the idea to the people on each route, that that was either the nearest or the best route, or some other remarks, so as to induce the people to believe that there was some prospect, at least, that the road might be made on that route; and he had no doubt but that it had been the case wherever surveys had been made, and would still continue to be the case.

In conclusion, Mr. T. said, that when he left this place next session, at furthest, it would be no more to return: he should then quit public business, and retire to private life: that Congress would not be troubled with any remarks or vote of his after that period, at furthest; but, [said Mr. T.] when I do verily believe from my soul, if this policy is not abandoned, but persisted in, that it will shortly end in the destruction of the liberty, peace, and happiness of the American people, that he could not, and would not, forbear to declare it as his most solemn opinion. [Here the debate closed for this day.]

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 21, 1830.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution calling on the Secretary of War to report a new organization of the army, embracing a reduction of the number of officers; when

Mr. DRAYTON spoke in continuation of his remarks of yesterday. His main object was to show that disciplined troops are greatly superior to undisciplined soldiers. He continued until the expiration of the hour.

JUDGE PECK.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MARTIN in the chair.

Mr. PETTIS moved that the committee take up the bill to amend an act in alteration of acts imposing duties on imports.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to take the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the case of Judge Peck.

The motion of Mr. PETTIS was negatived: yeas, 61—nays, 75.

The committee then took up the report of the Judiciary Committee on the case of Judge Peck.

Mr. BUCHANAN addressed the committee for about an hour, in explanation and defence of the report of the committee; and to sustain the resolution for impeaching.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, opposed the resolution, and defended the Judge.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, spoke in support of the resolution.

The committee then rose.

THURSDAY, APRIL 22, 1830.

THE ARMY.

The House resumed the resolution relative to a reduction of the officers of the army.

Mr. DRAYTON continued his remarks on the subject, without having concluded, when the hour expired.

JUDGE PECK.

The House went again into Committee of the Whole, Mr. WILDE in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the case of Judge Peck.

Mr. DODDRIDGE, of Virginia, submitted at length his reasons for deeming the impeachment just and proper.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, also spoke for some time in support of the resolution, and in favor of the impeachment.

Mr. BELL, of Tennessee, followed at considerable length in opposition to the resolution, and in defence of the Judge.

Mr. McDUFFIE then moved that the committee rise, and report the resolution to the House, stating that his own mind was made up on the question, and that he was ready to vote on it.

Mr. PETTIS expressed a wish to deliver his sentiments on the resolution, and therefore hoped that the committee would ask leave to sit again; and

Mr. TAYLOR suggesting that as Mr. P. was the sole Representative from Missouri, courtesy required that he should be allowed an opportunity of delivering his opinions on the subject—

Mr. McDUFFIE withdrew his motion; when,

On motion of Mr. PETTIS, the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

THE ARMY.

The House resumed the resolution proposing a reduction of the officers of the army.

Mr. DRAYTON addressed the House nearly an hour in conclusion of his remarks.

[They were to the following effect:]

Mr. D. said, that, in the remarks which he submitted when the resolution was first considered, he said that he should vote for its adoption, as he regarded it to be a mere inquiry for information, which every member was entitled to make. My colleague upon the Military Committee, [Mr. DESHA] who reported the resolution, will recollect [said Mr. D.] that I expressed this opinion in the committee, adding that I had not given particular attention to the subject, which was important, and required investigation; but that my impressions were, that the number of our military officers could not be reduced without injury to the public service. Having made these explanations to avoid being misunderstood, had the debate been confined within its proper limits, I should not again have addressed the House. But, under this resolution, a wide and unexpected discussion has been entered into, in the course of which it has been contended by several members: first, that a standing army, in time of peace, being expensive and useless, it ought to be disbanded; and, if not disbanded, that it should be reduced in number. Secondly, that, admitting the expediency of the standing army, the number of officers ought to be reduced, as it is disproportionately large, in comparison with the number of soldiers; and, thirdly, that, however these questions might be disposed of, the Military Academy at West Point ought to be abolished. During the progress of this debate, I have examined into the subject involved in it; and having arrived at conclusions utterly at variance with the propositions which I have just stated, I shall offer to the House the reasons upon which my conclusions are founded, and reply to the arguments of those from whom I differ in opinion.

First. That a standing army, in time of peace, being expensive and useless, it ought to be disbanded; and, if not disbanded, that its numbers ought to be reduced.

To conduct the operations of war, requires the union of science and art. The one prescribes the principles and rules, which the latter reduces to practice. This combination of theory and practice has usually been termed the art of war; the progress of which has kept pace with the lights and improvements of the age. If, therefore, we would maintain an equality with those nations with which we may be involved in hostilities, it is necessary that our knowledge of the art of war should not be inferior to that which they possess. This could not be effected were we deprived of the means of obtaining this knowledge, which must be furnished either by a military academy or a standing army. Destitute of these establishments, the art of war would soon be unknown in the United States. All will admit that the physician, the lawyer, and the artisan cannot be versed in the principles and the practice of their several vocations without study and experience. Upon what ground, then, can it be contended that the same reasoning does not apply to military knowledge, which requires a greater extent and variety of science and attainments than any of the learned or mechanical pursuits? It has been said that this science is of no service: that officers can lead, and soldiers can fight, as well without it. Whoever will take the trouble to examine into military details, both in ancient and modern history, will be satisfied of the error of this opinion. [Here Mr. D. detailed the particulars of the conduct and evolutions of Hannibal, in Italy; of Caesar, in Gaul; of the Duke of Marlborough, in the war of the succession of Frederick the Great, in the seven years' war; of Bonaparte, in his battles with the Austrians; and of the Duke of Wellington, in Portugal and Spain.] These examples illustrate, more forcibly than any arguments which I could urge, that skill and discipline are an overmatch for valor and numbers. At one period the most renowned and successful troops in Europe were the Spanish—afterwards the Swedish—then the French—then the allies under Marlborough and Eugene—then the Prussians, &c. When this military pre-eminence was respectively claimed and allowed, it was exclusively attributable to the skill of the officers, and to the discipline of the soldiers. In the commencement of the revolutionary war, General Washington, great as were his talents for command, did not lead the armies under him to victory. It was not until after the arrival of Baron Steuben, appointed Inspector General, that a system of tactics and instruction was introduced among the officers and men, which rendered them competent to meet and to vanquish a disciplined enemy.

I know that it is the habit, both in this House and out of it, to assert that the militia are, in all respects, equal to regulars. I know that it is popular to advance, and unpopular to controvert, this assertion; and yet it is irreconcilable with reason and experience. Is it not notorious that battles are gained by communicating to large bodies the facility of executing combined, and, frequently, complicated movements, with celerity and precision; that inferior numbers are often victorious by the skillful selection of positions, and by judicious manœuvres; that, by these means, a comparatively small army may be directed, with superior force, against the weak points of the enemy, and thus beat him in detail? To effect these results, the officer must have learned his duties, and the soldier must be carefully and laboriously trained. Have the militia these advantages? In pronouncing them not to be equal to regular troops, I say no more than that those who have not acquired a difficult art, cannot be so competent to practise it as those who have devoted to it their labor and time. Our militia are citizens of the same country—they are endowed with the same moral and physical powers as the regular soldiers, but they want tactical knowledge and discipline, without which an army is comparatively feeble. My colleague [Mr. TUCKER] has eulogized, and justly eulogized, Marion, and Pickens, and Sumpter, and Hampton, and Butler, and Williams, officers of militia in South Carolina, who were conspicuous in the revolutionary war. I entirely concur with him in all that he has uttered in their praise. He would not be more unwilling than myself to tarnish their well earned laurels. But South Carolina was rescued from the military grasp of Great Britain by continental regiments, led by General Greene. With them the militia of the State, and many of the officers whom my colleague has named, co-operated bravely. Militia, acting with regulars, have, upon various occasions, obtained deserved reputation; but I recollect no instance in which they have alone defeated an equal number of disciplined troops in the open field. The affairs at and near New Orleans, among the most brilliant in the annals of history, have repeatedly been cited as proofs that there is no superiority in the regular over the militia soldier. Upon these occasions, the steadiness and courage of the militia could not be surpassed. But it must not be forgotten, that, when they defended New Orleans, they were behind intrenchments, and that the action of the 23d December was fought in the night: that in neither of these situations could the manœuvres of the field be practised. It must also be remembered, that the marines and United States' artillery and infantry constituted nearly one-third of those who were engaged on the 23d of December and on the 8th of January. After the defeat of the enemy, the force with General Jackson, including the militia, in the rear of the lines of New Orleans, was nearly equal to that of the British survivors. Would they have been suffered to retreat unassailed to their shipping, had the troops under so great a commander as General Jackson been regularly disciplined? No, sir, with such troops, flushed with recent victory, and with such a leader at their head, the enemy could hardly have escaped capture or destruction.

Because a few individuals not educated for the profession of arms have been eminently distinguished in the field, it has been inferred, by some gentlemen, that military science and experience were useless. These are exceptions to general rules. The mass of mankind stand in need of instruction and practice to render them competent to discharge the functions of subordinate officers. Even those extraordinary personages who have been referred to, whom nature endowed with the capacity to conceive, and the judgment to direct, great military exploits, would be devoid of the species of knowledge which would enable them to discipline an army, to give to it that mechanical skill in the execution of rapid, combined, and complex movements, which are so essential. Generals Washington and Brown were strongly impressed with the expediency of maintaining a small standing army in time of peace. General Jackson, judging from his message to both Houses of Congress, as well as from other authentic sources of information, entertains the same opinion. It might as reasonably be argued that arithmetic and mathematics were useless, because Zerah Colburn and Brinsley had never learned them, as that no advantage is to be derived from a knowledge of the art of war, because a few splendid examples could be adduced of consummate generals, whose genius rose above the ordinary means by which military skill is obtained.

To determine whether our army be too large, we must advert to the purposes for which it has been raised. These are, to garrison our forts along the Atlantic coast; to occupy certain commanding posts upon our inland frontier; to restrain the inroads of neighboring savages; to punish their aggressions, and thus to protect our thinly populated settlements; and to preserve military skill, which cannot subsist without the proper subject upon which it is to be exercised.

The extent of a line drawn around the United States and their territories, excluding the indentations of coasts, &c. may, I believe, be estimated at between eight and nine thousand miles. We have now forty-two military posts and seventeen ordnance depots, (together fifty-nine,) so that our army, consisting of five thousand four hundred and thirty non-commissioned officers and privates, would give to each post and depot no more than ninety rank and file. In this enumeration I have made no allowance for the occupation of several forts nearly finished, and of others not commenced, which it is intended shall be erected. Deductions must, also, occasionally, be made from our garrisons. Two detachments, each of four companies, have recently been upon duty—one to protect the western traders to Santa Fe; the other to repel an attack which was threatened by the Pawnees and Camanches. Whoever will take all these circumstances into consideration, will, I think, be satisfied that our military peace establishment is not upon too large a scale for the public exigencies. Scattered as our army is over so wide a region, the opportunities can be but rare for the practice of any course of tactics, beyond that which applies to the company or the battalion. Shortly after the commencement of Mr. Jefferson's administration, in March, 1802, a period of profound peace, unmingled with any apprehensions of war, the military peace establishment of the United States consisted of three thousand three hundred and twenty-three rank and file. Our population was then about one-half what it is now, our revenue was in the same proportion, and our national debt was greater by thirty millions of dollars than it will be on the first of January next. In 1802, neither Louisiana nor Florida had been ceded to the United States, and the number of our military posts was only twenty-six; to each of which, three thousand three hundred and twenty-three rank and file would afford a garrison of one hundred and thirty. Upon a comparison, therefore, of our relative situation in 1802 and 1830, it is evident that the number of our standing army was, relatively, greater in the early part of the pacific administration of Mr. Jefferson, than it is at the present day.

Secondly. That, admitting the expediency of the standing army now existing, the number of the officers ought to be reduced, as it is disproportionately large, in comparison with the number of soldiers.

My colleague upon the Military Committee, [Mr. DEXTER] has told us that we have an officer for every seven men and a fraction. He includes in this enumeration the officers of the line and of the staff, and also the cadets at the Military Academy; but, as neither the cadets nor the staff have any command over the soldiers, his deductions are manifestly erroneous. The cadets are stationary at West Point, where they are engaged in the prosecution of those studies and exercises which are to qualify them to enter the army. The duties of the staff do not connect them otherwise than collaterally with the troops. Their formation is founded upon the principle of the division of labor, by which the functions of the general and the officers of the line are so simplified as to be confined to the objects for which they are intended—to watch the movements of the enemy—to attack him, and to resist his attacks. If the general and the officers of the line were obliged to procure whatever was requisite for the materiel and personnel of an army—to take care of the sick and wounded—to obtain the necessary supplies of food, clothing, arms, tents, grain, fuel, &c.—to provide for their transportation, and of whatever might be needful in camp, in garrison, upon marches, or in the field, they would be so overwhelmed with the variety and multitude of their employments, as to be unable to attend to their proper duties. Of all the component parts of the military system, the staff is the most difficult to organize. It is the best, in all armies, which attains regularity and efficiency. Its officers should be skilful, intelligent, and practised in their complicate duties, which they must learn in time of peace. Without a well arranged staff, the operations of an army are exposed perpetually to delay, and are often altogether obstructed. It is notorious that one of the principal causes of our disasters in the two first years of the late war, was the want of an efficient staff.

As far as I have understood, no one contemplates a reduction in the department of the staff. Bills, reported by the Military Committee, are now upon the calendar, for the increase of some of them; and when those bills come before the House, I trust that I shall satisfy its members that, by their passage, the efficiency of the particular departments referred to will be essentially promoted, whilst annual expenditures upon them will be considerably diminished.

Having made these observations, to show the distinction which ought to be kept in view when we speak of the proportion between the rank and file, and the officers attached to and commanding them, I will proceed to state what that proportion really is.

In the army, as now established, the officers of the line, including general, regimental, and company officers, amount to 448

The officers attached to companies, viz. captains and subalterns, are 412

The officers detailed for staff duties, with two or three exceptions, are taken from the companies, and the number of them thus employed, according to the Army Register, is 142

The number of the rank and file being five thousand four hundred and thirty, to each company officer there will be about twenty men. Upon a war establishment, when the company consists of four commissioned officers to one hundred rank and file, the ratio of men to each officer would only be increased by five. Independently of the advantages resulting from the officers of the line being instructed in the duties of the staff, which they are frequently called upon to perform, in active service, were they not detailed from the line, the staff department must be greatly augmented. For the two Departments of the Quartermaster and of the Commissary General of Subsistence alone, seventy officers are taken from the line. In my estimate of the deductions from the line, I have not included any officers who are members of, and witnesses before, courts martial, nor those who are upon the recruiting service, nor the sick, nor absentees upon furlough. Taking all deductions into consideration, it will, I think, be apparent that it would be injurious to reduce the number of our officers. It is certainly desirable that our officers should be more numerous upon a peace than upon a war establishment. This was contemplated, and has been partially executed, under the act of 3d March, 1821. A leading object, in a military peace establishment, is to create and preserve a body of officers, well instructed in every branch of their duties, consisting of such a number as to admit of a distribution of them among the recruits who would be raised in the event of war. Were our present force of six thousand men broken into small divisions of ten privates, with two good non-commissioned officers and one experienced commissioned officer, to each of these divisions might be added forty recruits, who would soon be regularly trained and disciplined. Our army of six thousand men would thus promptly be converted into one of thirty thousand, prepared to meet any enemy. More time and study are requisite to form the officer than the soldier. With skilful and experienced officers, recruits are soon rendered efficient; without them, military knowledge is slowly obtained, and, during its acquisition, the blood and the treasure of the country would be uselessly lavished: for, in proportion to the want of organization and discipline, must, in war, be the loss of life, and the increase of our military expenditures.

Thirdly. That the Military Academy at West Point ought to be abolished.

The substance of the numerous objections which have been made to the Military Academy may be thus summed up: That the cadets are principally selected from the sons of the rich and influential; that many of those who are received into the academy never graduate, and many who do, abandon the army and follow civil professions; that the officers of the army are taken altogether from the cadets, to the injurious exclusion of citizens of merit and talents; that the cadets are maintained out of the public funds, instead of their own resources; that the abuses connected with, or practised at, the academy, can only be remedied by abolishing the institution; and, if the abuses complained of did not exist, that the instruction given to the cadets does not qualify them to discharge the duties of military officers.

Before replying to these objections, I will remark, that the Military Academy owes its origin to the act of Congress of 16th March, 1802, when Mr. Jefferson was President, authorizing the appointment of ten cadets "to be stationed with the corps of engineers at West Point, to constitute a military academy." Before the end of Mr. Jefferson's administration, in one year, (1808,) forty cadets were appointed to the academy. I state these facts, because I presume that no one will attribute to Mr. Jefferson the disposition to encourage what has been termed "an expensive, useless, and aristocratic military institution." From the time of Mr. Jefferson, the academy has been approved of by every President, including Gen. Jackson, who has recommended it to the "fostering care of Congress, as one of our safest means of national defence, and as having the happiest influence upon the moral and intellectual character of the army." He adds, that "their knowledge" (that of the graduates) "of the military art will be advantageously employed in the militia service, and, in a measure, secure to that class of troops the advantages which, in this respect, belong to standing armies."

I will now proceed to the examination of the objections which I have stated. That the cadets are principally selected from the sons of the rich and influential, is an assertion unsupported by the semblance of proof. From the official information which has repeatedly been communicated to this House, we learn that the reverse is the fact; that more appointments are conferred upon the relatives of the poor and undistinguished, than of the rich and influential; although some among the wealthy are also chosen, it being unjust, and contrary to the spirit of our Government, to exclude any class of our citizens from the enjoyment of equal rights. This mingling together of the poor and the rich, and subjecting them to the same rules and regulations, cannot be a grievance. The rich ought no more to be proscribed than the poor. According to the prevailing practice, neither are proscribed; both are indiscriminately admitted, with a preference, nevertheless, to those whose circumstances are narrow. That many of those who are received into the academy never graduate, and that many who do, abandon the army for civil professions, is unquestionably true; but by far the largest proportion of those who retire without graduating, are, in fact, dismissed, from want of capacity or industry, or other causes. This can, surely, afford no ground for censure. It is not desirable that the immoral, the dull, or the idle should be retained, to be a burden upon the institution, useless as relates to themselves, and exhibiting bad examples to their associates. Those who, after graduating, do not continue in the army, have gained that military knowledge which renders them valuable militia officers, and that general knowledge which renders them useful in a variety of civil professions, particularly in those which require mathematical science. The labor and expense which have been bestowed upon them is, therefore, not lost to the country. But, as I am not disposed to defend any system, right or wrong, I admit, as the academy is intended for the instruction of military officers, that no one ought to enter it, unless he purposed making the army his profession. According to the regulations, the graduate is at liberty to leave the army, after having served in it one year. In doing so, he violates no contract, express or implied. Considering, however, this practice, which is frequent, to be a departure from the leading object of the institution, I would be willing that it should be prevented, provided a remedy could be devised which would not introduce a greater evil in its room. To require that the graduate should always be attached to the army, would be harsh, and would be an assumption of power over the freedom of action, inconsistent with the genius of a republican Government; nor would it be politic to oblige an officer, against his inclinations, to remain in the service. Thus compelled, he would be little likely to acquire reputation for himself, or to do credit to his country. Upon looking at the report, which, under a resolution of this House, has been sent to us by the Secretary of War, it will be seen that the number of the graduates who do not join the army is less than would have been inferred from the remarks which have been made upon this floor. The whole number of the graduates is five hundred and ninety-one of whom four hundred and twenty-three continued in the army.

Those who make it a subject of complaint, that officers are exclusively selected from the cadets, must have forgotten that the cadets are officers. When commissioned as second lieutenants, they are regularly promoted. To prevent their promotion, by substituting for them citizens in civil life, would be as unjust as, in the same manner, to supply a vacancy in the line by putting one who had never been in the army over the head of an officer who, according to the existing regulations, was entitled to the vacant office. Before an applicant can be admitted at the academy, he must be well recommended by respectable persons. He then undergoes a probation of six months. If, during that time, he conducts himself with propriety, a warrant is delivered to him; but if, at any subsequent period, before he graduates, he manifests a want of morals, or capacity, or application, he is discharged. With these precautions, is it not more probable that he will perform his duties ably and faithfully, than a citizen whose fitness for the army has never been tested? I can see no better mode of ensuring a body of good officers, than by the practice which now prevails. Commissions are not given until it has been ascertained, by experiment, that the necessary qualifications for them are possessed by those upon whom they are conferred.

The objection, that cadets are maintained out of the public funds, ceases to have any weight, when it is recollected that they are officers in the service of the Government, and liable, at any time, to be ordered to perform the duties of their profession. They are as much entitled to compensation as any other officers of the United States, civil or military. If the cadets at West Point defrayed their own expenses, as several gentlemen insist they ought to do, the very evil would result which is so loudly complained of, that the institution was exclusively for the wealthy. It might then be correctly alleged that the Federal Government was fostering a distinct class, and enlisting on its side the aristocracy of the nation. Organized as the academy now is, the avenue to it is as open to the poor as to the rich. It is the only place of public instruction in the Union, into which admittance cannot be gained by the means of wealth.

If any abuses exist connected with the general administration or the particular superintendence of the academy, they ought to be inquired into and corrected. If, upon investigation, they should be found to be radical, and of such a nature as to render it inexpedient that the institution should be continued, let it be abolished. I speak under the authority of its superintendent, when I declare thus publicly that he invites the most rigid scrutiny into his conduct. It would be peculiarly gratifying to him that all the regulations and detail which he directs should be submitted to the strictest inquisition, and exposed to the public eye. I do admit that, in my opinion, some abuses have prevailed in the exercise of the patronage of the academy, which are set forth in the report of the Secretary of War. By looking at the sixty-eighth page of that document, it will be seen that four foreigners were received into the academy, of whom one defrayed his expenses, the other three being paid as cadets. This institution being intended solely for the education of our officers, to place at it foreigners, who owed allegiance to their own Governments, was unauthorized and illegal. A degree of favoritism has also been shown towards the District of Columbia, which is entitled to equal, though not to greater, rights than other parts of the Union. And yet it appears, from the document which I have just referred to, that appointments of cadets from that District have been as follows: In 1829, four cadets; in each of the years 1828, 1827, 1826, and 1825, three; in 1815, nine; and in 1814, eight. This disproportionate number of appointments, as compared with the population of the District, is partial, and, therefore, unjust. It is not probable that either of these departures from the principles which ought to be observed in the administration of this institution will be repeated. Should Congress deem it necessary, they may guard against a repetition of them by passing a law for the purpose.

I did not expect to hear it asserted by any one, however strong might be his prejudices against the academy at West Point, that the instruction there communicated to the cadets did not qualify them for their profession. Let me state to the House in what that instruction consists. It comprehends the theory and the practice of the art of war, in all its branches. To the acquisition of the sciences requisite to constitute the accomplished officer, from nine to ten hours are laboriously devoted for six days in the week, during ten months in every year. The practical military instructions, which I quote from page 376 of "The General Regulations of the Army," are as follows: "First year, school of the soldier—guard and police duties of privates. Second year, school of the company—duties of corporals. Third year, school of the battalion—duties of sergeants—exercise and manoeuvres of artillery pieces. Fourth year, evolutions of the line—duties of orderly sergeants and commissioned officers, (including those of the battalion staff,) and of officers of the day—remainder of the instruction in artillery—the sword exercise—practical military instruction throughout the year. Field exercises only will be limited between 1st April and 1st November following. There will be an encampment of the cadets annually, commencing on the 1st of July, and ending on the 31st of August ensuing, during which the instruction will be exclusively military." In order to ascertain the improvement and proficiency of the cadets, they are carefully examined, semi-annually, by the Academic Board; and once a year they undergo a strict examination in public, before the Professors, and a Board of Visitors, selected by the War Department, from various sections of the Union.

With a knowledge of the facts which I have detailed, relating to the instruction and discipline at West Point, no one can doubt the competence of the graduates to discharge all the duties of a soldier. Without a knowledge of facts, no one ought to hazard criticism or censure. Having submitted the grounds and reasons upon which I rely, in opposition to the arguments principally insisted upon by those who advocate the disbanding or reduction of our army, the diminution of the number of its officers, and the abolition of the Military Academy, I will take up the time of the House no longer than to notice, briefly, one or two observations introduced into this discussion, which I have not hitherto commented upon. It has been asked, why should we rely upon a standing army in time of peace, to garrison our forts, and to protect our frontiers from Indian depredations, in preference to the militia of the country? Have gentlemen, making this inquiry, reflected upon the hardship which would be imposed upon our citizens, accustomed to the ease and comforts of civil life, by withdrawing them for periods of three or six months from their ordinary occupations, and subjecting them to the strictness of discipline, the restraints of martial law, and all the privations which the soldier encounters? Would they not feel these hardships and privations to be oppressive and intolerable? The experience of two wars has taught us that the employment of militia is more expensive than that of regular troops; that larger numbers of them are necessary to accomplish the same objects; that it requires a longer time than they usually serve, to render them perfectly acquainted with their duties; and that the mere change in their diet and habits occasions sickness among them, and consigns one-half of them to the hospitals. If these are the consequences, personal and national, resulting from the substitution of militia for regulars, why should they be substituted? Because, say gentlemen, a standing army is dangerous to our liberties. It is scarcely possible to conceive that an argument like this can be seriously relied upon. To the maintenance of a large regular army, when we are not at war, I am as decidedly opposed as any individual upon this floor; but, with a population of twelve millions of inhabitants, with a militia brave and expert in the use of firearms, amounting to fourteen or fifteen hundred thousand, can our liberties be affected by a standing army of six thousand men? Sir, when the day shall arrive that the liberty of this nation can be endangered by six thousand, or by ten times six thousand men, it could not be secured by any human means. Before such a force could accomplish the destruction of our liberty, we must ourselves have become utterly regardless of its preservation.

JUDGE PECK.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. WILDE in the chair, on the case of Judge Peck.

Mr. PETTIS having addressed the committee in defence of the Judge, and against the proposed impeachment,

Mr. EVERETT made a few observations. He could not bring his mind to the conclusion that Judge Peck ought to be impeached; and, therefore, he could not vote for the resolution. At the same time, he could not admit that Judge Peck's conduct had been free from blame. He, therefore, wished the resolution to be so amended as that he could vote for it. He referred to an opinion which he had hastily made while the Clerk was reading the defence of Judge Peck, that the Judge would have done better, had he rested his case with the report of the Judiciary Committee. He now, after a perusal of the defence, revoked that opinion. He thought the Judge had done well; and that the House, on a careful perusal of the defence, would admit that he had done well. He considered the defence as one of the most able papers laid before Congress for years. He said, he had looked in vain in the evidence for proof of evil intent. On the contrary, there was proof of the general good intentions and mildness of the Judge. He could not, therefore, punish with severity his first offence. He is already punished sufficiently by these proceedings. He moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting as follows:

That though, on the evidence now before it, this House does not approve of the conduct of James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, in his proceeding by attachment against Luke E. Lawless, for alleged contempt of the said court; yet there is not sufficient evidence of evil intent, to authorize the House to impeach the said judge of high misdemeanors in office.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, said he could not vote for this resolution, because it contemplated a final action on the case by this House. He deprecated such a course, as affording a mischievous precedent. He expressed his regret that the gentleman from Massachusetts had made an appeal to the sympathy of the House, in a case where sympathy should be kept out of sight. He was opposed to any thing which would compound this matter. He referred to the feelings with which he had himself entered on the examination of this case, and the strong disinclination which he felt to produce an impeachment. But he had gone into it, and he had a high and solemn duty to perform, which precluded sympathy. As to the opportunity given by the Judge to Mr. Lawless to purge himself of the contempt, he [Mr. S.] considered that it was insulting, after a violation of the personal rights of Mr. Lawless, and the usurpation of a jurisdiction which the Judge did not possess. He admitted that to have stricken the attorney from the rolls of his court, might not have subjected the Judge to censure; but it was the violation of that personal liberty, secured by the constitution, the imprisonment of Mr. Lawless in the felon's room, which justified impeachment.

Mr. BURGESS moved to amend the amendment, by prefixing to it a modification in substance, stating, that although the House might not, if called on, altogether approve the conduct of Judge Peck, yet that, perceiving no evidence of ill intent, &c. the House would not sanction an impeachment.

Mr. EVERETT (Mr. BURGESS having withdrawn his amendment) modified his resolution so as to meet the views of the gentleman, slightly changing the phraseology.

Mr. BURGESS moved that the committee now rise, which was negatived: yeas, 70—nays, 76.

Mr. ELLSWORTH then occupied the attention of the committee in support of the resolution. He, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, had given the subject full examination, and had come to the opinion that this impeachment should take place. He saw nothing in the publication of Mr. Lawless which ought to have drawn down the punishment inflicted by this judge. It was an arbitrary proceeding, and he considered it to be the duty of the House to impeach the Judge.

Mr. HUNTINGTON then made some remarks in favor of the Judge. Before he had concluded,

Mr. VANCE moved that the committee rise: yeas, 64—nays, 77.

Mr. HUNTINGTON then continued his remarks.

Mr. BURGESS commenced some remarks against the impeachment.

Mr. MILLER moved that the committee rise, it being between six and seven o'clock: yeas, 63—nays, 61.

The committee then rose, and reported progress.

ORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolution calling on the Secretary of War to report a new organization of the army, embracing a reduction of the officers.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said, it is to be regretted that the gentlemen who are opposed to the adoption of the resolution now under consideration, have thought it necessary to indulge in such a latitude of debate, and urge upon the consideration of the House questions of great importance to the country, upon a mere resolution of inquiry. These things would have been more properly the subject of debate upon some future occasion, when some specific proposition should be submitted to the House for the reduction of the army. I am sure it was not anticipated, either by my colleague, [Mr. DESHA] who introduced the original resolution to the House, or by the Military Committee, who reported the one now under discussion; but if gentlemen will press upon the House a premature discussion of these important questions, it becomes the friends of the resolution to meet and answer them in the best way they can.

The object of the resolution was to direct the attention of the House to the disproportion existing in the present organization of the military peace establishment between the number of officers and the privates retained in the service of the United States, and the consequent increased expenditure of the public money. This was referred to the Military Committee, who reported to the House the resolution now on your table, merely referring its consideration to the Secretary of War, and asking of him the best mode of effecting this object, if it could be done without injury to the public service; acting upon the belief that so much of the present session had elapsed, as to preclude the possibility of acting finally upon a question of so much importance to the nation at this time, and that such additional information might be given to this House as would enable them to act more efficiently, and with less danger to the service of the country, at some future period.

To this reference I did not expect an objection would have been made, after the avowal made by the chairman of the Military Committee, that the adoption of the resolution would not be considered as the expression of an opinion by the House, that any reduction could be made, with propriety, of the number of officers now in the public service, and least of all did I expect an objection from the chairman himself, who reported, and then advocated, and now avows his determination to vote for the resolution; and it seems to me somewhat strange that the gentleman from South Carolina should have thought it necessary to occupy so much of the time of the House, four successive mornings, in attempting to prove that there was no necessity for the reduction of the number of officers or men at present in the service of the United States, and to convince this House that the resolution reported by the gentleman himself, as the chairman of the Military Committee, and for which he intends to vote, ought not to be supported by any other member of this House. If it be true, sir, that this disproportion does not exist, it certainly follows that the consideration or adoption of the present resolution is wholly useless.

There is a great difference between the chairman of the Military Committee and my colleague in the calculations presented by them to the House as to the actual number of officers in the army, or those who ought to be so estimated. The one estimates alone the commissioned officers, or gentlemen who wear the sword and are in actual command, and only makes one officer for every twenty or twenty-five men; the other estimates, also, the non-commissioned officers and staff officers connected with the peace establishment, and thus makes one officer for every seven or eight men. Each is probably correct, according to the respective dates assumed by them, and each falls short of the actual disproportion existing between the common soldiers and other individuals connected with the army, who are, I presume, esteemed above the grade of the common soldiers. I take, sir, a different view of this subject from either of the gentlemen, and which will probably show the true disproportion existing in our army between the common soldiers and the officers, and which will account for the increased expenditures for the last few years, to some extent, in this branch of the Government. I look at every individual as connected with the peace establishment, who is in the pay of the Government, whether a commissioned or non-commissioned officer, or private, or clerks, or messengers. I care not by what name he may be called; and when viewed in this light, the statement which I now hold in my hand, and which has been prepared from the documents furnished during the present session, and which specifies each individual, and the part of the army to which he is attached, but which I will not now trouble the House by reading, will satisfy the House that there is retained in the pay of the Government, for the control and management of the soldiers of the line, which my colleague now informs me numbers five thousand five hundred men, near one thousand individuals, making one individual connected with the command of the army, for about every five soldiers of the line.

The question then is, whether the services of any of these individuals may be dispensed with at this time without injury to the public service. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the details of an army to speak with certainty as to the exact proportion that ought to exist between the number of officers and soldiers of the line; but, according to my recollection, in the late war with Great Britain, less than half the number of officers belonging to our peace establishment were deemed sufficient for the command of even a greater number of men, and that, too, whilst engaged in actual service; and there can be no propriety in retaining in the pay of the Government, in time of peace, twice as many officers as the Government would require for the command of the same number of men in war. My limited experience on such subjects will not justify me in attempting to point out the supernumerary officers now retained in public service, and submitting to the House a plan of my own for its reorganization; but I may be permitted, by way of example, and to show the necessity of the passage of the present resolution, to turn the attention of the House to a branch of the army that seems to me to have a greater excess of officers, in proportion to the duties to be performed, than, perhaps, any other. For the purpose of paying the army, now consisting of upwards of six thousand men, there is retained in the public service one paymaster general, whose salary is two thousand five hundred dollars, and three clerks, whose salaries amount to three thousand nine hundred dollars, and one messenger, with a salary of six hundred dollars, and fourteen paymasters, each with a salary of about eight hundred and ninety dollars, (making the sum of nineteen thousand four hundred and sixty dollars,) whose principal if not only duty is to pay off the small number of men now retained in public service. I cannot believe, sir, that this number of officers should be retained, and that amount of money expended for the purpose of paying the number of men belonging to the army; it seems to me that an additional clerk or two in the Treasury Department might discharge all these duties without the slightest inconvenience being felt by the public.

The chairman of the Military Committee next urges the propriety of our Government retaining in the military peace establishment a greater proportion of officers than in time of war, the skeleton of an army, I think he calls it, that the nation may be prepared, upon any sudden emergency, with skilful and experienced officers, to take the command of, and discipline the troops, and attributes our disasters at the commencement of the late war to the want of military skill and science in the officers appointed to command. I cannot think any emergency likely to arise in our country, that will not give us ample time to convert our militia into skilful disciplined troops, prepared to meet any dangers they may have to encounter. We are not, like other nations of the world, surrounded by neighbors, each with a standing army, that may make sudden incursions upon our territories, and assail and destroy us. The militia of the country have always been, and always will be, competent to resist any attacks from the savage tribes that reside upon our borders. Canada is too feeble to be any just cause of alarm. Nor can I admit that the disasters which occurred at the commencement of the late war were properly attributable to the causes which have been assigned. I should rather think that most of them originated in a mistaken confidence reposed by our Government in the officers attached to our former peace establishment, under the belief that their experience and skill, acquired in time of peace, better qualified them for the command of our armies, than other citizens of the country; or perhaps more properly to the want of that vigor of intellect and activity of body, which too often accompany too much leisure or indulgence in every pursuit in life. I should like to know, sir, what essential services had been rendered to the country in the late war by the officers of the old army. With but few exceptions, so far as I recollect, they were esteemed inefficient and wholly useless. These unfortunate incidents in our history, from whatever cause they may have originated, seem to me to prove but little, either for or against the position assumed by the chairman of the Military Committee.

It is again urged that the present peace establishment is not greater, in proportion to the population and wealth of the United States, than it was during the administration of Jefferson. I cannot, sir, perceive any good reason why the prosperity of the country should be considered a reason for the increase of our army, or the expenditures for it. That the finances of the country will justify us in maintaining twice the present number of troops, or even more, is not disputed by any. But, sir, what use have we for them? Our military posts are to be guarded, our frontiers to be protected. In the early periods of our Government, we were surrounded by numerous and warlike tribes of Indians, always disposed for war, and stimulated by British traders to make attacks upon our frontier settlements, which were at that time separated from the interior of the country by mountains almost impassable. Then three thousand men were deemed sufficient for our standing army; but now, when we have the almost entire control of their trade, their numbers greatly diminished, their spirits humbled by the repeated disasters to which they have been subjected in their wars with us; when their power has left them, and when our resources have increased in a greater proportion than theirs have diminished, and when our frontiers are surrounded by new and flourishing States, sufficiently near them to render any assistance that may be necessary, is our standing army to be doubled? Certainly not, sir. As the population and wealth of our country advances, we are better able to protect ourselves, and there is less necessity for regular troops to be employed for that purpose.

I should have been gratified, sir, if the gentleman from South Carolina, whilst comparing the number of troops now in service, and our resources, with those of the administration of Jefferson, had also compared the expenditures of the same period for the same purpose with those of the present time. He would then have perceived that the present expenditures of the army more than double those of that period in proportion to the numbers. For these reasons, I am inclined to think that there might be not only a diminution of the number of the officers of the army, but also of the number of men, without the slightest injury to the public service, and that the whole peace establishment should be reduced to the number of officers and men actually necessary to take charge of the fortifications, and to secure the public property. I would not, sir, have one man in the employment of the Government, either in the civil or military departments, whose services were not demanded by the interest of the country.

The Military Academy at West Point has been adverted to by the friends of the present resolution, as one of the abuses existing in the present peace establishment, and it has been eulogized by the chairman of the Military Committee, and represented as one of the most useful institutions in our country. I have ever thought, sir, that it was founded upon principles wholly inconsistent with the true policy of our country, and at war with the best interests of the people; it destroys that equality of rights and privileges which should be extended to every citizen of the country; it is a system of patronage, by which the military offices of the country will be confined to the sons of the wealthy and influential, and only sought through the favor of the Executive, or the members of this House; its continuance a few years, I fear, will be the destruction of all honorable emulation among the citizens of the country for them. The military appointments made by the Government, more particularly than any other, should be made accessible to the humblest individual in the community, and should be the reward of qualification and merit alone. If the Government chooses to indulge in the education of any portion of the citizens of the country, why confine it to the military department? Why not extend it, likewise, to the officers of the navy; and to your civil as well as military or naval officers? In my opinion, sir, it would be much more useful to extend these benefits to the officers employed in the civil departments of the Government. The interests of the Government and the dearest rights of the people are every day subjected to their control, whilst we may not need, in a lifetime, the assistance of one of your military educated gentlemen; and if we did, we might, in all probability, look for it in vain. We have constant employment for the exercise of the best talents and information of the officers engaged in the civil departments of the Government, and may never need the military knowledge given to the cadets; but if it be the will of the nation to support institutions of this character, and pay professors for superintending the same, and select and support young gentlemen for education, can there be any propriety in paying the favorite few to join the institution, and receive from the Government an education equal to any that can be acquired elsewhere in our country? If the Government establishes the institution, prepares quarters for the accommodation of the students, and pays professors to superintend the same, and would but make it accessible to every individual who would go, thousands would gladly flock to the institution, alone for the education that would be there acquired, without asking of the Government any compensation, and without the privilege of being placed in the line of promotion to the military offices of the country, to the exclusion of other citizens. But now, sir, the Government not only prepares, at a great expense, the necessary buildings for the accommodation of the students, and pays enormous prices to the instructors, but actually pays the cadets for receiving the blessings of an excellent education, about one dollar for each day that they remain in the institution, amounting to the aggregate sum, for the pay of the officers of the institution and the cadets, of about ninety thousand dollars annually. It will not do to say that they are paid as officers of the army, for if they were so, their pay ought not to commence whilst they are receiving, free of expense, the best education the country can afford, and that, too, at a period of life when their time would be probably occupied in such pursuits, if they were not officers of the army. But, sir, they ought not to be considered officers of the army; they are students, engaged in a course of studies that qualifies them for any other pursuit in life, as much as that of the army; and the document furnished us proves that there has been as yet but one out of six who receives admission into the institution that continues in the service of the Government. There have been admitted into this institution two thousand and fifty-three students, of which five hundred and ninety-one graduated, and three hundred and sixty-one now remain in the service of the country. These facts prove to my mind, clearly, that this institution is resorted to, more for the purposes of general education, than with a view of becoming officers of the army. But why is it, that, after having expended such sums of money in their education, we should give them the preference over the other citizens of the country, in the command of the armies? Other citizens of the country may, and do frequently, receive military education, at their own expense, and are as well qualified and meritorious as the young gentlemen educated at West Point; but, if they apply for office, their claims must be postponed in favor of those educated at this bantling of the Government, without even an inquiry made as to their merits or qualifications. But, sir, if this institution, limited as it must necessarily be in its operation, must still be kept up, ought the selection of the cadets to be confined to that class of the community who have not otherwise the means of receiving an education? Ought it not, sir, to be limited to the penniless orphans of the brave men who have perished in the service of the country?

Organization of the Army.

If, sir, the Government has such large sums of money, annually, to bestow, its liberality had better be extended to the officers and soldiers who served in the militia during the revolutionary war, and who now need its assistance, than to that class of young gentlemen who are enabled to procure appointments at the academy through the wealth and influence of their family and friends. When these things come to be considered and weighed by the American people, rely upon it, sir, that this institution, which has been so much lauded, and puffed into importance and popularity, will be put down—it is a species of aristocracy, inconsistent with the liberality and freedom of our institutions, and more expensive than any other institution in our country, and which I cannot but think would long since have been destroyed, had not the power of appointment been transferred from the Executive branch of this Government to the members of this House. But if the House should not concur with me in opinion that this institution ought to be destroyed, still the number of cadets ought to be regulated so as to correspond with the wants of the army; and the expenditures of the institution ought to be diminished within reasonable bounds; and these considerations alone would justify us in the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution which is now the subject of discussion, contemplates much more than a bare reduction of the excess of officers now retained in our peace establishment; it strikes at a branch of that system of excessive expenditure which has been too much indulged in by our Government for the last few years; it contemplates a diminution of the annual expenses incurred in maintaining and supporting our present peace establishment, which ought to be done, as I shall presently show, whether the army can be reduced or not.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. TAYLOR] has reminded us that, when this subject was before Congress in 1821, and when the army was reduced from ten thousand to six thousand men; he was an advocate for that reduction, and for which he and those who acted with him were denounced as radicals; but he is now of opinion that no further reduction can be made without injury to the public service. I am sure, if the gentleman from New York had turned his attention, for a moment, to the expenditures in this branch of the Government for the last few years, and compared them with the expenditures for the same department for a few years prior to the reduction of the army in 1821, he would have still seen the necessity of either reducing the number of officers, or men, or both, or in some way curtailing the unnecessary expenditures. In this branch of the Government, but little has been gained in the cause of economy by the reduction that took place in 1821. The expenditures of the last few years actually exceed those for a few years prior to that time, when the army was ten thousand strong; which will be seen by a reference to the documents in the War Department, which show that, for the year

From which it appears that the "pay of the army and subsistence of the officers," for the years 1828 and 1829, when the army was about six thousand strong, exceed that for the years 1819 and 1820, when the army was ten thousand strong, by the sum of five hundred and twenty-two thousand eight hundred and five dollars and twenty-five cents; and that, by the act of 1821, reducing the army to six thousand, we have gained the dismissal of four thousand men from the public service, without any corresponding diminution of the expenses of the army.

I would not have it understood, sir, that, in making and presenting these estimates to the House, I impute any blame whatever to the officer now presiding at the head of the War Department, or the one who discharged the duties of it during the late administration. If the expenditures are, or have been, excessive or improper, which I by no means assert, blame is properly attributable to this House; if appropriations are made for specific objects by us, it becomes the duty of the Executive to see them applied; if any abuse exist, the Congress of the United States is responsible for it to the nation, and from us the people expect its correction. These estimates are presented solely for the purpose of showing the propriety of the passage of the present resolution, or some one of a similar character, under the hope that the attention of the Secretary of War may be directed to it, and that his experience in the department will enable him to report to us some system for the reduction of the expenditures of the army, that will enable us to act efficiently, and without injury to the public service.

The chairman of the Military Committee considers that the present organization of the army ought to be retained as a means of national defence, and has eloquently pointed out the superiority of skilful officers and disciplined troops over the militia, and has illustrated his positions by a recurrence to standing armies of several European nations, and their success over undisciplined troops. I could not, if I was so inclined, follow him through all his illustrations, or successfully controvert the position assumed by him. Whether the position assumed by him be true or not, our Government, being based upon different principles from those alluded to by him, must necessarily resort to a different mode of defence. I may be permitted here to remark, that, if the gentleman from South Carolina had turned one other page in the history of those nations, he would have seen the consequences resulting from their social systems. Iron handed despotism and arbitrary misrule, the people deprived of the right of self-government; immense public debts; and burdensome and oppressive systems of taxation; these are the consequences resulting to European nations from their military organization: the surrender of their liberties is the price they pay for protection by skilful officers and disciplined troops. To my mind, sir, the argument of the gentleman proves the necessity of retaining in the service of this country a very large standing army, rather than the propriety of retaining in our service the present number of officers and men. That we should prepare for war in time of peace, is undisputed in our country; but how prepare? By educating one part of the community to command the other? By setting apart one portion of the citizens for the defence of the other, and sustaining and supporting them in peace? Instead of thus rendering our armies skilful and brave, I would rely upon the virtue, the intelligence, and the moral energies of the country; I would arm and discipline the citizens of the country, the militia; I would remove every burden from the finances of the country; pay the public debt; sustain, unimpaired, the public credit; I would husband the resources of the country, by leaving the money of the people in its proper place—their own pockets; these, in my estimation, are the true preparations of a republic for war; I would leave standing armies and the sword for the monarch and despot. The militia, sir, so often the subject of ridicule and abuse, is the only army upon which we can rely for the protection of our country; the citizens of the country must, and ever will, protect themselves whilst their liberties are worth preserving; they are the supporters of our Government in peace, and must be its defenders in war: our Government is based upon this principle; we trusted them in the revolution, and were not deceived by them; we confided in them in the late war, and were not disappointed. I will not now detain the House by pointing them to instances of courage, patriotism, and valor, in the militia of our country, that would equal, if not surpass, any of the numerous instances to which our attention has been directed by the gentleman from South Carolina; they are familiar to each member of the House, and are unparalleled in the history of any country.

I have briefly adverted to the reasons which will induce me to vote for the resolution of my colleague, and flatter myself that we will derive such information from the War Department, should it pass, as will enable us to reorganize the army on some more economical plan, better adapted to the situation of the country, and without injury to the public service.

[Here the hour expired, and the debate closed for this day.]

JUDGE PECK.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. WILDE in the chair.

Mr. BURGESS spoke at length against the original resolution. He occupied the floor for about two hours.

Mr. WICKLIFFE spoke in reply, and in defence of the course pursued by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendment offered by Mr. EVERETT was negatived.

The resolution offered by the chairman of the committee was agreed to—yeas 113.

The committee then rose, and reported the resolution.

Mr. BUCHANAN asked for the yeas and nays on concurrence in the resolution; which were ordered.

Mr. PETTIS then moved a call of the House; which was refused.

The question was then taken on concurring with the committee in the resolution, and carried in the affirmative.

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Armstrong, Barnwell, Barringer, Beekman, Blair, of South Carolina, Bockee, Boon, Borst, Bouldin, Brodhead, Brown, Buchanan, Cahoon, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carson, Chandler, Chilton, Claiborne, Coke, Coleman, Conner, Cowles, Craig, of New York, Craig, of Virginia, Crawford, Crocheron, Daniel, Davenport, Davis, of South Carolina, Deberry, Denny, Desha, De Witt, Doddridge, Drayton, Dudley, Earll, Ellsworth, Evans, of Maine, Evans, of Pennsylvania, Findlay, Finch, Forward, Foster, Fry, Gaither, Gilmore, Gordon, Hall, Halsey, Hammons, Harvey, Haynes, Hinds, Hodges, Howard, Hubbard, Ihrie, Isaacs, Jennings, Johnson, of Kentucky, Johnson, of Tennessee, Kendall, Kincaid, King, of New York, Lamar, Lea, Lecompte, Letcher, Loyall, Lewis, Lyon, Magee, Maxwell, of New York, Maxwell, of Virginia, McCreery, McDuffie, McIntire, Mitchell, Monell, Muhlenberg, Nuckolls, Overton, Polk, Potter, Powers, Ramsey, Richardson, Roane, Russel, Scott, Shepperd, Shields, Semmes, Smith, Speight, Spencer, of New York, Spencer, of Maryland, Sprigg, Sterigere, Storrs, of New York, Swift, Taliaferro, Test, Thompson, of Georgia, Thomson, of Ohio, Trez-

NAYS.—Messrs. Angel, Arnold, Bailey, Barber, Bartley, Bates, Bell, Blair, of Tennessee, Burges, Butman, Clay, Clark, Condict, Cooper, Crane, Creighton, Crowninshield, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dwight, Everett, of Vermont, Everett, of Massachusetts, Gorham, Grennell, Hawkins, Hughes, Hunt, Huntington, Kennon, Martindale, McCoy, Miller, Pearce, Pettis, Pierson, Reed, Rose, Sill, Stanberry, Standifer, Stephens, Storrs, of Connecticut, Sutherland, Swann, Taylor, Vance, Vinton, Whittlesey, Williams, Young.—49.

So the resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN,

Ordered, That ——— be appointed a committee to go to the Senate, and at the bar thereof, in the name of the House of Representatives, and of all the people of the United States, to impeach James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, of high misdemeanors in office; and acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same; and that the Senate be requested to make order for the appearance of the said James H. Peck, to make answer to the same.

The committee was ordered to consist of two members.

On motion of Mr. STORRS, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report to this House articles of impeachment against James H. Peck, district judge for the State of Missouri, for misdemeanors in his said office.

The committee was ordered to consist of five.

THE ARMY.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution directing the Secretary of War to report to the next Congress an organization of the army, with a view to a reduction of the number of the officers.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, observed that the resolution seemed aimed at an institution, (the West Point Academy,) which is the ornament and safety of the country; and with a view to try the sense of the House on it, and put an end to the protracted debate, he moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. DESHA requested Mr. S. to withdraw his motion, to give him [Mr. D.] an opportunity of making some further remarks on the subject; but

Mr. SPENCER said he could not do so compatibly with his sense of duty, and the gentleman must excuse him.

The question was then put on laying the resolution on the table, and negatived by the following vote: yeas, 64—nays, 96.

Mr. DESHA then spoke at some length in further support of the policy of reducing the number of officers, and against the Military Academy.

Mr. WILDE did not rise to address the House again on the merits of the resolution; but not wishing to vote for it in its present shape, and the House having refused to lay it on the table, he rose to offer an amendment which would make it more acceptable to himself and perhaps many others. At present the resolution was not a simple inquiry; it would carry with it an expression of opinion by the House on the question of reducing the number of officers. This he disapproved of; and, to obviate the objection, he moved to strike out the matter of the resolution, and substitute the following: That the Secretary of War report to the House, at its next session, "whether any reduction in the number of officers in the army of the United States can be made without injury to the public service, and, if any, what reduction; together with a plan for the most efficient organization of the army in conformity with the reduction proposed."

The amendment was agreed to: yeas, 85—nays, 44; and The resolution, thus amended, was adopted; without a division.

THE INDIANS.

The bill from the Senate making an appropriation for obtaining an exchange of lands with the Indians, and for removing the Indians west of the Mississippi, was twice read.

Mr. BELL moved to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DWIGHT thought that, as some important amendments had been made by the Senate, it was desirable to obtain the sense of the Committee on Indian Affairs regarding these amendments, before they were committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BELL said, the amendments were substantially the same in principle as the bill which was reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs contained.

Mr. LUMPKIN made some remarks to the same effect.

Mr. DWIGHT then withdrew his motion, and the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. MALLARY, with a view to go into committee on the tariff bill, moved to postpone the intervening orders of the day; amongst which was the bill respecting the Tennessee lands, which Mr. CROCKETT made an earnest effort to prevent from being postponed; but Mr. MALLARY's motion prevailed, and

The House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. POLK in the chair, and took up the bill to alter the several tariff acts, to provide for the more effectual collection of duties, and to prevent evasions of the revenue.

Mr. McDUFFIE rose, and commenced by saying that the bill under consideration was designed to enforce existing laws of the country, and effect a more faithful collection of the duties on imports. This was an object right and proper in itself, and one which he was willing to promote. He would be always in favor of enforcing the faithful collection of the revenue, even though he might object to the laws by which it was levied. In this case, however, he would attain the faithful collection of the revenue by a mode different from that contemplated by the bill. He would do it by diminishing the duties, and thereby removing the inducement to evade the duties. With this view, he moved to amend the bill as follows: Strike out all of the bill after the first section, and insert the following:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the 30th of June next, so much of the act of the 19th of May, 1828, as increases the duty on wool manufactured, and on manufactures of wool, or of which wool shall be a component part, be repealed, leaving the duties on said articles as they stood previous to the passage of that act; and that, from and after the 30th of June, 1831, so much of the act of the 22d May, 1824, as increases the duties on the aforesaid articles, be, and the same is also, repealed, leaving the said duties as they stood previous to the passage of the said act.

And be it further enacted, That, from and after the 30th of June next, so much of the aforesaid acts of the 19th of May, 1828, as increases the duty on iron in bars and bolts, whether manufactured by rolling or hammering, on hemp, on flax, on cotton bagging, on molasses, on indigo, on manufactures of cotton, or of which cotton is a component part, be repealed, leaving the said duties as they stood previous to the passage of the said act; and that so much of the aforesaid act of the 22d May, 1824, as increased the duty on any of the aforesaid articles, be repealed from and after the 30th of June, 1831, leaving the duties on the said articles as they stood before the passage of that act.

And be it further enacted, That the duty on salt be reduced to ten cents per bushel of fifty-six pounds, from and after the 30th of June next.

Mr. McDUFFIE then proceeded to discuss, at large, the policy of the protecting system, and to exhibit what he deemed its pernicious effects on the various interests of the country. He had spoken about two hours, when he stated that he had now gone through the dry and less interesting topics involved in the discussion; what he had further to say on the subject, touched considerations of a character more vital and interesting. Being, however, somewhat fatigued, he would prefer postponing his further remarks until to-morrow.

MAYSVILLE ROAD BILL.

Mr. LETCHER, of Kentucky, for the purpose of indulging the gentleman, suggested that the committee should lay aside this bill, and take up, for the remainder of the sitting, some minor bill, that would occupy but little time; and he therefore moved that the committee take up the bill authorizing a subscription on the part of the Government to the stock of the Maysville and Lexington Turnpike road; which motion prevailed, and the bill was accordingly read.

Mr. LETCHER rose in explanation of the bill. He said he did not at present intend to do more than to offer, for the information of the House, a very brief statement of facts connected with this application to Congress. The Legislature of the State of Kentucky, [said he] by a well drawn and well guarded charter, have incorporated a company to construct the road referred to in the bill just read, under the name of "the Maysville, Washington, Paris, and Lexington Turnpike Company." The subject is one of very great solicitude in the State, and more particularly in that interesting portion of it through which the road is to run. The attention of the General Government has long since been drawn to the importance and utility of this great highway; and under its immediate direction, skilful engineers, in the year 1827, made a survey from Zanesville, in Ohio, to Florence, in Alabama, including that portion of it over which the contemplated road is to be made. The report of the engineers, sir, is now before me—it is made out with great care, enters minutely into details, and, upon examination, will, I trust, be found entirely satisfactory and accurate.

With the indulgence of the House, sir, I will add only a word or two to show the great importance of the road, and to prove, that, by granting the subscription of stock asked for, the Government will not expose itself either to loss or injury, but, on the contrary, will be highly benefited.

Maysville is a flourishing and growing village, on the south side of the Ohio river, about sixty miles above Cincinnati. It is already a point of considerable commercial consequence, and no doubt will continue to increase rapidly, both in wealth and commerce. It is justly considered the great depot of the Kentucky merchants who trade to the East. From that point an immense quantity of merchandise, as well as other articles, is conveyed through various portions of the State.

The road designed to be improved is intended to intersect the great national road in the State of Ohio. It connects itself also on each side with the Ohio river. These two connexions most certainly and justly entitle it to the appellation of a national work. Its present condition is too bad to be particularly described, probably the very worst in the United States, while at the same time it is more travelled, in proportion to the population of the country, than any other section of the West. The facility with which it can be constructed, and the small expense compared with the great benefit to the country, recommends in the strongest manner the proposition to take stock to the favorable consideration of the House. The bill is well guarded. The subscription now asked is not to be advanced, until enough has been actually paid by individuals and the State, to equal the amount paid by the General Government. The sum reserved to individuals has all been subscribed, amounting to seventy-five thousand dollars, and the State of Kentucky has subscribed seventy-five thousand dollars more; both these sums are to be fully paid before the subscription of the United States is to be demanded. To illustrate the importance of this road, I have a few strong facts to lay before the House. The company hired a man during one month, to record the number of persons, wagons, horses, cattle, &c. which passed over the road; and the average for a day, derived from this record, amounts to three hundred and fifty-one persons, thirty three carriages, and fifty-one wagons.

I hold the document in my hand, subject to the inspection of any gentleman who may desire to examine it.

There is no intention to induce the House to subscribe to a mere neighborhood road. The calculation above quoted must convince every gentleman that this is a road greatly travelled—that it is both useful and used. And while the aid of Government will put it in a good condition, the Government will not lose a dollar by its beneficent operation. It is known to many gentlemen on this floor, that the road is one of the worst in all our country. In the winter it is almost impassable, owing to the depth of the soil, which readily forms deep mud holes. Such is the difficulty of getting along, that the wagoners have sometimes to join themselves in gangs to lend each other assistance. Double teams are often hitched to the same wagon; and not unfrequently they become so deeply mired that the neighbors have to turn out to aid the teamsters; and in winter it often happened, after sticking in the mire, that they are frozen up entirely. The same state of things exists in reference to the mail; and a great saving will be effected by the Government, both as to time and expense in its transportation. Should the road be properly made, the saving on this head alone will more than compensate you, even if the money was given, instead of subscribed. I promised, sir, to be very brief; I trust I have fulfilled that promise. Whilst I do not desire or anticipate any opposition to the passage of the bill, yet I hold myself ready now, and at all times, to defend it, should any be offered.

Mr. FOSTER, of Georgia, moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. He could not but feel surprised at the confidence expressed by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. LETCHER] that the bill would meet with no opposition; this surprise was only equalled by that which he felt at the support which the Committee on Roads and Canals had given to the proposed measure by even reporting the bill. But the gentleman tells us this is a national road—and what are the evidences of its nationality? Why, forsooth, that immense numbers of horses, wagons, &c. travel it, and that in certain seasons of the year it is almost impassable. Really, sir, [said Mr. F.] if these are the characteristics of a national road, our country abounds with them; there is scarcely a market road in Georgia or Carolina, which might not, with great propriety, claim the distinction. But Mr. F. was too much indisposed to enter into a discussion of the merits of the bill, and was satisfied with having drawn the attention of the committee to it.

Mr. HAYNES inquired whether any survey of this road had been made by the United States' engineers; or whether the House was to take the statement of the expense on the estimates of those interested.

Mr. LETCHER replied, that an engineer named Williams, the same person who had been employed by the Government on the Cumberland road, had surveyed this road. It had also been reported on by engineers in the United States' service.

Mr. HAYNES said, we all know with what facility such surveys are procured, and how easy it is to get subscriptions to any new scheme, especially where the Government is to be a partner. Some years ago, the House was urged to subscribe to some such undertaking. He believed it was to the Chesapeake and Delaware canal, when it was pressed as an argument in its favor, that the Dismal Swamp canal, a link in the great chain of internal communication, as it is called, had been completed; and yet, since he had been a member of this House, a further subscription had been asked and obtained to the stock of the Dismal Swamp canal; since which time, a further subscription had been obtained for the same object. Four years ago, we had been asked to subscribe one hundred thousand dollars to the stock of the Louisville and Portland canal, as necessary for its completion, which was granted. Since that time, a further subscription, of what precise amount he did not recollect, had been sought and obtained, and a still further subscription is now asked for. He said, that, laying aside every other consideration but the mere question of expediency, (although his opinions as to the constitutionality of such measures are well known,) he trusted the House would consider maturely before it engaged in such an undertaking.

Mr. LETCHER replied.

Mr. HAYNES regretted that the honorable gentleman [Mr. LETCHER] should have supposed him capable of entertaining vindictive feelings towards Kentucky, Kentuckians, or to any enterprise in which they were interested. He cherished too high a respect for the gentleman from that State, with whom he had become acquainted here and elsewhere, to indulge such feelings. [Mr. LETCHER explained, and disclaimed such an imputation.]

Mr. HAYNES said, he could not permit the inference to be drawn from the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, that he [Mr. H.] entertained the opinion that this Government has the power to engage in works of internal improvement. In his opinion, the subscription to stock stood precisely on the same footing, in principle, with a direct appropriation of money for the construction of a road or canal. Indeed, he considered it as not differing from the construction of such a work by the Government.

He considered the power of taxation to be limited by the specific grants in the constitution, and, consequently, the power of appropriation was subject to the same limitations. The relative could not be broader than its antecedent. However, he did not intend to argue the constitutional question, but thought thus much necessary by way of protest against all such acts whatsoever.

Mr. LETCHER, in reply, insisted that the road in this bill was strictly national in its character. Sir, [said he] from what has fallen from the two gentlemen from Georgia, [Mr. FOSTER and Mr. HAYNES] I must have been peculiarly unfortunate in the very few remarks I had the honor of submitting when first up. I endeavored to make myself understood. I stated then, sir, and now repeat that statement, that it is expected, and that it is designed to continue the road through the State of Ohio, until it intersects the great national road usually known as the Cumberland road, and that this was the commencement of the scheme. Yet, sir, gentlemen seem to misunderstand, or to misapprehend, what has been said, and to persist in the intimation, that the object is to obtain governmental assistance for local accommodation. It is not so. The object, sir, has been fully and fairly avowed. Until now, I had supposed it was very generally admitted that the most unexceptionable method in which the Government could engage in works of internal improvement, was to subscribe stock in companies formed by individual enterprise. But, at present, it seems to be feared by the gentlemen that this is the mode best calculated to draw money from the treasury, to be distributed or given in a neighborhood. He begged gentlemen to believe, that though the road was exceedingly bad, and a good one much needed, yet the friends of the bill were far, very far, from asking any thing in the shape of charity. They asked for no gift, no, nothing like it; but merely invited a subscription of stock to assist in the improvement of a most important and useful work, and one which was known to be strictly national. Though Kentucky had never yet received a cent from this Government, while she saw the public money expended elsewhere for objects of internal improvement, who, sir, has ever heard her utter a groan, or heave a sigh? He trusted she would always have too much pride to beg or to murmur. No, sir, her people are not a begging people. She had always voted to appropriate money for similar objects; and whenever any scheme of the kind was proposed to the House, she presented almost an undivided front. And why? Not from any selfish and sordid motives, but because she was anxious to promote the prosperity and interest of the country, a part of which she is, I hope, considered.

Whilst one of the gentlemen from Georgia urged his objections to the bill, sir, the other, I thought, seemed much grieved at the subscription which had heretofore been made to the Louisville and Portland canal, and argued that more money was to be applied for before the adjournment of Congress. When that bill is called up, sir, let the gentleman offer his objections to it. My colleague, [Mr. WICKLIFFE] who represents that region of the country, will be ready to meet him. But I beg of the gentleman, [Mr. HAYNES] whatever vindictive feelings he may entertain towards that measure, not to wreak his vengeance upon this unoffending one. The Louisville canal is no Kentucky measure, and the State cannot be charged with the investment made by the Government for that work. It is a measure in which the States above and below Kentucky, I might almost say, sir, are exclusively interested. The improvement now so warmly opposed by the two honorable gentlemen, I acknowledge, sir, is of immense consequence to the State. It leads to one of the most fertile regions of the earth, and connects it with a navigable stream, a country beautiful and highly productive. Without it, what is our situation? Why, sir, a little like living in the happy valley, very difficult to get into it, and yet more difficult to get out of it. We have every thing in great abundance, and to spare, that man could desire, except an outlet to a good market. We raise, sir, far more than we can consume, and we are desirous of furnishing our neighbors out of the surplus, on the best terms, and upon the shortest notice. The road must be owned to be national as soon as it reached the great Ohio river. Did it lose its national character because it was to be so much used by the people of Kentucky? It has been emphatically asked why the State does not make the road herself. Sir, [said Mr. L.] the State is new, her resources are limited; she would make it if she could; she seeks nothing of you as a gift, but only a little assistance to advance your own interests as well as hers. You are a rich and able Government, with ample means at your command, and cannot lose one cent by complying with her request. Will you refuse it? Let me, sir, put one plain question to the friends and to the opposers of internal improvement. What would you think of the character of a father, who had eight or ten children, each of whom possessed a fine farm, rich and fertile, well situated, and in perfect order, if a younger child, always affectionate and dutiful, who had ever been ready to serve its parents by day or by night, in peace or in war, and who had not deserted him in his deepest affliction, should present itself before him, and say, father, I see that all my brothers are prosperous and happy, they have fine settlements and are doing well—I am glad to see it. I helped all I could to make them so. I do not envy any one of them his good fortune. My own farm, however, is in a bad condition. I have had a great deal of hard work to do, and at this moment I am a little behindhand; and as you, father, are in funds just now, I pray you to advance me a small sum to aid me in completing an improvement highly advantageous both to you and to me; I ask it not as a gift, but merely the use of it for a short period. Sir, is there a gentleman here who could or would justify the father in refusing such a request? and what sort of a father must he be who could turn that child from his door? The case I have put, I think, sir, illustrates our true situation. I will not comment upon it. I will say, however, we scorn to complain of the help which has been extended to others; but we shall think it very strange and very unkind, if, when we come for the first time, and ask you to do a most just and reasonable thing, to aid an enterprise in every respect worthy of the patronage of the Government, you should refuse it. I hope my friend from Georgia [Mr. FOSTER] does not desire to throw any unnecessary obstacles in the way of this bill, should it be the pleasure of a majority to pass it; and I would most respectfully submit to him to withdraw his motion to strike out the first section, and let the bill be reported to the House. He can afterwards make any opposition he may think fit. This course will save a great deal of time, and I trust he will consent to it.

Mr. FOSTER said that he most cheerfully accorded to the chivalrous and high-minded Kentuckians all the respect and gratitude to which their sufferings and services in the cause of our common country so eminently entitled them. Nor had he for a moment considered, much less intimated, that, in making the application which the bill under consideration is designed to favor, they approached us in the language of supplication or complaint; he knew too well the proud and lofty spirit of that gallant people, to believe that they would descend to either.

Mr. F. would trouble the committee with only a few words more in relation to the particular object of this bill. The gentleman [Mr. LECHE] who advocates it with so much zeal, has told us, with his usual candor, that this is only the beginning of a design far more extensive—that this is only a portion of a great road which is to be constructed from Zanesville, in Ohio, to Florence, in Alabama. This is the body, the centre building of the great work—the wings are to be put up hereafter. And all these are objects of national importance! Sir, [said Mr. F.] it would be easy to point out five hundred, yes, five thousand roads of the same description.

Mr. F. hoped that no gentleman would suspect him of having any wish to impede the progress or improvement of the State of Kentucky; so far from it, he declared himself proud to witness her growing prosperity. The Union owed her a great deal, not only for her achievements in the national defence, but for the splendid talents which she contributes to our national councils. Yet, with all his respect for the State, and her patriotic sons, he could not vote for the bill now on the table. He would, however, withdraw his motion for striking out the enacting clause, and suffer the bill to be reported to the House, when a direct vote can be taken on its passage.

PENITENTIARY PUNISHMENT.

The House then, according to the order of the day, took up the bill providing for the punishment of crimes within the District of Columbia, as it was reported by the Committee of the Whole.

The discussion of the details of this bill consumed the day's sitting, and occupied the House till near five o'clock.

The point which gave rise to far the greater part of the debate, was that which grew out of the question whether slaves should be made liable to the same punishment, by confinement in the penitentiary, for the various offences described, as other persons. The Committee of the Whole House had adopted an amendment to insert the word "free" in the provisions of the bill, so as to make them applicable to "free persons" only. On the question of concurring in this amendment, Messrs. TEST, POWERS, SPENCER, of New York, BUCHANAN, TAYLOR, and PEARCE spoke in opposition to it, and Messrs. POLK, HAYNES, BOULDIN, WASHINGTON, and MERCER advocated it. Finally,

The question was decided by yeas and nays, against concurring in the amendment, as follows: yeas, 73—nays, 88.

Mr. HAYNES then moved to retain the discrimination in the fourth section, which prescribes the punishment for rape, so as to make this a penitentiary offence for "free" persons, and death for slaves; the latter being the penalty of the offence under the existing laws of the District.

This amendment was agreed to: yeas, 79—nays, 69.

Mr. HAYNES then moved further to amend this clause, by inserting the word "white" after "free," so as to exclude all colored persons from the penitentiary punishment for the offence.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. SPENCER and BURGESS, on the ground of the difficulty that would often occur in deciding whether a man was white or not; and was negatived: yeas, 54—nays, 66.

Mr. BOULDIN moved to strike out the whole section, and thus leave the crime as it now is, to be punished in all cases with death; that being the penalty for it in all civilized countries. After some discussion,

This motion was negatived: yeas, 54—nays, 65.

Mr. J. S. BARBOUR submitted his objections to the bill, growing out of the provisions relative to slaves, and going to affect the condition of that property in the circumjacent States, and moved to lay the bill on the table, but withdrew his motion at the request of

Mr. SEMMES, who had an amendment to offer, which would obviate Mr. B.'s objections. While he was preparing it,

Mr. DRAYTON expressed his objections to the bill, as it was now shaped, and concluded by moving to lay the bill on the table.

This question was decided, by yeas and nays, in the negative, as follows: yeas, 61—nays, 93.

Mr. SEMMES then moved an additional section, providing that nothing contained in the bill should apply to slaves not residents of the District of Columbia; but that such slaves should be punished according to the laws as they now exist; which amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARRINGER next moved an amendment in the fourth section, the substance of which was to except slaves from penitentiary punishment for offences for which the punishment now is whipping; which amendment prevailed—69 to 61.

Mr. HAYNES now renewed the motion to lay the bill on the table; but it was again negatived—yeas, 55.

Mr. ALEXANDER then, intimating much repugnance to the bill as it now stood, and a desire to deliver his reasons for being averse to it, moved to postpone its further consideration to Thursday; which motion prevailed—93 to 40.

[The following are the only remarks delivered on the subject in the possession of the publishers.]

Mr. POWERS said, he rose for the purpose of answering some arguments which had been advanced in favor of excluding slaves from the operation of the bill when under discussion upon a former occasion, and to state some facts which he had recently obtained, and with which the House was probably unacquainted.

Mr. P. said, he would remark, preliminarily, that he was not one of those who believed either in the constitutional power or public policy of any interference of the General Government with the local regulations of a State, whether they related to people of one color or another. Let each Government be kept in its proper sphere of action, and all subjects which are strictly and legitimately of a local character remain under the exclusive control of the State authorities, as was intended by the framers of the federal constitution, and the people of the States who adopted it. But these principles had no application to the District of Columbia, which, by the eighth section of the first article of the constitution, was placed under the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress.

This is national ground, and that alone where the unchecked and undivided power of the Federal Government can operate. Yet, even here, Mr. P. thought it to be the duty of Congress to be exceedingly cautious that the tendency of its legislation should not be injurious to the interests of the adjoining States, except in cases where some general principle, or the paramount interests of this District, required it. In his opinion the bill embraced such a principle, and one which ought not to be yielded, although he could not perceive, nor did he believe it possible, that the bill without the amendment could produce any injurious effects upon the interests of Maryland and Virginia, or any other slave-holding States.

Indeed, as it regards this District alone, he confessed that it was chiefly an abstract question of principle, because, from the facts which he would presently state, it would satisfactorily appear, that, as to the practical operation of the bill, it was not very important whether the amendment prevailed or not; but for one he could not willingly adopt the principle, that slaves and free persons should not be put on the same ground as to punishment for crimes.

Mr. P. went on to observe that, in the former discussion upon the bill, honorable gentlemen seemed to suppose that if slaves were sentenced to the penitentiary for crimes, their numbers would be so great as to fill up the present establishment, and render it necessary immediately, and at great expense, to commence the building of more. How do facts sustain this argument? The truth appears to be, that there are very few slaves in this District, in proportion to free persons, who are brought before courts of justice for the commission of offences, and this fact was highly creditable to their masters, who exercised such salutary guardianship over the conduct and morals of their slaves, and removed from them the temptation arising from want, by providing so well for their comfort. Mr. P. said he had addressed a letter of inquiry on this subject to the Clerk of Alexandria county, (Mr. Lee,) a lawyer of high respectability, whose answer he wished the Clerk to read to the House, and which was accordingly read, as follows:

"ALEXANDRIA, 24th April, 1830.

"SIR: I have received your letter of the 23d instant. Time will not admit of my making as particular an examination as I wish, to enable me to give a very accurate reply to your inquiry. What I shall now state is from general recollection. Slaves, by the law in force in this county, are, for misdemeanors, punishable in a summary way by a single justice, out of court, by stripes, at the public whipping post, not exceeding thirty-nine. Therefore, such cases do not come before the court, or become publicly known. I have inquired of one of the magistrates who has been many years acting, and is an efficient and experienced magistrate, as to the number of slaves he has had occasion to have punished for misdemeanors. He states that he has had but one slave whipped, though there have been brought before him many slaves charged with criminal offences, that is, with misdemeanors, whom he has discharged. I have understood from a source on which I rely, that a justice of the peace for this county, who resides in the country, has said that during the time he has been a magistrate, which is about eighteen years, he has had only one slave whipped. A third justice has stated that, during the year 1829, he has not had before him more than ten to twelve slaves charged with any offence. Some of them he has discharged for want of sufficient evidence, and some he has had whipped. This magistrate does about half the business in the town. With regard to free people of color, there are some offences which are punishable before a justice of the peace, and they are but few. All others are punishable by a verdict of a jury and judgment of the court. With regard to free people of color, I can state from my observation, both when I was practising as a lawyer in the court here, and since I have held my present station, that the number of free persons of color, compared to that of slaves, charged with offences before the court, cannot be in a less proportion than of ten to one, that is, ten free negroes to one slave. As to white offenders, they have exceeded black offenders, including free and bond, in double, if not treble, the above proportion. I have been long satisfied that the lower class of the white population is much more vicious, and more apt to be guilty of offences, than either the slaves or the free persons of color; and that the free people of color are more vicious, and more prone to commit offences, than the slaves. With regard to the free people of color, they are tempted to it from the idle life they too generally lead—they steal instead of working for their living. The slaves are generally well treated, well clothed and fed, therefore have not the same motive, that of supplying their necessary wants, for becoming rogues. The class of white people I have mentioned, from the want of proper education and instruction, from the too easy acquirement of ardent spirits, and too wild a notion of what real civil and political rights are, mistake licentiousness for liberty, which produces great idleness, and this ends in crime."

Mr. P. then further stated that he had also received a letter on this subject from Mr. Hall, a lawyer of respectability and intelligence in this city, who was also a magistrate, from which he read the following extract:

"I can, however, state, that, in the course of my experience as a magistrate, there have been, in the course of three years, brought before me forty-one persons charged with various crimes, of whom three only were slaves. I do indeed remember two others who were brought before me, but the charge against them, on the face of it importing no crime, I did not enter the cases upon my docket. Slaves are punishable by whipping; and, since I have been a magistrate, only one instance has occurred in which that punishment has been ordered by me."

In addition to this, he read the following extract of a letter from Mr. Swann, the District Attorney, who [Mr. P. remarked] was well known to many of the members of this House—"You ask what number of slaves, in proportion to free persons, are presented for crimes in this county. My impression is, that the proportion is very small—I should think not one-twentieth. In the number of presentments made to a court, amounting to from sixty to eighty, we seldom have more than two or three cases against slaves. The free colored people are more numerous; and the greater portion of cases that are presented for crimes of a felonious character, are against that description of people—that is, free colored people."

Thus it appears [said Mr. P.] that crimes in this District are principally committed by the idle and dissolute free blacks, and a still more wretched and degraded class of white people; and this must naturally be the state of things where slavery exists, to discredit labor, and especially where miserable free blacks and whites are found in such numbers as flock into this District in pursuit of temporary employment or plunder. These facts confirmed the position, that, as to the practical operation of this bill, it is quite unimportant whether slaves are embraced by it or not; and also show, that the apprehensions of gentlemen, that the penitentiary would become crowded with slave criminals, are utterly groundless.

Several gentlemen had contended that the incarceration of slaves in the penitentiary would be little or no punishment to them—that they are slaves of individuals now, and would then only change masters, and become the slaves of Government—that they are now required to labor, and would only be compelled to do the same in the penitentiary.

In answer to this argument, Mr. P. observed that the suffering of a penitentiary felon depended not only upon his moral and physical sensibility, but upon the comforts and enjoyments of life to which he had been accustomed, and of which imprisonment had deprived him. Upon these principles, he submitted the question to the House with confidence, whether the slaves here would not suffer more than the class of criminals coming from the free blacks and whites. In truth, [said Mr. P.] if the principle he contended for, that there should be but one rule of punishment for all those classes, were objectionable, it must be upon the ground that slaves would suffer most; and hence that the law would operate unequally.

It is claimed by gentlemen, that while they are opposed to slavery in the abstract, and justly consider it an evil entailed upon them by their ancestors, from which it is difficult, if not impossible, to escape, yet that their slaves are surrounded by numerous enjoyments—that they are honest, industrious, contented, loyal, attached to their masters, and to each other. This is not only undisputed, but the facts already stated seem to confirm it—so far as relates to this District. What punishment then could be more severe upon such slaves, than to incarcerate them in a penitentiary, where they would be cut off from all domestic enjoyments and social intercourse, confined at night to a dark and solitary cell, compelled to labor through the day in silence; and this labor and solitude continued, with unbroken monotony, for months or years, without even being permitted to receive the slightest intelligence from their homes, their families, or their masters?

Would not this slavery to the Government be less endurable, than that condition of domestic slavery, which, by the principles of humanity and the force of public opinion, had become so greatly ameliorated, and of which we have heard such interesting accounts?

It was proposed [said Mr. P.] in a former debate to exempt slaves from the punishments proposed by this bill, and extend over them the existing penal laws of Maryland and Virginia, under a mistaken belief, at least so far as relates to Virginia, that those laws, since the jurisdiction of Congress was assumed over the District, had become greatly ameliorated. It was then intimated to him [Mr. P.] by a gentleman from Virginia, that the laws of that State, in regard to slaves, which had been enacted for the last twenty or thirty years, were more severe than they had been previously, and which had been occasioned by some actual or threatened commotion among that class of people. This had led him [Mr. P.] to examine those laws; and he must say, that, if the laws of this District, regarding slaves, as had been justly remarked, were written in blood, the present laws of Virginia on that subject were of a still more sanguinary character. By this, he meant no disrespect to that patriotic State, with whose constitutional laws the General Government had no concern, whether they be wise or unwise; of that, each State is the best and only judge. But when it is proposed to adopt those laws in this District, they become a fit subject of remark. It will be found by the present penal code of Virginia, that in most, if not all the offences for which free persons are punishable by confinement in the penitentiary, slaves are made punishable with death. Mr. P. named several of those offences, such as horse stealing and other larcenies, maliciously setting fire to any bridge, barn, shop, stable, stack of wheat or corn, feloniously breaking open any storehouse or warehouse, forgery, counterfeiting, and embezzling property; but he would not detain the House with going over the whole catalogue. But in framing and executing any system of criminal jurisprudence, [said Mr. P.] the great and leading object should be public security. The second section of this bill relates to the crime of assault and battery, with intent to kill. Here the amendment is first proposed to exclude slaves from its operation, and this very section illustrates the above principle. When any person, whether bond or free, evinces such a violent temper, or malignant heart, as to lead them to the commission of desperate and dangerous offences, public security forbids their running at large; they should be withdrawn from society, either by confinement or death. Such cases are referred to in this section, and also such as attempts to poison, and like cases, which show a malicious and reprobate mind. In many of the least aggravated of these cases, the public feeling would revolt at inflicting the punishment of death; and, therefore, if the amendment prevails, slaves committing those crimes would go unpunished and unrestrained, ready for the perpetration of other offences, as revenge, malice, or passion might prompt them. And does not public security and individual safety forbid this?

As regards the wishes of the people of the District, to which reference had been made, he could not undertake to speak with certainty. The bill, as originally reported, has long since been published in the newspapers, as well as the previous discussion on this very question, and no objections to the original bill had come to his knowledge: from this, and also from the fact that frequent expressions in its favor had been made to him, [Mr. P.] he was led to believe that a majority of the people in this District were in favor of the principles of the bill. He regretted that any excitement should grow out of this discussion, and dreaded protracted debate at this stage of the session, which he hoped might be avoided, and the question taken. The bill was of great importance to the District, and there were various other bills also, which its interests called loudly upon Congress to pass, and which could not be done till this was disposed of. Mr. P. said, he would not further trespass upon the attention of the House, and occupy that time which he had expressed a hope would not be done by others.

Mr. POLK thought that the matter should be viewed as one of expediency only, as one for the punishment and prevention of crime alone. In all the States in the Union, where slavery existed, instances could be found where the slave was punished by imprisonment; and that fact spoke more to the purpose than a long argument upon the subject. A slave dreads the punishment of stripes more than he does imprisonment; and that description of punishment has, besides, a beneficial effect upon his fellow-slaves. Mr. P. went on to take a review of the offences designated, and the punishments prescribed, by the bill, and contended that its provisions did not amount, and could not be considered as amounting, in these particulars, to such an efficient restraint as was necessary under the peculiar circumstances of such cases.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that the citizens of the District had had the bill before them for some time, and had not complained of its provisions. Formerly, cases had occurred in which crimes had been committed with a design on the part of the perpetrators to be sent to the penitentiary; but such was not the case now. Solitary confinement and hard labor were punishments sufficiently severe, to deter even slaves from the commission of offences which would subject them to such inflictions.

Mr. PEARCE said, he did not rise to protract the debate, and regretted the necessity which existed, requiring him to trouble the House with any remarks whatever. It will be recollected [said Mr. P.] that the committee who reported this bill, (and a majority of them are from slaveholding States,) were opposed to this amendment. The chairman of the committee [Mr. POWERS] informs us it did not receive his sanction, and does not come here under his auspices. But the Committee of the Whole House have adopted it, and we must now either adopt or reject it. The amendment prefixes the word free to the word persons, so as to make the bill read all free persons, instead of all persons, as the same was reported, who shall be liable to penitentiary punishments. What will be the operation of the amendment? Sir, the slaves of the District will be left to the same punishments, after this bill, with the proposed amendment, becomes a law, they are now liable to. Yes, sir, to the sanguinary codes of Virginia and Maryland, not as they now exist, but as they did exist thirty years ago, when the ten miles square were ceded by those States to the General Government. We learn from the annual report of the trustees of the penitentiary in the District of Columbia, that there are in the county of Washington fourteen capital offences, and in the county of Alexandria they are still more numerous. I shall not stop to inquire whether any state of things would have called for such a code. It is sufficient for my purpose, if we legislate at all, that our acts should be in reference to a general amelioration of the people here, and not a portion of them. Within the last thirty years, the laws of both Virginia and Maryland have been altered, and rendered less severe than they were thirty years ago; and the consequences of this amendment will be, to leave the slaves of the District of Columbia liable to the punishments under the laws as they now exist; laws not now in force in any State in this Union. This I will not agree to; and my opposition is not only to the manifest injustice to a portion of the people here, but to the free people who may, and who have a right to, visit this District, whether prompted by curiosity or considerations of business, which here they have a right to carry on. What is the situation of the free black? and what are his liabilities when he visits the city of Washington? The free black of the State of New York, free there, not only because he treads the soil of freedom, was born free, and has those characteristics by which man differs from the rest of the animated race, his eyes turned towards heaven, living in a land where the legal presumptions in favor of freedom are as great and as generally acknowledged as are those presumptions in favor of innocence; the moment he reaches this city, he is nigra facie a slave. Yes, sir, the complexion which "an African sun might have burnt upon him" is in this land of freedom evidence of his owing service to some one, and creates such a presumption against him, as authorizes the magistrates and officers of the city to seize and commit him to jail. If he has friends, he need only lay in jail until he sends home, and by the aid of those friends procure such testimony as will be sufficient to satisfy the authorities here that he is a free man. If he is without friends, he must remain in jail forever, or be taken out and sold for his expenses, and sent wherever his purchaser may reside. This is not all. If he proves to the satisfaction of those in authority that he is a free man, he is still liable to be sold for jail fees and expenses incurred during the period of his confinement. These are the present operations of the laws of this District. All that I have supposed might take place, a very few years ago did take place, in relation to a free man of West Chester county, New York, one of the independent electors of that State, and a constituent of my friend over the way, [Mr. COWLES.] That county at that time appeared to be not insensible to this outrage upon one of its citizens, and the attention of Congress was called to the case. The Committee on the District of Columbia were instructed to inquire into it; but I am now under the impression that the investigation was postponed, under an assurance that, when a criminal code was offered for the District, existing evils would be remedied. Sir, another evil will follow this amendment. The advocates of it will agree that free blacks should be punished under the proposed law, the same as whites; but will this be the case? The free black is a slave until the contrary is shown. As a slave, then, he must be tried; as a slave he will be convicted; and as a slave he will be punished, consequently, under the existing laws, if he is not fortunate enough to be able, on trial, from among the by-standers, to prove that he is not a slave. It is not for me to say that it would be unreasonable or arbitrary in the courts, with this strong prima facie proof of his slavery about him, to deny him time to prove the contrary, when his request for time must be unsupported by any thing but his own declarations; and here let me remark, that, as he is prima facie and presumptively a slave, his declarations cannot be received under oath. It appears to me, [said Mr. P.] that the tendency of this amendment will be such as to leave every colored person, whether bond or free, and wheresoever born, to the punishments of the existing laws, and to exclude them from the general operation of the law now under consideration. I solemnly declare, before God and man, I have no wish to interfere with the rights and obligations of master and slave; if called upon to declare my sentiments upon the abstract question of slavery, I should not be unwilling to make a declaration of my sentiments; but we are bound, in legislating for the District, to look to the effect and consequences of our acts; their bearing and operation upon all the people of the United States. Dissatisfied as I am with the present laws, I had rather further legislation should be altogether withheld, and the people of the District left to their fate, than participate in any kind of legislation that will warrant an inference that any of the criminal laws of the District meets my approbation. A few words in reply to gentlemen who have advocated the amendment, and I will cease from troubling the House with further remarks. They seem to suppose, that, because this District was carved out of States which, at the time of the cession, were, and now are, slave-holding States, it must be always treated as a slave-holding territory; that we are never to look forward to that period when slavery here is to be extinct. Sir, this District was not made a slave-holding territory by any act of the General Government; and the recognition by that Government of slavery in this District was not from any approbation of the system; it was the necessary result of that state of things which existed at the time of the cession. And because slavery did here exist at that time, (the cession having been made for the benefit of all the States,) have not all the States a common interest in the District? and, whenever it can be done without interfering with private rights here and elsewhere, will not the extinction of slavery here be an event equally desired by all? I am surprised to hear gentlemen coming from the slave-holding States say that punishment, by confinement in the penitentiary, will be to slaves no punishment at all! What is the imputation which this declaration renders them liable to? That slavery has such evils, and is attended with such privations, that confinement in the penitentiary so far ameliorates its condition as to make it desirable. Softened as those evils are in every part of the country, to the eternal honor of gentlemen living in certain portions of the country be it said, I am unwilling to believe there is a gentleman in this House from any one of the slave-holding States, who is prepared to admit this to be the case—that to punish slaves, nothing short of corporeal punishments can be effectual; that the slave must be maimed, burned in the hand or face, his back must be lacerated and torn, "and torn again, before his wounds have cicatrized," to be made sensible that he is punished for his crimes. Sir, on this subject, I must be permitted to differ from gentlemen who have addressed the House. In my opinion, some of the slaves of the District have all the tender and endearing relations that are common to our race. They have wives, children, fathers, mothers, kindred, and friends, and a separation would be as heart-rending to them as to us; even a penitentiary would have its horrors. Another argument in favor of the amendment is this: send the slaves to the penitentiary; and you punish the master, not the slave, whose service he is deprived of during the slave's confinement; the same argument might as well be used against all persons, apprentices, and others bound to service as slaves; and, if valid, would exclude from punishments one-half of our population. But, sir, to my mind, the best reply to this objection is this: a greater evil to society would follow, than the one complained of to the master, if he should be paid for the services of his slaves while suffering in the penitentiary for their crimes. He would not have that interest which otherwise he would have, to superintend the morals of his slaves, watch over their conduct, and direct them to the paths of rectitude. What would be his indemnity in one case, would be the community's loss. In all cases of conflicting interests, the lesser must yield to the greater. Partial evils must be borne for general good. We are told that the punishment of slaves by this confinement will lead to an increase of crimes on their part. In further reply, I can only add, that the whole penitentiary system is an experiment.

The community is divided in regard to the expediency of penitentiary punishments; and, in making the experiment, I am not disposed to make the distinction contended for between freemen and slaves.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that he had, by the amendment which he had heretofore offered, designed to confine the operation and provisions of this bill to offences committed by free persons. The House had determined, by its vote to-day, that the slaves of this District, convicted of petty offences, should be taken from their masters, and confined in the penitentiary for two years and longer, and thereby deprive the masters of their right to property. He now rose to invite the attention of the House, and particularly the committee who reported this bill, to the fourteenth section, which he read as follows:

"That every other felony, misdemeanor, or offence, not provided for by this act, may and shall be punished as heretofore, except that, in all cases where whipping is part or the whole of the punishment, the court shall substitute therefor imprisonment in the county jail for a period not exceeding six months."

He would offer no amendments; but would inquire of the committee if, by this section, it was intended to confine in the county jail for six months the slaves in this District, for any trivial misdemeanor which the policy of the laws of every slave-holding State or community had heretofore punished summarily with stripes, which he understood to be the laws of this District now in force. Suppose [said Mr. W.] the slave of the planter in Prince George's county shall be sent, by his master, to markets within the District, and he shall commit a riot or some misdemeanor, which, by the existing law, is punished with stripes, is it right that the slave should be taken from the master, and confined six months in the county jail at the expense of the owner or the public treasury?

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR said that the present bill, and the amendment which had been proposed, involved some considerations of a general character, which were more important than seemed to be thought by many gentlemen in that House. God forbid that he should for a moment advocate any system for the treatment of slaves, not only that was severe or oppressive, but which was incompatible with the utmost possible degree of lenity which the condition of those unfortunate people would admit. But legislation, in its very nature, and according to the import of the term, required that all laws should be adapted to the subject on which they were to operate. Those laws dealt with men in various situations; and under very different circumstances from each other; and both wisdom and justice required that the law should be adapted to those who were to be the subjects of it. With every disposition to practise the utmost lenity and forbearance, he could not view it as proper that the slave and the free white man should be both subjected to precisely the same punishment. What was the object of punishing at all? It was not the infliction of public vengeance. Its only legitimate and proper purpose, according to the doctrine received by every civilized nation, was the prevention of crimes. Punishments address themselves to various feelings and principles in man. Sometimes they were directed to the dread of death, sometimes to the dread of shame, sometimes to the love of property, and at others to the love of freedom. In that gradual amelioration of the penal code which distinguishes the present era of the world, the penitentiary system had been substituted for capital punishments; but many of its warmest friends, men of the mildest temper, and most compassionate disposition, after some experience of the plan, had begun to entertain strong doubts of its expediency, even as applied to whites. He might be permitted to state a fact which he had heard had occurred in Virginia, and which had a strong bearing on this subject. Some very degraded white person who had been confined in their penitentiary, the moment the period of his imprisonment had expired, and he was liberated by due course of law, immediately and openly committed some one of those minor offences which were punishable by penitentiary discipline, and this with the avowed intention of getting back to his old quarters. Let gentlemen look for a moment at the situation of a slave; at the small advantages he possessed for either intellectual or moral culture, and then say whether he was to be put upon a par, as to the regulations of society, with those whose situation was so widely different. It was in vain to complain of such a state of things. Humanity, morality, even religion, might lift up their voice, but they could not remove the evil. Slavery existed, and it was for a legislator to look at things as they were. How then were slaves to be operated upon? It was proposed to punish them by confinement at hard labor. Now, as to labor, that was the daily and almost constant occupation of a slave. It was his lot already, and to threaten him with labor was to hold up almost no threat at all. That motive was as nothing. Would gentlemen then appeal to his moral sensibilities? It was melancholy, but it was true, that the very condition of servitude itself had a powerful and invariable influence in degrading the moral sensibility of all those who endure it. On that subject, he might quote the language of the poet:

"Jove fixed this certain: that whatever day
"Makes man a slave, takes half his worth away."

Servitude, in all countries and ages, has been found to exert a powerful effect in blunting the moral sensibilities of men, so that they did not feel the same sense of degradation under punishment, as others do, who never were in bondage. They did know it to be a fact, that in a large majority of cases the sense of degradation was not sufficient to put down crime. Now, when the whole object of punishment was to prevent crimes, an appeal was to be made to one or two principles only: when no other feeling was to be consulted but the dread of labor and the dread of shame, would the House pursue a system of legislation which they had every possible ground to believe was not adequate to its end? As to this colored population, it might reasonably be supposed that those who had had most to do with them understood best how they were to be managed. Let gentlemen go to Virginia, or to Maryland, to any slave State in the Union; was there one whose scheme of criminal policy toward slaves was based on the idea of their dread of degradation? He did not know of such a State. Experience, that surest and safest guide, where it could be reached, should ever be consulted and heedfully regarded; and all experience in this matter spoke but one and the same language. Mr. B. said that there was not a feeling in his heart, that did not revolt at the very idea of any cruelty or oppression toward those unhappy people. But if gentlemen would rely on mere speculation, even speculation itself, if based on true philosophy, would teach any man that a state of slavery had a natural, necessary, and inevitable tendency to degrade the subject of it, and to efface those finer sensibilities to which a dread of shame addressed itself. Such a fear would never prove, with respect to slaves, a motive of sufficient strength to restrain them when disposed to crime. Every aspect of the subject conspired to prove the expediency of adopting the amendment. After that had been adopted, Mr. B. said he should be prepared to agree to the mildest code, in respect to slaves, which the good order and safety of society would admit.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 28, 1830.

THE MAYSVILLE TURNPIKE.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill authorizing the subscription of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars to the stock in the Maysville, Washington, Paris, and Lexington Turnpike Road Company; when

A motion was made by Mr. MALLARY, that the further consideration of the said bill be postponed until Monday next, with the view of taking up the tariff subject; but the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. FOSTER rose, and said, that, if this were the only bill of the kind to be presented to the consideration of the House, he would rather suffer it to meet its fate at once, than to delay the time of the House by any remarks of his. But there are now on our calendar nine or ten bills of the same character, and he felt it his duty to warn gentlemen against the danger of establishing the precedent—it will only be the commencement of a system which promises to have no end. The applications of this kind, which had been made during this session, showed the tendency of this system of legislation. It has only been within a few years, he believed, that Congress had ever authorized subscriptions for stock in canal and turnpike companies; but, having done so in a few instances, others have been encouraged to apply. Sir, [said Mr. F.] some of the petitions now on your table would never have been dreamed of, had it not been for the aid you have given to the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, and a few others. But these applications having been thus countenanced by Congress, other companies think they have the same right to call on you for assistance. And have they not? Can you grant to one, and not to another? How will you discriminate? You cannot. The State Legislatures will incorporate companies for objects of internal improvements, whenever applied to; and if you take stock in a company of one State, you must do so in that of another; and thus there will be no end to the appropriations necessary to meet the calls that will be made upon you.

The road now under consideration is to extend only sixty miles; but we have been already told that this is only the middle link of the great chain that is to extend from Zanesville, in Ohio, to Florence, in Alabama. What then is to be the direct and almost necessary consequence of passing this bill? It requires no spirit of prophecy to predict. In a short time, a company will be formed, and incorporated by Ohio, to extend the road from Maysville to Zanesville. Other companies will be incorporated by Kentucky, Tennessee, and Alabama, to construct the portions of the road lying within those States from Lexington to Florence—and then come the applications of all those companies to take parts of their stock. And can you refuse?

But again, sir: Authorize this subscription, in a few days the bill to aid the Baltimore and Ohio railroad will be presented for our consideration. That is a great work—and we shall doubtless be told it is one of national importance, too. Next comes the Charleston railroad—and upon the heels of that the Ogeechee and Altamaha canal, with several others. All, he supposed, national works; and all having equal claims (some of them perhaps stronger) with those of the road now under discussion. Do not gentlemen see [said Mr. F.] that they are embarking in a system of legislation to which there is no limit? Mr. F. had also constitutional objections to all bills of this character, but he should not urge them, because he was satisfied that a decided majority of the House believed it was competent for Congress to make appropriations for internal improvements. He, however, understood this same majority to limit the exercise of this power to objects strictly national. Mr. F. was not certain that his mind was sufficiently discriminating to distinguish between national and local objects—but certainly if there could be a public work projected which was not national, it was this very road. A national road from Lexington to the Ohio river! A road on which no troops are to travel—no munitions of war to be transported; and which, in a word, is to answer no national purpose whatever. The idea is absurd; and he begged the House not to be misled by the character sought to be given to this work.

There was another circumstance to which Mr. F. wished to call the attention of the House. The stock of this company (in which we are now about to make the Government a partner) is divided into three thousand shares, and Congress is petitioned (and the bill so provides) to subscribe for fifteen hundred shares—just one-half of the stock. Now, if we so far yield as to sanction this application, the work will be commenced; and should there be any difficulty in disposing of the remainder of the stock, the company will again look to Congress. You will then be told, that, as you have already invested part of your funds, you certainly will not see the enterprise fail, and subject the nation to loss, when it can be so easily prevented by additional contributions: and thus in a short time companies will project works of internal improvement, obtain from their State Legislatures acts of incorporation, and Congress must supply the means of accomplishing the object. But we have been gravely told that the proposed subscription will be a profitable investment of our funds. Now, can any gentleman seriously believe [said Mr. F.] that the proceeds of this road will ever reimburse the treasury the advance it is designed to make? To him the idea was visionary and extravagant—and he could not consent thus to put to hazard the funds of the nation. Mr. F. was no enemy to Kentucky—quite the reverse; he wished success to any work which would promote the interests and prosperity of her citizens—he hoped that this road, which was considered of so much importance to them, would be completed; and that the association under whose direction it was progressing would more than realize the great profits which were anticipated. But he repeated his protest against engaging the Government in such speculations—he hoped that the House would reject this bill, and thereby proclaim to all our citizens that they need not project works of internal improvement, with the expectation that Congress will furnish the means of executing them. It is only by this prompt and decided course that we may hope to arrest a system, which, if long pursued, will bankrupt our treasury, and ultimately subject our people to the most grievous and oppressive taxation.

Mr. COLEMAN said that the importance of this subject was deeply felt in the State of Kentucky, and particularly that part of it which he had the honor to represent. This bill was introduced [said Mr. C.] upon the petition of a very large and respectable proportion of my constituents; and the road contemplated to be improved, passes through three of the four counties of my district. A number of our patriotic and enterprising citizens have entered into an association for the purpose of acquiring and diffusing information on the subject of internal improvement in the West; and they have, at their private expense, procured the aid of one of the ablest and most experienced engineers in the Union, by whose exertions they have been enabled to lay before Congress a full and satisfactory report, and map, exhibiting the benefits to be derived from this improvement. The Legislature of the State have given an unqualified approbation of the undertaking, and have authorized a subscription of stock, which, considering the state of the finances there, is generous and liberal. These circumstances, evidencing the intense interest of the people and the State, will, I trust, justify me in the few remarks that I may present to the consideration of the House.

This is the first application which the State of Kentucky has ever made to Congress for aid in the construction of her internal improvements; and I did hope it would be permitted to pass without discussion. This violent effort to prevent the passage of this bill, by urging its unconstitutionality and impolicy in debate, was not necessary to show to the world what are the opinions of southern members on this subject. From the tenor of the argument, I am sure the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FOSTER] did not expect to change the vote of a single member. Why has it been thought necessary to oppose so vehemently this measure, carrying great advantages to the West? Why demand so imperiously a demonstration of its nationality? Is it because of that peculiar kindness of feeling on the part of the South towards the West, boasted of not long since? Or, is it to encourage a scrupulous investigation of all propositions which may arise here, requiring the public treasure to accomplish an object which is confined to a State in point of locality? I trust that gentlemen may be prepared, when they may be called upon, to justify the expenditure of millions for Georgia, when they refuse one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, in profitable stock, for the aid of Kentucky.

This is no new project which we have under consideration. The Congress of the United States have long since settled the principle of this measure. We have subscribed stock in the Dismal Swamp Canal Company; in the Delaware Canal, the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, and in the Louisville Canal Companies. But gentlemen say, every inch of the Maysville road is in the State of Kentucky. How can it be national? I answer, every inch of the Delaware Canal, sixteen miles in length, is in the State of New Jersey; and every inch of the Louisville canal is in one county, nay, I believe in one city. How can they be national? Yet Congress have subscribed for stock in both of them. I have said that this is the first application for the interest of Kentucky. I did so, sir, because the funds applied to the Louisville canal are not so much for the benefit of that State, as for that of Pennsylvania, Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, and other States. In truth, sir, it operates against Kentucky, because it operates against Louisville, our most important commercial city.

Nor does this work, now under discussion, promise exclusive advantage to Kentucky. If accomplished to the extent contemplated by this bill, it will greatly conduce to the interests of Ohio, and all the States situated westwardly of us. We claim some attention from this Government; we contribute largely to fill the public treasury; we, in other respects, perform our part as a member of the confederacy, and can see no reason why our interests should be overlooked. Not as a gratuity, but as a right, we ask it.

Not content with the establishment of the principle heretofore, gentlemen insist upon a re-argument of the question: I do not consider it a difficult task to evince the nationality of this measure; but I do regret the necessity of consuming the time of this House in the discussion of a question which has been repeatedly settled heretofore.

Am I wrong, when I suppose the States of this Union to be members of the same great family; and that to promote the interest of any one in relation to an object which is national, should be desired by all the rest? I take it, that the Federal Government is one, yet composed of various parts; and that whatever tends to ameliorate the condition of one part without oppressing another, or others, ameliorates the general condition of the whole. From this position, which appears to me to be as evident as any argument can be, which may be adduced to prove it, I infer, that a permanent improvement erected in any one of the States, is, to a certain extent, a national benefit. For purposes which the General Government has deemed national, three great road routes have been projected. One from this city, the seat of the General Government, to pass through Maryland, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Ohio, and so on, until it strikes the Mississippi above the mouth of the Missouri. Another from Buffalo, through this city, to New Orleans; and a third to connect the two former, branching at Zanesville on the one, and uniting with the other somewhere in the State of Alabama. This last mentioned route passes through Chillicothe, on the Scioto, crosses the Ohio at Maysville, passes through Lexington, through Nashville, on the Cumberland, and through Florence, on the Tennessee. These points are known to this House to be places of great importance, and situated on streams admitting of fine navigation. Perhaps, sir, the most important part of this route is that between Maysville and Lexington. If the main route be national, (and I do not understand that any deny it,) this part, as a part, and with an eye to its extension, must assume the aspect of nationality; and every argument in favor of these great roads is equally applicable to each and every part of them, and especially those parts which are immediately connected with our navigable streams.

Recollect that if ever again this country shall be visited by the awful calamity of war, that war must unfurl its banners on the sea coasts, or on the shores of our northern lakes. If on the latter, as was the case in 1812, this road will again become an important military road. Your troops, I mean national troops, sir, your munitions of war, your provisions for your army and navy, must be transported along it, at least as far as the Ohio river; and thence, by land, to the lakes, if circumstances are favorable; but if not, by ascending the Ohio a few miles, you may avail yourselves of the grand canal through the State of Ohio. Or, if attack be aimed at New Orleans, and recent occurrences evince that that may be the case, a road from the interior of Kentucky to the Ohio river is equally important, if the services and supplies of that State are important to our general defence.

The right to erect fortifications, in time of peace, for the common defence, is assumed, and rightly so, by southern gentlemen. Are fortifications more efficient means of self-protection than good roads, over which, with the rapidity of thought, your infantry, your cavalry, your artillery, your peasantry, in the form of militia, may be carried, from point to point, as emergency may require? How many fortresses, strong and costly, have been yielded up to the enemy, because of the impossibility of sending to their aid in time reinforcements of soldiers, with arms and ammunition, the best of all fortifications? A right view of this subject will show us that the very best means of defence is to make your great highways good; so that in the shortest period of time, and at trifling expense to the Government, the whole energies of the country may be concentrated to any one point which may be exposed to danger from attack. And, sir, the accepted time to do this, is, when we are at peace with all the world, and when our coffers are full. We shall always be more secure in the enjoyment of the blessings of peace, when we are in fact, and when the world knows us to be, prepared at all points for a state of war.

The road under consideration is a part of the road from one important commercial situation on the Ohio to another still more so, if possible. The road from Maysville to Louisville, passing through Paris and Lexington, two important manufacturing towns; through Frankfort, the seat of Government, and Shelbyville, is doubtless the most important road in the State of Kentucky, and perhaps equal to any of the same extent in the western country. A very great portion of the goods, salt, iron, and other articles consumed in the State of Kentucky, is landed at Maysville, or Limestone, as it was called in the early settlement of the State, and thence seeks a land transportation to the interior. A vast quantity of the produce and manufactures of the interior is brought to this place, to be shipped for New Orleans; and when the Ohio canal shall be completed, the quantity will be much greater, as much produce will be sent to the North through that canal and the lakes.

All the groceries used above Louisville are landed at that city and Maysville, and from those places seek a conveyance to the interior along this route; and the produce and manufactures of a very rich country are shipped at Louisville for this lower market. In truth, sir, the quantity of produce and goods transported upon this road, and the travelling thereon, equal those on any road in the western States; I might say in the United States. I furnished my colleague [Mr. LETCHER] on the Committee on Roads and Canals, an accurate estimate of the travelling on this road, near Maysville, for thirty days, several of which were unfavorable, in consequence of inclemency of the weather. This table shows that, in that period of time, the number of persons that passed was nine thousand four hundred; of horses, twelve thousand eight hundred; and wagons and carts, one thousand five hundred and seventy—making an average per day of three hundred and seventeen persons, four hundred and twenty-seven horses, and fifty-two wagons, besides stock, carriages, &c. I refer gentlemen to the report of the United States' engineers, (Long and Trimble,) made during the session of 1827-'28; in which they say that the road from Maysville to Lexington is more travelled than any other of the same extent in the State of Kentucky. These facts are evidences that the stock of this company must be good. From the best information which I have been able to obtain, it must yield six or eight per cent. clear of all contingent and current expenses for repair. It will be borne in mind that the report of Mr. Williams, which I have had laid on some of your tables, as well as that of the United States' engineers, shows that the abundance, convenience, and durability of materials for constructing a road, justify the idea that the work can be effected at comparatively little cost, and that, when constructed, it will require but a trifling expense to keep it in repair for many years. If these facts do not incontrovertibly evince the commercial importance of this road, I acknowledge my disability to comprehend what is entitled to these appellations; and they show that these advantages may be obtained at a very inconsiderable comparative expense. If Congress have not the power to create for this nation such commercial facilities as are contemplated by the bill, then am I at a loss to know what rights were designed to be given, under the power to regulate commerce among the States.

This road is the great national mail route from the East to Kentucky, and all the States west and northwest of us. But, sir, what is your mail? Is it a national or a State concern? or is it of any consequence to either? I may differ with gentlemen on this subject, when I suppose the mail establishment appertains to the General Government, and that it is the most valuable department of the Government. It cannot be denied that whatever contributes largely to diffuse information among the people, on the interesting subject of manufactures, arts, literature, commerce, agriculture, and our political relations, is richly worth the attention of this House, wise as it may be, or be supposed to be. In a country where the Government depends upon the will of the people for its efficiency, and their intelligence for its beneficial influences, is it not a consideration of deep magnitude, to liberalize that will, and enlarge that intelligence, to the greatest extent of which they are susceptible?

In my humble conception, nothing can so largely conduce to the accomplishment of these ends, as the constant, I may say daily, intercourse which takes place among all parts of the United States, through the agency of our mail establishment. Sir, as your population presses onward and onward, the same wise policy which first induced the institution of this department, will require its extension. You must keep up that intercourse among all parts of our vast country, especially in the new; because, in a social, commercial, and political point of view, it is essential to our existence. Much has been done in this respect. In 1795, we had seventy-five post offices, and eighteen hundred miles of post road. Now we have eight thousand four hundred post offices, and one hundred and fifteen thousand miles of post road. An immense improvement in the system! Yet, more may be done with ease and advantage. We can yet aid the Postmaster-General to render his department still more useful, by improving the condition of our great mail routes; thereby expediting its progress, and diminishing the cost of its transportation. These, of course, leave more time and means to supply those parts of our common country which are now totally without, or, if supplied at all, to a very partial extent. I feel authorized to say that the saving on the transportation of the mail between Lexington and Maysville would approximate very nearly the interest on the sum now asked, independent of the increased celerity, and all its consequences. And it should be recollected that the chief advantage which the Government proposes to derive from the post office establishment, is not the saving in dollars and cents, but such advantages as would have induced its adoption, if it had been a dead expense to us to the extent of its income, which, I believe, is adequate to defray its vast expenses; advantages which, like our health and our freedom, we are not apt duly to appreciate, until we are deprived of them. Let this country be deprived of this great engine of intercommunication, and we shall, by the contrast, be able to place a proper estimate upon its value, and the high national importance of its utmost extension. In relation to this particular road, let me say to you, that for several months in the year it is impassable. Your stages are obliged to leave it, and seek a passage through farms, and along unfrequented ways; thereby subjected to innumerable delays, difficulties, and dangers. Convinced of this marked inconvenience, the Legislature of Kentucky, aiming at a removal of the evil, has subscribed for stock in this company. Will this Government, infinitely more able, to whom the regulation of the mail particularly belongs, refuse to contribute her portion to this work, when, in its accomplishment, more benefit will accrue to the General Government than to the State, or to individuals through whose landed estates it may chance to pass? It cannot be that this Government will use the road daily, contribute to render it impassable, and withhold its mite to repair and amend its condition. Sir, the sum now asked is but a mite, when compared to the immense sum annually expended on that road in the labor of our peasantry.

Let me present another view of this subject. We have repeatedly heard that the public lands were pledged to pay the public debt, and that the debt was burdensome. I infer from that fact, that the lands are relied on as a source of revenue. It is not necessary for my purpose to discuss the propriety of throwing them more rapidly into market, reserving them, or pursuing the present system. Suffice it for me to know that the Government is converting them into money as fast as practicable, to extinguish the national debt, and to aid in defraying our current expenditures. It must be important, with this object in view, that the value of our lands should be augmented in the increase of the price, or in the inducement to a prompt and ready sale. They are now a dead capital on our hands, since the millions of acres which are unsold yield nothing to the Government, and are free from taxes. If they were immediately sold, not only could your national debt be paid off promptly, but a sum would be left in your treasury, which, if properly funded, would accomplish very desirable objects.

Can any plan be devised to effect this more certainly

than to remove the obstacles in reaching those lands? Make it easy, convenient, and cheap, to visit your new countries, to remove families to them, and you present new and powerful inducements to purchasers. Recollect that many of our fellow-citizens are poor, and in the North and East earn a precarious livelihood by daily labor. Such men will become purchasers of your lands—domiciliated citizens beyond the mountains, independent cultivators of the soil, if you will make it practicable to get to those lands. But, in the present condition of the roads which lead in that direction, the expense of removing a family is so great that it forbids emigration to the poor.

Here another view of this subject, distinct in its importance, yet intimately connected with the sale of our public lands, suggests itself to my mind. It is the encouragement of western population. Warm has been the contest whether the North or the South, by general legislation, has contributed most to the population and prosperity of the western States. If western population ever was a subject of national importance, I presume it has never lost it, and that it still is a subject of general legislation. Every writer on political economy—every politician, theoretical or practical, has treated the increase of population as a matter of primary magnitude. It will not do at this advanced period to resort to argument to prove that the population of a country is its wealth; its population, enlightened, liberal, brave, and intelligent, its chief defence, its greatest honor. These are political axioms, which do not require either argument or illustration to force them upon the mind. They are taken as self-evident, and used to elucidate other positions; and allow me to use them for that purpose on this occasion. I take for granted that this Government does not look with an eye of indifference on western population; but that whatever will promote it, will be considered natural in its aspect. What inquiry is left? None which involves the power of the Government to act; but simply one of expediency. I trust that our friends from the North and the South will embrace this favored opportunity to evince the sincerity of their attachment, and the earnestness of their professions of kindness. The whole West is looking to this measure, small as it may seem to some gentlemen, with intense interest, because it will be the spring to a new era there. Our object is to encourage population, and to dispose of our public lands; and the question is, how shall these be accomplished? I have endeavored to show that the most efficient plan will be to afford facilities in the progress to your fertile and productive lands in the West; in other words, improve the great highways which lead in that direction. I shall have done with this part of my subject, when I present one illustration of its constitutionality and policy. We have a right to set apart every twentieth section of our public lands for opening and improving roads to and through them, for the convenience of the settlers. Because that amount, expended in this way, enhances the value of the residue, of course, operates as a bounty upon the purchaser, and increases our population and wealth. This would be an authorized exercise of power, and no doubt can exist as to the wisdom of such a measure. Let us then suppose that the twentieth sections are sold—the proceeds in the treasury, having the same objects in view—population and sales of public land—will it not be equally authorized, and equally wise, to appropriate the proceeds of the sales to the same purposes?

From the consideration of lands, I pass to their productions. Important as are our manufacturing and commercial interests, they must yield to the agricultural interest of this country. I assume this position, not having time to illustrate and demonstrate its correctness; and propose to deduce from it some evidences favorable to a system of internal improvements west of the mountains. The inducements to an agricultural life are manifold—ease and independence, freedom from turmoil and excitement, abundance and contentment. But the master spirit which stimulates to this, as to most other pursuits, is profit. Certainly it is, of all other employments, most favorable to virtue, independence, and to freedom; therefore should command a favorable consideration. If the prices of produce do not justify cultivation to a greater extent than will suffice for the wants and necessities of life, no more will be produced; and farming, as an occupation, must decline. If, however, the prices promise to pay a rich reward for his labor, the farmer will be content to grow merely what may supply the necessities of life. He has an incentive to extraordinary exertion, and, in obedience to it, calls all his energies into action. The first consequence is increased industry, which is followed by increased productions, and a bountiful augmentation of profits.

But your most fertile soil is remote from your sea coasts and from your navigable streams. High prices cannot operate as a stimulant upon the cultivator of the interior. The cost of land transportation to market, or to a navigable water, consumes all his profits. He cannot come in competition with those more favorably situated for market; and he abandons the idea of cultivation for market, and not unfrequently altogether. In this way, your very best lands lie uncultivated and neglected. If you progress in the system of which this bill is a part, an important part to the western States of the Union, you will diminish the cost of transportation, and, to that extent, increase the profits of the agriculturist, and bestow a bounty to the pursuits of husbandry. You will extend to the interior regions some of the advantages enjoyed by those who reside near the sea coast and navigable streams; you will develop the productive energies of all portions of the United States; you will increase the amount of your exports, and distribute with the hand of equality the benefits of diffused wealth to every portion of your fellow-citizens; and, as a consequence of the whole, you elevate the character of that class of the community in national estimation, upon whom, in part, the country depends for the permanency of its political institutions. Here I am led, by a very natural association, to pay a passing notice to a work of internal improvement, the most brilliant of the age. I cannot be particular; but if I were called upon to select the work which is most useful to the United States, now in execution, I would select the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. Its utility, in two respects, is very striking to my mind. First, as a means of transportation between the ocean and the western waters, with all its commercial advantages, and then, sir, as a bond of union between the East and the West.

I have no doubt, and I judge from what mine own eyes have seen, that this work is to be accomplished, and that its realities are to be entirely equal to all the anticipations of its most sanguine friends and patrons. In this event, the productions of the valley of the Ohio are to be brought into successful competition with those of Frederick, Prince George's, and Anne Arundel, immediately around the flourishing and enterprising city of Baltimore. Not only will the cost of transportation be surprisingly diminished, but, what is very important to the cultivator, the time of sending his produce to market may be selected to suit his convenience, and the particular demand of the article he may produce for sale. Whilst the main object I have in view is to induce a subscription of stock in the Maysville road, peculiarly as a western improvement, I cannot omit (as this may be the only opportunity I may have) to express a sincere hope that the Baltimore road may receive that attention here, which a great republic ought to bestow upon a public work, whose magnificence is equalled only by its utility.

Before I resume my seat, allow me to take another view of this subject. I have been educated to place a high estimate upon the union of our States, and to desire its perpetuation. The impressions of this my early instruction, proceeding from a source which, in every way, I loved to regard, have grown into fixed and unalterable principles. My judgment confirms them, and my experience and observation here have taught me that our ablest and best statesmen may be well employed in devising means to ward off all indirect attempts to weaken the bonds which unite us together. If I mistake not, this Government will find it prudent to encourage and appropriate funds to promote a more easy and expeditious intercourse between the capital of the United States and the capitals and commercial depots of the several States; and, further, to encourage a similar system among the several States, to connect more intimately their capitals and commercial cities; all, sir, with a view to the perpetuity of the Union. By increasing the facilities of intercourse, you bring about a contiguity which cannot otherwise exist. This contiguity and constant intercourse are followed up by a community of feeling, and, what is equally powerful over the human mind, a community of interests, accompanied by a conviction of mutual dependence, and an absolute necessity to promote mutual and reciprocal prosperity. This system of advancing internal intercourse, with consequences so happy and important to the Union, will not be deserted, because experience will never teach us that the people of the United States will be more free, more secure, or more happy, under any other form of government than under this, established by the wisdom of patriots hitherto unequalled, and consecrated by some of the best blood of the revolution.

A question involving the sovereignty of the States cannot arise or be made to bear upon this measure. The Legislature of Kentucky, by a solemn act of sovereign power, has invited the General Government to unite with them and with individuals in the accomplishment of this work. I trust, sir, that this Government will not be so disrespectful to that sovereign State, as to defend her sovereignty against her own encroachments. Having endeavored to show that this subject is worthy the attention of Congress, and to prove that the objects which it is the intention of this bill to accomplish are national in their character and aspect, and that it is due to Kentucky and the whole West that this measure should be promptly adopted, I hasten to conclude.

I come not here to eulogize Kentucky; but I am proud of my native country. She has contributed to fill the treasury of the United States, by consuming those articles which bear a duty, and has received none of the public funds. She has been liberal in promoting internal improvements in other quarters of the Union, but has never felt jealous of the prosperity of other States, or complained of a neglect of her condition and her interests. She has not withheld her vote in the appropriation of thousands for the erection of light-houses, the improvement of harbors, and other objects on the seaboard, from Maine to Georgia. And while these immense sums are cheerfully given by Congress to other parts of the country, will it be generous, will it be just, to refuse to the West this pittance, which is to give new life and energy to those States and the people, on this subject vitally interesting to them? The West, sir, is not the least valuable part of our country, nor is it the least extensive. It will sustain an immense population. Sooner or later, it will have it; and then, sir, it will wield in this capital an influence which the North and the South may be willing to conciliate. Not only in these respects has Kentucky been a faithful sister in the republic; she has, under all circumstances, promptly obeyed the country's call. Her hardy sons have felled the proudest forests in North America. They have converted the land of blood into beautiful and variegated gardens of cultivation. When few, they took a savage wilderness, and have given you, after indescribable privations and sufferings, a rich and productive State, full of citizens and soldiers. When seamen's rights were invaded, and the American flag insulted, they stopped not to quibble about the nationality of the injury or of the insult, but dropped their peaceful implements of husbandry; and though no hostile foot trampled their then blooming fields, they seized their swords and rifles, quit their happy homes, and rushed to scenes of strife, and blood, and death. None fought more boldly, none bled more freely, none died more nobly, than the generous sons of Kentucky, in defence of national rights and of national honor. But I need not dwell upon this theme, so gratifying to a native of that patriotic State. The part my countrymen have borne, is well known to the nation. It will be admired, if not appreciated, in this assembly.

I have now said what it was my duty to say on this question, so vitally interesting to Kentucky. I have performed the duty with much pleasure, arising out of the concern I myself feel in its success. More I should have experienced, if I could have believed that I did not trespass on the patience of the House. Conscious of my inability to edify or to instruct, even to a tolerable degree, I feel grateful to those who have kindly heard me through. As the representative of a populous and patriotic district, I appeal to the justice and generosity of Congress—impressed with the belief that both will be extended, if the case made out will justify. I feel convinced that my course is a correct one, else I should not have uttered one word on this occasion. I disclaim any system of legislation which the constitution does not authorize, and which, in my humble opinion, will not advance the honor and welfare of my country.

Mr. POLK addressed the House. It is [said he] with some reluctance that I feel myself constrained, by a sense of duty, to call the attention of the House more closely than it has been done, to this bill, and to the facts connected with the road which it proposes to aid in constructing, and then to submit to the friends of internal improvements themselves, whether even they, according to the principles which they profess, can give it their support. I am not about to detain the House with a speech upon the subject of internal improvements generally. A few days ago, pending the discussion of the Buffalo and New Orleans road bill, I had the honor to present to the House my views at some length upon this subject. I shall not now repeat what I then said. The friends of this system profess to apply the means of this Government only to objects of national importance. Is this road national in its character? What is the proposition before us? It is that Congress shall subscribe one hundred and fifty thousand dollars in the stock of a private company, to construct a road sixty miles in length, leading from one town to another in Kentucky. Every foot of the road lies within the interior of Kentucky. I put it to the friends of this system to say if it is a national work. If it is, then every road from one court-house to another, in Kentucky or in any other State, would be equally national. Since this discussion was commenced this morning, I obtained from a gentleman from Kentucky a copy of an act of the Kentucky Legislature, incorporating the company to construct this road. What do I find? On the 29th of January, 1829, a company was incorporated by that State, to make a road from Maysville to Washington, a distance of five miles, and the capital stock of the company was twenty thousand dollars. That portion of the road, I understand, is completed, and toll gates erected on it. On the 14th of January, 1830, but little more than three months ago, and since we have been in session, another act was passed by the Legislature of that State, extending the charter of the company, so as to enable them to continue the road from Washington to Lexington, with an increased capital stock of three hundred thousand dollars. That act is brought direct to Washington; and now, sir, in less than four months from its date, we are very modestly asked to pay out of the public treasury one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, being one-half of the whole capital stock required to build the road. And for what purpose shall we do this? Does any man pretend; will any man insult our understanding, by telling us that we are to accomplish any national object by it? What, sir, a road sixty miles long, in the interior of one of the States, a national object, indispensable to enable the Government to carry on its operations in peace, or for defence in war! Does any one so contend? Can they so contend? Yes, sir, strange as it may seem, it has been so contended by a gentleman from Kentucky, through whose district it is to pass. He informed us that it was a national work, because [he said] internal improvements are so many ligaments which bind the States together in union. Sir, there is no more ardent advocate here for the Union, and for its perpetual preservation, than the individual who now addresses you; but let me tell the gentleman that if we have no stronger ties to bind us together, as brethren of the same family, than such schemes as this, then the Union is, indeed, but "a rope of sand." A little road, sixty miles long, in the interior of one of the States, important to bind us together in the Union! The idea is really amusing. But this road must be national and important, it is said, because it is to constitute a middle section or link in a much longer road—one from Zanesville, in Ohio, to Florence, in Alabama; a part of a great cross route, of which we heard so much in the discussion of the Buffalo road bill. Now, sir, from Maysville to Zanesville, exceeds one hundred and thirty miles; and from Lexington (the other end of this section) to Florence, exceeds three hundred miles. Now, what great nationality of character would this great road, of which this bill before us constitutes, as it is said, a link, possess? What important points would it connect for the purposes of war, for that is the standard argument always urged by the advocates of this system? Does it connect any military posts, or any points of military defence? At Maysville you are on the bank of the Ohio river, where there is steamboat navigation; and at Florence you are on the bank of the Tennessee river, where there is likewise steamboat navigation; and you propose to run a road on its whole length, parallel, or nearly so, with these rivers.

It is idle any longer to talk about nationality as applicable to this system. Any thing is national that gentlemen think proper to deem expedient. A road from a neighborhood tavern to a neighborhood mill is just as national, according to the doctrine we hear every day, as any thing else. The truth is, that any thing, and every thing, according to the modern doctrines, is national, by which the public money can be profusely expended and extravagantly wasted. That seems to be the only object important to be effected. The payment of the public debt is the last thing that some gentlemen seem to think of, when they are making indiscriminate appropriations of the public funds for improvements. Another gentleman, from Kentucky, informs us that this road is very important, and national, too; and, to prove it, he reads to us from a letter from a correspondent, the number of persons who have travelled upon it in a given time. The gentleman did not inform us how often the same person passed and repassed the point at which the enumeration was taken, on his neighborhood business. He did not tell us how many were going to mill, to church, or to the blacksmith shop. Are there not, I would ask the gentleman, twenty roads in Kentucky, that are much travelled, and equally important, and equally national, too, with this? Are not the roads from Lexington to Louisville, to Frankfort, or to Harrodsburg, much travelled? and, if that constitutes nationality, are they not national, too? And where, sir, will this doctrine stop, short of making all the roads in the Union out of the national treasury? I think I hazard nothing in saying that if there was no division of opinion in this House, upon principle, upon subjects like this; if there was an express grant of power in the constitution; if all were internal improvement men, and each project was examined upon its own merits in a national point of view; there would not be found in this House twenty individuals who would vote for this bill. I doubt whether any but the immediate representatives of the districts through which it passes would vote for it; and I doubt whether even they would. But what do we see here every day? Whenever a proposition for internal improvement comes up, no matter what it be, visionary, extravagant, or ridiculous as you can conceive, an appeal is immediately made to the friends of the system, as it is called, and they are told, "you must vote for this; for if you do not, the system fails, and you cannot get an appropriation for some other projects in which your section of country is interested." The combination is complete; and this is what you call a system. Do I speak too strongly? Am I not borne out by the facts which have come under the observation of every gentleman here? It is almost useless to say to these gentlemen, if you are in favor of internal improvements, is that any reason why you should vote for every and all the visionary schemes that are presented here? Do we not see the friends of the system, in an almost unbroken body, voting for every proposition that comes before us? Why is this so? Each gentleman here, who has a road or a canal, or expects one in his section of country, votes for every other, however useless it may be, for the purpose of keeping up the alliance, so that all others may, in like manner, support his favorite project when it comes up. And this is what you call a system. Can any one deny that this is the practical operation of this thing, as we see it every day? Whenever the combinations of sectional interests of this kind, thus united in action together, shall constitute a majority, can any one fail to see the inevitable consequences? The treasury will be drained of its last dollar, and every project will be carried by means of a settled majority, each individual of that majority acting upon interested sectional feelings, and all voting for every proposition, whether it be useful or national in its character or not. There is another consideration connected with this particular bill, to which I would call the attention of its friends and of the House. Ordinarily, before Congress are called upon to engage in works of this sort, a minute survey and report upon the proposed work is required to be made by engineers of the United States.

Has even that been done in this instance? Two or three years ago, some gentlemen of the engineer corps rode through the country from Zanesville to Florence, and made to us a report of what they call a preliminary examination. That there may be no mistake about this, I beg leave to read from their report a single passage. It is as follows: "It cannot be supposed, nor was it intended, neither indeed was it necessary, that the details furnished by a preliminary examination, like that in which we have been engaged, should be attended with undeviating accuracy; nor were we supplied with the means of attaining it, in reference to any of the items contained in the tables connected with this essay. Nevertheless, the mode of exhibiting the characteristics of the several routes therein exemplified, is deemed more appropriate, and better calculated to give a clear and satisfactory view of their comparative advantages and disadvantages, than any other that has been suggested. To prevent the possibility of being misunderstood, we add, that the statements contained in the tables are to be regarded as mere approximations to the truth, rather than as facts; as the results of the most careful and attentive observation, rather than of actual surveys and measurements."

In this report of the preliminary examination, several routes and subdivisions of routes, as many as eight in number, I believe, are presented, all, of course, national. It is to have as many ramifications almost as the Buffalo road had. As a matter of course, these gentlemen of the engineer corps, who have done nothing more than ride through the country, and take general observations, consider each route as exceedingly national. And when, sir, did the engineer corps ever report against the nationality and expediency of any project, that they have ever been sent out to examine? I mean no personal disrespect to the gentlemen who compose this corps; but I must say, I have no confidence in any report they make. They are as much to be relied upon, as a body of men, as others; but their employment, their very living, depends upon a continuance of these surveys. They, perhaps, think it their duty to report favorably upon every project, to the Government which employs them. The fact we know, that they never report unfavorably, at least I remember no instance, to any project, however visionary or ridiculous. They have an admirable facility, too, of ramifying every object they examine into as many routes as possible, always taking special care to leave the advantages and disadvantages of the respective routes as exactly poised as possible, leaving the inhabitants upon every route to hope, and each section to expect, to obtain the work. I cannot, therefore, but say, that however much personal respect I may have for some of them, I have no sort of confidence in any report they make. But in this instance, if confidence were to be reposed in their reports, you are about to dispense even with this form, usually observed. The engineers themselves inform you that their examination has been preliminary; that they have made no actual survey; and they admit it to be imperfect. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. LETCHER] aware of this difficulty, has exhibited before the House, with an air of great apparent confidence, a map of a survey of this section of sixty miles of road, which, he says, was made by a private individual employed by the company. We are asked, then, to subscribe stock to a large amount in a road which has never been minutely surveyed by an officer of the United States. You are about to dispense with this prerequisite, usually required by the advocates of the system, in such projects. I mention this to show the extent to which the advocates of this system are disposed to carry these projects.

Sir, I beg the gentleman from Kentucky to be assured that I have no feelings hostile to the interests of that State. It always affords me pleasure to promote her interests by my vote, when I can consistently with my public duty here. And I am persuaded, if the whole people of Kentucky could witness our deliberations, and see the practical operations of this system, and its consequences, that they themselves, being an exporting people, and paying their portion of the taxes, would not approve it. My only object, when I rose, was to call the attention of the House to this bill, and to submit to the friends of this system themselves, whether they can vote for it. I have done my duty; other gentlemen will do theirs.

Mr. LETCHER, in reply to Mr. POLK, observed, that considering the gentleman was taken unawares, that he did not comprehend the subject under discussion very well, and only intended to offer a few suggestions, he had made a pretty long speech. He did not himself know how it happened, yet such was the fact, that the most ingenious, labored, loud, and powerful efforts in that House were usually presented by gentlemen wholly unprepared. They came into the debate suddenly, felt a deep regret that duty compelled them to offer a few remarks, and by sudden and unexpected bursts of eloquence (as in the present instance) directed a most furious blow at some highly meritorious bill.

Sir, this mode of attack is becoming so very common, that it creates no sort of surprise, and no alarm. It ought to be received for what it is worth, and no more. The bill, I trust, sir, is not to be defeated by this or any other mode of attack. Let it be examined coolly and deliberately; let it be understood, and the result is not feared. Sir, I had indulged in the fond hope, that, after the long and vehement speeches, by which gentlemen had obtained so much eclat, and self-satisfaction, and glory, in meeting and defeating the bill for the New Orleans road, their rage in some degree would have been satiated; but it seems, sir, I was mistaken; they come forth again to the charge flushed with victory, in pursuit of new honors, and armed, if not with new arguments, at least with increased zeal. Sir, they are unceasing and untiring in their efforts to prostrate every thing that looks like internal improvement.

It is true, sir, they have displayed much ingenuity in their opposition, but, perhaps, at the same time, a little inconsistency. Let us see how that matter stands. The New Orleans road was too long. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] said, in most emphatical language, we would find it a long and a lonesome road. What does he say to this? Why, that is too short. I should [said Mr. L.] really like to know the gentleman's true measure. How long must a road be, to secure his patronage?

The New Orleans road was a mud road. What! said the gentleman, after withholding your favors so long, do you intend to insult the West, by proposing to give them a mud road? Well, sir, here is one not too long, not of mud, (we have too much of that already,) but of hard, durable rock, upon the McAdam plan, and still he objects to this.

Again: When the other bill was under discussion, said the gentleman, why do you not first attempt to accomplish your end by individual enterprise? First put your own shoulder to the wheel, obtain the consent of the States, and thereby avoid all difficulties of a constitutional nature. All that is done, sir, and our shoulder is at the wheel, and we now call upon you to help us. Seventy-five thousand dollars have been subscribed by our citizens; and now the idea of the Government subscribing to aid a company of individuals, in making a road, is scouted, and indeed, sir, severely ridiculed by that honorable gentleman. He appears to think it not only dangerous, but ruinous. The State of Kentucky, sir, did not think so. She has gone as far as her limited resources will allow, by taking stock to the amount of seventy-five thousand dollars, as I have informed the House upon a former occasion. The bill takes particular care to guard against all imposition, by declaring that no money shall be advanced by the United States, until assessments and payments are first made by the State, and the individual stockholders. Where, then, is the danger, and the ruin, or even the possibility of a risk? Sir, the whole scheme has been laid before you; there is nothing concealed. It is fair, and honest, and praiseworthy, in every respect.

The gentleman has been pleased to say, this is a little short road, and that it is not more travelled than many others in the State. Sir, if any confidence is to be reposed in the official reports of able engineers, independent of the statements and the facts which my colleague [Mr. COLEMAN] and myself have had the honor of submitting to the House, this road is not only exceedingly important, but more travelled, perhaps, than any other road of its length, west of the Alleghany mountains.

It is very true, as the gentleman has alleged, that the report of the engineers of 1827 commences with an apology, by professing a want of time and opportunity to be entirely accurate in all its parts; but this is nothing more nor less than the expression of that diffidence and modesty which usually accompanies true merit. It is the same mode the gentleman himself has adopted in the commencement of his remarks; and, upon the strictest scrutiny and the closest examination, it turns out in the end to be a production of great ability, evidencing a thorough acquaintance with the subject in all its practical bearings, and most undeniably must be acknowledged to be in every particular highly satisfactory. Can any gentleman point one single instance in which it is deficient? He cannot. What more is required? Why has not the gentleman long since examined this report? Independent of its national interest, it directly and immediately concerns his own constituents. The survey is not a mere local one; such was not its object. It did not begin at Maysville, or stop at Lexington. These are intermediate points on the great route. It began at Maysville, and continued on through the gentleman's own district to Florence, in Alabama. Is there any section of the United States more important than this? If there is, I should like to know where it is. I am very sorry, sir, to see so much alarm and excitement whenever a road bill is called up in these days. Such was not the case formerly. Sir, I am much gratified in the recollection that my friend from Tennessee was not always as much agitated as he appears to be at present at works of internal improvement. I remember with great pleasure the time and place when I had the honor of standing by the side of that honorable gentleman when he voted for six hundred thousand dollars for a great canal in the State of Alabama.

Now, sir, since that period, many, very many projects, involving the same principle, have been, in various forms and shapes, submitted to our consideration; against which the gentleman had a fair opportunity of manifesting his hostility to this monstrous and alarming doctrine of internal improvement. Did he do it? No. He sat silent and contented, thereby ratifying and confirming his former course. I regret, sir, when he comes to the borders of the poor and needy West, then he takes fire, then he becomes indignant; then, and not till then, he throws the whole weight of his intellect and his influence into the scale of opposition, although this is our first application for aid.

[Here Mr. POLK explained.]

Mr. LETCHER resumed. — There was no call for any explanation. I had no intention of reproaching the gentleman for the canal vote. My only object was to show the similarity of that measure with the one now under consideration, and to revert to the pleasing recollection that the gentleman had once voted for six hundred thousand dollars for improvements in the State of Alabama. The gentleman says it was in land. Suppose it was. How does that alter the case? You take my land instead of my money. Now, I cannot for my life, and never could, perceive any distinction in principle between an appropriation in money and an appropriation in land. Where is the difference? It is all common stock, and belongs to the people. However, that is immaterial. The question before the House is not on that gentleman's consistency; that is an affair between himself and his constituents.

A word or two more for the information of the House in reference to the report of the engineers, who acted under the express authority of the Government. It was made by Trimble and Long, of whose reputation for skill and integrity I need say nothing. They are both well known to the nation. They made it out with great care and attention; and it consists of nearly forty pages, and bears every mark of the most scientific examination. In addition to this, the incorporated company also employed Mr. Williams, the late superintendent of the Cumberland road, a gentleman of high character for integrity and capacity in his profession. No man stands better. He, too, made an able report upon the undertaking, which is now before me. The gentleman complains that he has seen no accurate map of this work. Here is one almost as long as this little road itself; [holding up the map] look at it; scrutinize it; a better one was never seen. What more can be required? We have had three reports: one executed by our own special order long ago, and yet information is still demanded. But I know very well, sir, that if I answer all the gentleman's calls, and all his objections, we shall not get his vote. He will continue to call and call again, and if he is driven from one point, he will take refuge under another, and another. The gentleman, I think, sir, is resolutely determined to vote against the bill; and it is quite in vain, so far as he is concerned, to show that his reasons for doing so are wholly insufficient.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FOSTER] repeats the assertion he made yesterday, that this road is not national. It is very easy, sir, to make that declaration, but not so easy to prove it. I think I have upon a former occasion already demonstrated that it is strictly and essentially national—but if I should again establish it beyond the possibility of a doubt, I shall not, I fear, thereby secure the vote of my worthy friend, any more than that of the gentleman from Tennessee. He has, it seems, constitutional doubts. Would it not, sir, be more prudent in that gentleman to reserve his constitutional arguments for a much greater occasion that may soon present itself, in which he will have a louder call for them? It may happen, sir, before very many days, that application will be made for some millions of dollars to remove certain Indian tribes from his own State to some distant regions beyond the Mississippi; and some few gentlemen may possibly take into their heads to fancy that such a proceeding is not altogether according to the strict letter of the constitution. I refer to this subject in no spirit of unkindness, but to draw the attention of the honorable gentleman to a subject of great magnitude, upon which I shall hear him, no doubt, maintain the argument upon the other side of the question, with great ability. Sir, who has heard a suggestion within the present day, that it was unconstitutional for the Government to subscribe for stock?

The gentleman, sir, is too late with his objections. The doctrine is settled, is fixed to the contrary by the repeated action of both Houses of Congress, sanctioned by every Executive. Certainly, sir, the gentleman must know, the most enlightened statesmen, and some of the most rigid constructionists of the day, unite in opinion upon this point, that the General Government has the undoubted constitutional right to take stock in a private company, engaged in a design of public utility. It is a question of expediency merely, and presents no other difficulty.

But the road begins in Kentucky, and ends in Kentucky, says the gentleman from Tennessee; and how can it possibly be national? Why, sir, every work of this kind must begin somewhere. Where it begins, or when it begins, does not determine its character, I should think. The reason a beginning is made at Maysville, has been several times stated. The work has been commenced by individuals by virtue of an act of incorporation; which could not extend beyond the limits of the State. It is not, however, to stop in Lexington—far from it: it will progress further most certainly. Other companies will no doubt be formed to extend it from Maysville to Zanesville, in Ohio, on the one side, and from Lexington, by the way of Harrodsburg, Lebanon, and Nashville, to Florence, on the other. A bill for that purpose is indeed already reported, and will be called up by my colleague over the way [Mr. KIRKLAND] the moment an opportunity offers. And, sir, if the honorable gentleman will only exercise a little patience, he will very soon see this great road meandering its way through his section of the country. Then, I hope, one of his objections of its being too short will in some degree be removed.

But I would seriously inquire, sir, does it depend upon the length of a road or canal, whether it is national or local? What is the rule of decision? How is the estimate to be made? I should like to hear how gentlemen would reason upon this part of the subject. I humbly conceive, the length of a road, whether it be short or long, has nothing whatever to do with the fact of nationality. We must look to the accommodation it affords, its utility, its links of connexion, the various interests it unites, both agricultural and commercial, to ascertain its character. I know of no other method. The one proposed has every requisite to recommend it. It combines essentially the interests of the agriculturist and the merchant—it connects itself immediately and directly with the Ohio river, which most unquestionably is a national river, which in fact is to the West what the Atlantic is to the East. You contributed largely to the Dismal Swamp canal, and to the Delaware and Chesapeake canal—how far do they run? But short distances. How long is the Louisville and Portland canal? About two miles. When, sir, aid is asked to improve harbors, to build fortifications, to make light-houses, and to dig canals to unite with the Atlantic waters, we hear no suggestion that these are not national works. But the moment a road is mentioned, the scene is changed, the case is altered, then constitutional scruples come up, and the cry is raised at once that there is nothing national in it.

Sir, we wish to be distinctly understood: we do not now, and never have complained of the great advantages you have on the seaboard, or of the appropriations you have made for their improvement. We are proud to know you possess and enjoy them to such an unlimited extent. Though you have facilities that are wholly denied to us, we are far from begrudging them. Yet, sir, we do think, and must say, that justice should be done to us in some small degree, when we present a case so entirely and unexceptionably correct as the present. We do not ask you to give us money. We do not beg. Not at all. Gentlemen cannot rid themselves of the distressing idea that the money is to be given. No one, sir, expects or desires the Government to do any such thing, but only to aid a good work and a valuable enterprise, by a moderate, cautious, and well guarded subscription. To patronize a road, which connects an important internal city with the Ohio river, which is the Atlantic of the West, which passes through a growing flourishing country, of unparalleled fertility, a region, in many respects, of all others the most delightful and interesting, but one which is unfortunately deprived of navigable streams, upon which we can convey our abundant products to market. The result is, sir, from the extreme difficulty and delay arising from the badness of the road, our farmer is often cut out of the market altogether, and consequently his produce is left to rot on his own hands. Under these circumstances, let me ask, sir, what incentive is given to industry? No man will continue to work, if he has to sit down and see the products of his labor thus perish on his hands for the want of a market. It cannot be expected, sir. He will not raise more than he can consume. Does the farmer need no protection and no encouragement? Is his interest to be wholly overlooked and neglected? Sir, he is the first man in the community who ought to be patronized by all well regulated Governments, and the very last man who should be neglected. He is the main stay and prop of the country. When he is prosperous and contented, every interest in society is so in a corresponding degree. Sir, I would inquire, of what use is legislation? What have we to do, unless we lend every assistance to the encouragement of honest industry, and, by a prudent application of our resources, endeavor to improve the condition of our country?

I am not myself, sir, disposed to see every scheme, however visionary and extravagant, supported and maintained by the wasteful appropriation of the public money. A sound discretion must be exercised in determining upon the merits of each project that may be presented for our consideration. If it be fair, laudable in its object, easy to be accomplished, moderate in its demands, and of great public utility, why, sir, it ought to receive the helping hand of the Government. Such, I think, sir, is the one now offered to the House; and, when completed, it is not for our exclusive use. Gentlemen seem yet to labor under the erroneous impression that this is a road for our special accommodation, and they will not argue the question upon other grounds. Sir, we tell you, and we prove the fact beyond all doubt, that it will be a mutual advantage both to you and to us, that you will greatly increase the safety and the speed of the mail, and that you will save money by it to a large amount. Where, then, is the ground of doubt or difficulty about it? What do you now pay for the transportation of the mail? Have gentlemen looked into this matter? It costs you no less than eighty dollars and forty-five cents per mile along this very route. Is not this outrageous? And will you continue to pay this extravagant price, rather than aid in making this a good road? Surely you will not. A due regard to economy forbids it, independent of every other consideration. Let this work be completed, and it will not cost you much more than one-third of the sum you now pay. Your own interest, sir, ought to influence you to make the road out and out, even without the co-operation of our State and individual resources.

Kentucky has fully proved her sincerity and fidelity in this matter. She has first taken stock herself, and that to the full extent of her power, before she invited you to participate. Sir, it is well known we are poor; we make no secret of the fact, nor do we view it as a crime. It is our misfortune; and how could it be otherwise? We have no market for our commodities, and the State is embarrassed in her finances. And how did she become so? I need not explain the reason to this House. Gentlemen all know it originated in defending the cause of our common country.

It is true, sir, as a gentleman near me says, that much of the public money during the war was expended there. Yes, sir, but it turned out to be ruinous to us. Its effect was to raise every thing to an exorbitant price. We were, for a time, the subjects of a perfect mania for speculation. While it lasted, money was expended freely, and the country was excited to an unnatural degree, but afterwards there was a proportionate exhaustion; just as a patient, strongly operated on by opium, afterwards suffers a collapse of all his powers. We have not entirely recovered from this state of debility. This is the reason why we are unable to accomplish this work by our own means. But if it were entirely convenient, if our resources were ample, we ought not to do it without your assistance. The road is highly important to us, it is equally so to you, and will effect a saving in the public expense. Now, I put it to every man of a generous heart to say whether he will refuse to do an act which is right in itself, which is just, which is necessary, which, while it injures nobody, makes multitudes happy.

You have a bountiful table, richly and abundantly spread by the hand of a beneficent Providence. All the world beholds, admires, and wonders at your prosperity. The Kentuckians lent their aid in preserving these blessings from violence and spoil. We do not wish to be understood as boasting—we only did our duty. We pay at this day more than a million a year to swell your treasures—and now we come here, and ask you to spare from this wide and magnificent table but a crumb, and that to be again returned to you. Will you, can you refuse us?

But the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Polk] tells us that the national debt must first be paid. The gentleman seems to superintend that department of the Government, and to have the public debt in his own especial keeping; and if you give—no, if you subscribe for stock to the amount of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, the consequences will be awful—yes, sir, tremendous, indeed. Why, sir, how long does the honorable gentleman suppose that this sum will delay the payment of the public debt? But a day or two, even if the money were strictly a donation. Are you asked to part with any money? Not a single dollar. You are asked to advance fifty thousand dollars a year for three years, on good security, in a design patronized by the State, and in which many private citizens have embarked their fortunes to a large amount. In return, you will receive a valuable stock, together with the gratitude and blessings of your fewer-citizens. If all these considerations and inducements have no impression upon the House; I know not myself what will.

Sir, I took the liberty of reading to the House a document which went to show the great number of persons who travel this road, even in its present miserable condition. It pleased the honorable gentleman to make some severe and humorous criticisms upon it. He observed that the paper did not tell us how many of the travellers were going to meeting, and how many were going to mill. Very true, sir. Neither did it inform us how many were driven in a different direction to avoid this infamous road; nor did it point out what the wagons carried. I did not read the paper as an official document; but I have letters in my possession from gentlemen of the first respectability, which can be examined by any gentleman, to show that it is fully entitled to credit.

The company hired, as I stated before, a man of reputation for honesty, for one month, to ascertain as accurately as possible the number of persons, wagons, horses, &c. that travelled this road, and the quantity is enormous, and, to one wholly unacquainted with that region of country, almost incredible, but nevertheless true. What do the Government engineers tell you by their official statement? Permit me, sir, to read a short extract from the report.

This corresponds with and confirms the statement I have exhibited. We do not ask the House to act blindly or precipitately, but to act upon authentic information. We desire you to believe nothing that is not established by the most satisfactory proof. We feel ourselves prepared entirely to satisfy any gentleman who is not unreasonable in his requisitions, upon any and every point connected with our application, so far as facts can accomplish that end.

But this road lies within Kentucky, and therefore cannot be national, says the gentleman from Tennessee. Sir, was not the canal to which that gentleman voted six hundred thousand dollars, entirely within the limits of the State of Alabama? May not the same be said of the canal in Illinois, in Delaware, and Indiana, to all of which the General Government has been exceedingly liberal? Now I should be happy to hear any gentleman undertake to establish the correctness of the proposition, that a canal, exclusively, confined within the borders of a State, however short it may be, is always national; but a road of the first importance, of ten times its length, upon which the great mail is daily conveyed, under similar circumstances, is never so. I have said, sir, and I repeat it, the proposed road, taken with its various connexions, each dependent upon the other, makes it not only national, but an object of the first moment.

You must consider the whole design together; you must be regulated, in coming to a decision, by the principles of common sense, as you would in a case of law. You must look at the entire case, and all its circumstances, before you come to a conclusion. You must not separate the circumstances, or break the links. So it is with this road: you must not take apart its links, but take the whole as one uninterrupted chain of communication. I make no argument, sir, about its being a military road: I would not care a single cent whether it was or was not. The case is made out fully, independent of that argument. The truth is, Kentucky will never require you to make a good road to get to your battle ground; but I maintain, and shall ever maintain, that it is connected, by means of a water communication, with the whole lower country, with the Atlantic Ocean, with the Ohio canal, and so with the lakes, and all the northern part of the Union, and therefore is national. If it be not, is there any scheme of the kind in the West that can be so? Where is one more, or even as much so? Let it be pointed out. Sir, if you refuse to aid us in this,

I know we can offer you no other to which you would subscribe. No, sir, if this fails, we are hopeless.

Sir, the gentleman from Tennessee is very kind, indeed. He advises the friends of internal improvement to consider well what they are about, lest they bring their own system into disrepute, by pushing it too far. We are greatly obliged to the gentleman for his counsel. But I, for one, would much sooner take the advice of a friend to the system, rather than from one who is its avowed enemy. He tells the friends of the New Orleans road, for their especial comfort, that it is now "sleeping in death." Sir, it was somewhat cruel to raise the dead, particularly after the funeral oration had been pronounced by that honorable gentleman. I trust he will not raise a ghost to alarm the House. It seems, sir, according to the positions assumed, the whole system of internal improvement is endangered. We cannot pass a great bill, because it is too great—we cannot pass a small one, because it is too small: so it appears we can pass no bill at all, and the whole scheme must come to an end. Now, sir, I am no believer in that notion. It is the people's system; and although it may be checked for a time, yet it cannot be put down. The people will have it in spite of all opposition. I believe no man lives, or ever will live, who can bring it to an end. I believe, further, that the object now proposed is as just, as fair, as expedient, as national, as any which has been or can be proposed to us. No sound objection has been offered against it from any quarter.

Sir, I am very sorry to have felt myself called upon to say as much as I have, although I have said as little as possible. The subject is one of the deepest interest. It is looked to with intense anxiety. I have now, sir, only to entreat that the question may be taken, and let the glorious news go home to the West, that this House has extended its kind patronage to a work so useful and so much desired.

Whereupon, Mr. MALLARY called for the previous question, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THE TARIFF LAWS.

The House then again resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. POLK in the chair, on the bill to amend "An act in alteration of the several acts imposing duties on imports"—the amendment offered by Mr. McDUFFIE being under consideration.

Mr. McDUFFIE rose at half after two o'clock in continuation of his argument against the constitutionality and policy of the "protecting system," and addressed the committee two hours, without having concluded; when he gave way for a motion for the committee to rise.

THURSDAY, APRIL 29, 1830.

THE MAYSVILLE ROAD.

The engrossed bill to authorize a subscription of stock to the Maysville and Lexington Turnpike road was read the third time, and the question stated on its passage.

Mr. HALL said he hoped he should be excused for delaying the passage of the bill for a few moments only. He had no idea that he should be able to prevent its passage altogether; but, as he took no part in the debate yesterday, he wished to make a remark or two, not that he had any peculiar hostility to this particular object, for he could assure his friends from Kentucky that he would as soon vote for an appropriation for this object, as any other of the kind, even in his own district. But he rose to make some developments which he thought calculated to throw much light on the system of internal improvement generally, of which this road is a part, and which involves the principles of the whole subject.

The developments which I am about to make, [said Mr.

Maysville Road Bill.

H.] consist of emanations from the most respectable sources, from the Legislatures of two of the most wealthy and powerful States in the Union, New York and Pennsylvania. It is unnecessary for me to say, that, in presenting what I do from these sources, it is not from any want of respect. My object is to show what New York and Pennsylvania have done, and the results at which they have arrived in the prosecution of works of internal improvement, as a beacon and a warning to other States less powerful in the means necessary to the successful prosecution of these works. I hesitate not to say that no other States in the Union can push their plans of internal improvements to the extent which these States have, without the most ruinous consequences. The great State of New York, with means and appliances, physical and adventitious, which no other State in the Union has, or perhaps ever can have, will find some difficulty in extricating herself from the situation in which her splendid works have placed her. But with her resources, if she continues to exercise the wisdom in the management of her system which she has heretofore done, by applying her general revenue means as a sinking fund to her debt, and suspends the further extension of her system, she will in some few years wipe off this debt, which, if I am rightly informed, has been considerably reduced by this policy.

The report of the canal board, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of New York, of the 25th of February, 1830, presents, among other remarks, the following: "The advantages to the people of this State, to be derived from the construction of the navigable communications between the great western and northern lakes and the Atlantic Ocean, were doubtless based upon the anticipated revenue which these works would produce. It was therefore apparent, at the commencement of these works, that the local advantages, in the enhancement of the value of the property contiguous to them, would be participated by the landed proprietors and others inhabiting the canal section of the State; and that the great State community must look, as an indemnity for its expenditures, to the revenue to be derived from these works." Again: "A law was passed at the commencement of these canals, imposing a direct local tax upon twenty-five miles on each side of these works. This law was based upon the evident principle, that the property in the vicinity of the canals was enhanced in value to the amount of the difference between land and water transportation. Owing, however, to the loss and inconvenience which would result from the assessment, collection, and payment of the tax, it was never imposed; and those who have been almost exclusively benefited by these works, having been thus exempted from all direct taxation, it would seem to be an obvious principle of justice that the whole State should never be subject to taxation on account of the canals. It cannot be imagined that the people of this State ever contemplated that works, which are principally beneficial in a local and individual point of view, should impose a tax upon the whole community; and it would doubtless be doing great injustice to that portion of our citizens, who inhabit the canal sections, to imagine that they ever supposed that those in other parts of the State would be subjected to taxation to make or maintain the canals, or to extinguish the debt." The report goes on to say—"The State, in its political capacity, may be regarded as a corporation; and the same broad principles of justice, in reference to its wealth, will have perfect applicability. In a corporation consisting of many individuals, an application of the funds of the whole for the benefit of a part, would be a transgression of the principles of equity, unless the funds were invested in such a manner as to return to the body corporate the principal and interest." Again: "But the making of the canals has added to the wealth of the State, by enhancing the value of the property in the canal sections. This is true.

But as this addition of wealth has not diffused itself, and cannot diffuse itself equally among all the citizens, as two-thirds or three-fourths of the whole population derive little, if any, pecuniary advantage from the canals, it would be unjust and oppressive that works, which are thus partial in their benefits, should be general in their exactions." It will be seen by what has here been presented, that the object of the report was to present to the people of New York, in the shape of an account of debit and credit between them and the canals, or canal interests, a view of what they cost and yielded. And it is further stated—"The interests of the State, in reference to the amount of tolls which ought to be collected on the canals, will be clearly indicated by exhibiting an account of debit and credit between the Erie and Champlain canals and the State, from their commencement up to the beginning of the present year." Here follows, after some further remarks, a set of calculations, showing, according to the views taken in the report, that the "whole amount of debt chargeable to the canals on the first day of January, 1830, was twelve million two hundred and thirty-seven thousand three hundred and ninety-nine dollars and seventy cents." The report says further: "But regarded in the most favorable light in which any reasonable calculation can place them, the canals have yet done nothing towards the extinguishment of their debts; and, indeed, that they have not paid the annual interest of that debt, together with the moneys expended upon them for superintendence and repairs. That portion of debt which has been extinguished, owes its extinguishment entirely to the auxiliary funds, the duties on salt, on sales at auction, and sales of lands, &c.

In the Pennsylvania Senate, on a bill making further appropriations for roads and canals, a member, Mr. Seltzer, said, "That the gentleman from the city had given us an eloquent speech; but had sung the old song—a song which he had sung many times before. There were some notes, however, that were discordant; there were some assertions which were not founded on facts. He had told us that there were sufficient funds to pay the interest on our public debt until February, 1831. Now, sir, I deny it; I, sir, am bold to deny it; it cannot be shown to be true. We shall fall short of paying the interest this year more than three hundred thousand dollars! Now, sir, this old song is nearly worn out. It has been sung from year to year—'give us more money to extend a little further, and the canal will be profitable.' When the money has been received, and the extension made, they come here, and the song is sung over again, 'give us a little more, and it will be profitable.' The State has already expended more than twelve millions of dollars, and not one mile of canal has been completed, and the gentleman from the city wants to borrow money to enter into new contracts, and then borrow more to pay the interest. Such a course, every one knows, would bring an individual to ruin; and who could doubt but that it will bring ruin on the commonwealth?"

I have said, that, in presenting these emanations from these two great States, it was certainly from no feeling of disrespect, but rather from any other feeling. I have done it, sir, to notify the State which I have the honor in part to represent, as well as others, to take warning by the example and experience of those who have gone before them, in undertakings which, whatever these States may do, it would be difficult for others to accomplish. I have quoted these documents, and particularly the report, to show what utter delusion prevails upon the subject of internal improvement, not only in the States, but as it is carried on, or pretended to be, by the General Government; and more particularly to show the fallacy of the idea of the nationality or generality of works and objects, whose principal attribute is that of locality of place. Sir, we have heard in this debate a great deal about national objects; but what does the documentary evidence presented by the Legislature of New York teach us? That the very work which, by way of excellence, if there is one in the Union, the Erie and Champlain canal, is entitled pre-eminently to be called a national work, is yet shown by the report of the canal board to be one of local character and interest. Sir, there is not a greater source of error and mischief than the improper or equivocal use of language. It has been said by one of the most able and talented men ever produced by that country so prolific in great men, that "mankind in general are not sufficiently aware that words without meaning, or of equivocal meaning, are the everlasting engines of fraud and injustice." The words national, American system, internal improvements, general welfare, &c., are striking instances. As they are frequently used, they are words of equivocal meaning, and have been used as engines productive of immeasurable, I fear of irremediable injury to the people of this country. These words, confined to their proper use, have a distinct and appropriate meaning of their own; for words are the names of things, sir. Words are things, you know, and, misused or abused, they may be made very wicked and mischievous things. But the word national—the national good—the general welfare! Sir, what is national? Why, it would not be difficult, by a little logical legerdemain, to prove that any thing, however local or circumscribed in its character, is national. The general welfare is made up of the particular welfare—the whole is made up of its parts. What is good for the whole is good for the parts, and, converse, what is good for the parts is good for the whole. The nation is made up of individuals: what is good for the nation is good for the individuals; what is good for the individuals must be good for the nation; therefore, every individual advantage must be a national advantage. But it is of advantage to my old neighbor, that his potatoe patch or cornfield should be cultivated, or that he should have a ditch cut, or a cowpen made; his individual advantage is part of the national advantage; and then these objects become national objects, and ought to have an appropriation from the national treasury. I repeat that I have no peculiar hostility to the Maysville road, and have no doubt it is quite as well entitled to an appropriation as many other works called national. But the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LETCHER] tells us that this road is a national road, because it is in connexion with the national river Ohio. But how came Ohio, par excellence, to be a national river? How are we to distinguish which is and which is not a national watercourse? As we have heard something about length and breadth, &c. how are we to ascertain where, or when, nationality begins. Sir, I should like to know from the great father of waters in the West, down to the meanest rill or mud puddle in North Carolina, where I used to catch crawfish when I was a child, how we are to tell a national watercourse from one that is not. And, suppose, according to the gentleman, Ohio being a national river, this road becomes a national road, because in connexion with it; does not the gentleman perceive (and I say this in the same good natured way in which he made the same remark) that, by the same rule, every other road, or path, that is connected with it, must therefore be national, and that even a sturgeon living in it must be a national sturgeon. The same remark was made in regard to the Cumberland road, that eternal road—eternal as to money.

But I am extremely obliged to the Legislature of New York for the light which it has caused to be thrown upon this subject of the nationality of locality, which sounds something like a contradiction in terms. But, sir, I say that if there is any one work of internal improvement in the United States, entitled to be called, by way of eminence, a national work, it is that truly great work, the Erie and Champlain canal. And what does the exposition which has been made, show? That even in the estimate of the canal board this is a matter of local interest. And, sir, if the great State of New York, an empire within herself, after having prosecuted with so much energy, and with a success that, from the very nature of her physical position and adventitious advantages, no other State can use; if she, under all these favorable circumstances, has yet shown that this stupendous work is not only local, but, compared in its cost and profit, is as yet a losing business; I ask, what would be the result with any other single State, or, still worse, with the whole United States, cut up into roads and canals, at such rates? Could the people bear the taxation? Ought they to do it? I do hope that the people in every State, whose legislature has plunged into this system, will cause to be made out an account of debit and credit, showing precisely what they pay for the article, and what it yields. Had not the constitution become obsolete, except with a few old fashioned politicians, I would say something upon the constitutional question, because some of those who believe with me on this subject, by appearing to waive the question, may subject us unjustly to the imputation of having abandoned the ground. Sir, I have not; I never shall abandon my principles on this subject; and the more I reflect on them, the more firmly must I adhere to them. But I hesitate not to say, that, according to the practical construction of the constitution, or rather the practice of the General Government for some years past, if the people really believe that they are living under a Government of strictly limited powers, whatever in its formation it was intended to be, I have only to say that I think them mistaken. That the Government was intended by the people of the States, when they adopted the constitution, to be one of limited and specified powers, I think any one may satisfy himself, who will consult the contemporaneous history of the times. And I wish my constituents could now hear me. I desire that what I say may go out to them.

The friends of internal improvement by the General Government, claim the power principally from four sources: from the war power; the power to establish post roads and post offices; the power to appropriate money; and the power to regulate commerce. From these sources, they claim the right of the General Government to make roads and canals, improve harbors and rivers, and many other works within the jurisdictional limits of a State. The error into which those who derive the power over internal improvements, from the war power, is their improperly blending the legislative and executive functions of the Government in relation to war. These departments are to be kept separate and distinct, in this as well as in other instances. Each has its appropriate part to perform. The Legislature declares war, the Executive carries it into execution. It is his duty, being by the constitution the commander-in-chief, the head of the military establishment. Military roads, ditches, culverts, the thrown up breastworks, the occasional taking or using private property for public purposes, are means necessary to the execution of the war power; they are parts of the war executed by the military. These are things left to the discretion of the military commanders, ex necessitate rei flagrante bello, and could not be provided for by the legislative department of the Government; it results from the very nature of war. But as soon as the military is withdrawn, the General Government has no control over these things; they belong where they did before. These operations really constitute a part of the war; and to think of carrying into effect the executive functions of the Government in relation to war in time of peace, would involve the contradiction of having war in time of peace. But we all know that this discretion of military commanders is to be exercised upon their responsibility to the country; and that they are liable for any improper use or abuse of it.

The post office power—the power to establish post roads and post offices, is so hackneyed a subject, that but little is required from me now. Without going into any philological disquisition on the word establish, I will rely on its ordinary meaning, and resort to precedents. But, unfortunately, and very strangely, precedents never seem to be of any use, but for operating against some long established rule of action, under which a thousand previous acts are not permitted to have as much force as one new act in opposition to that rule. I know not how many precedents in favor of the practical use of the word establish to count. But we know, from the foundation of the Government until within a few years, establishing a post road meant the designation by law of some road already made as a mail route. This has, in many thousand cases, which ought to have the force of precedent, been the evident meaning of the acts of the Government establishing post roads. And I give a strong illustration in the case of the celebrated Cumberland road, which, if I am rightly informed, was first made, or caused to be made, by Congress, and afterwards, by a separate and distinct act, made, or established, that is, designated by law a post road, and the mail directed to be carried on it as a mail route, and so of any other road. Some seem to have a difficulty, because the same word establish is used in regard to post offices. But this will, upon a moment's reflection, be shown to be only prescribing by law the official duties or character of some individual appointed postmaster. Congress, by establishing the office, neither makes the man, nor the place where the duties are performed. In general, it does not require a great deal of room, and most of those who are willing to perform the duties, have some place to perform the duty in, or furnish it. The word establish has been therefore properly interpreted by the acts of the Government from its commencement; and, if rightly informed, I believe it is so used in that country (England) from which we received our idea of post office system. The more modern, and evidently erroneous interpretation, that establish means to make post roads and post offices, must be considered an interpolation.

The appropriating power, the most convenient for all purposes, is not a new one. It is the opinion of Mr. Hamilton revived, I think, in 1823 or '4, because it was perhaps thought more to the purpose by some. In his report on manufactures, page fifty-fourth, Mr. Hamilton remarks: "It is therefore of necessity left to the discretion of the National Legislature to pronounce upon the objects which concern the general welfare, and for which, under that description, an appropriation of money is requisite and proper. And there seems to be no room for a doubt that whatever concerns the general interests of learning, of agriculture, of manufactures, and of commerce, is within the sphere of the national councils, as far as regards an application of money."

If Congress can, at its discretion, pronounce upon the objects which concern the general welfare, and apply, ad libitum, the money of the public to their accomplishment, what is to prevent their exercise of any power whatever, which it may please them to say is for the general welfare, is a national object? They may select any end or object, and use any amount of means to arrive at or accomplish the purpose. The people intended this to be a Government of limited powers; but if, really, Congress is left to its own discretion as to the objects, with unlimited use of the means, the Government becomes as sovereign and imperial as the autocracy of Russia or Turkey. I ask, what is the difference between unlimited power, and an unlimited use of the means to accomplish whatever objects the discretion of the Government may select or point out? What is power but the use of the means to accomplish any thing? Means in use are power de facto, real, practical power.

The power to regulate commerce is one of the main sources from which the power to make internal improvements within the jurisdictional limits of the States, by making roads and canals, improving, or, I suppose, making harbors, breakwaters, improving rivers, &c., is claimed.

This subject comes more nearly home to me, and to the people I represent; and I am about to resort to high authority—the very highest, in the estimation of some—even the sovereign power, in their estimation; but not quite so high, in my opinion, as that. No, sir; not quite the sovereign power, but yet very high and respectable authority. I mean the Supreme Court. In the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, the Chief Justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, after some preliminary observations, says: "We are now arrived at the inquiry—what is this power? It is the power to regulate, that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the constitution." He continues: "If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single Government, having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the constitution of the United States." The word sovereignty, applied here to Congress, if understood as it frequently is, I do not approve of. Congress is not the sovereign power of the country, but a mere agency, with powers plenary quoad hoc over particular subjects; and in this sense the word should be understood here. I perfectly agree with the opinion of the court in the doctrine here laid down of the plenary nature and completeness of all the legitimate constitutional powers of this Government. And sir, I, for one, would not diminish one iota, nor in the smallest degree take from or diminish the powers either of the general or State authorities; but, keeping each within its proper sphere, I would adopt the old adage of sum cuique tributo. But, does not every one perceive that this doctrine, being sound and truly drawn, as I say it is, from one of the plainest parts of the constitution, is at once destructive of the claim of this Government to make internal improvements within the States? The Chief Justice proceeds, after some other remarks: "The appellant, conceding these postulates, except the last, contends that full power to regulate a particular subject implies the whole power, and leaves no residuum; that a grant of the whole is incompatible with the existence of a right in another to any part of it." On the margin we have the following condensation of the context to which it is connected: "The power to regulate commerce, so far as it extends, is exclusively vested in Congress, and no part of it can be exercised by a State." Now sir, what is the commerce, the regulation of which has been given to Congress? It is commerce "with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." This is the commerce to be regulated, constituting one subject whole and entire, totus, teres atque rotundus. The power of Congress over it is commensurate with the subject: it is full and complete, and consequently exclusive, as I say all the appropriate powers of Congress are. It follows from the very nature of things, that, if the power is plenary, it is necessarily exclusive, and cannot of necessity be concurrent, or participant, or conjointly with another. I have once before advanced the doctrine here, and I think truly, that, properly speaking, there are no concurrent powers between the General and State Legislatures or Governments. Even the power of taxation, which seems to be so considered by some, I find no difficulty with. There are powers to be exercised by both very similar, but this may be remarked in regard to other Governments. Take, for instance, the subject of taxation: it is not only similar in its mode of application and exercise in this country and Great Britain, but it is a known fact, that some of the very identical articles which yield a tax in England, afterwards also yield a tax here; but would any one undertake to say, therefore, that the two Governments are joint agencies? The two Governments exercise similar powers, each within its own sphere, but not as copartners, or concurrent agencies. "Congress is authorized to lay and collect taxes, &c., to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." But the court says: "This does not interfere with the power of the States to tax for the support of their own Governments: nor is the exercise of that power by the States an exercise of any portion of the power that is granted to the United States. In imposing taxes for State purposes, they are not doing what Congress is empowered to do. Congress is not empowered to tax for those purposes which are within the exclusive province of the States. When, then, each Government exercises the power of taxation, neither is exercising the power of the other." No, sir; but exercising distinct and separate, though similar powers; and so of the power to regulate commerce, that is, the power, as properly defined by the court, to make legal rules and regulations by which commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes, is to be governed. I see before me many talented lawyers—I would ask them whether the idea of two agencies, both with powers plenary quoad hoc over the same subject, is not a legal and political absurdity. And, sir, is there a man here who will have the hardihood to say that the States have not the right to make internal improvements within their jurisdictional limits? And, if so, does it not follow, from the very nature of the powers of this Government, that Congress cannot? The thing is self-evident. The truth is, that both Governments are agencies, with powers plenary in relation to each other, over the subjects appropriately and constitutionally to them committed by the sovereign power of the country—the people. Neither Government is itself the sovereign power, they are both subordinate to the actual sovereignty, which is in the people. If the power to regulate, means the power to make commerce, or any of its parts or adjuncts, we shall ultimately arrive at very strange results. And if, under this power, we are to make roads, canals, harbors, &c., we must go on, and, by the same rule, make wharves, piers, drays, wheelbarrows, and merchants' warehouses, as well as boats and large vessels to facilitate commerce. Commerce, in its narrowest signification, means an exchange of equivalents; but there are many things and circumstances so closely and inseparably connected with it, that they become, as it were, parts of it, or, at least, adjuncts, without which it could not get on, and they also become subjects for regulation; but regulation has been shown not to mean fabrication or construction. The Chief Justice says, speaking of the inspection laws: "They form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which embraces every thing within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government: all which can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves. Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State, and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, &c., are component parts of this mass. I believe, sir, this road, we are upon now, is to be a turnpike road.

H. of R.]

Maysville Road Bill.

I think this power has been misunderstood. The exercise of the power of this Government, in regard to internal improvements, has been evidently to me pushed beyond its proper bounds and authority. I am against extremes, modus est in rebus. I do not think Congress has the right to go into the States to exercise those municipal rights which the people reserved to themselves or their local legislatures. I will only trouble the House with one other evidence, which is directly to the point. This is from the declaration of rights of North Carolina, which is a part of the constitution of that State. "That all political power is vested and derived from the people only. That the people of this State ought to have the sole and exclusive right of regulating the internal government and police thereof." I will trouble the House no longer.

Mr. MARTIN, avowing his disapprobation of the bill, but his unwillingness to take up the time of the House in an argument against it, moved to lay the bill on the table.

This motion was decided in the negative by yeas and nays:

For the motion	85
Against it	101

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, rose to address the House, and said that he was aware of the danger to this bill, which was incurred by occupying too much of the time of the House in making speeches in its behalf; but he trusted gentlemen would pardon him, when they considered the immediate and deep interest his constituents felt in the success of the bill. He knew the state of exhaustion in which the minds of the members were, after the protracted debate; and that no gentleman, however transcendent his talents might be, (he was aware of the very small pretensions he could himself urge,) could expect from them a very patient hearing. Indeed, he felt it as the next duty to fidelity to his constituents to observe perfect silence in the House, except in cases where he could not avoid delivering his sentiments as to the constitutional question in relation to the subject of internal improvements; it had been so often and so thoroughly discussed, that it was impossible by argument to shed any new light upon it. He did not believe a single new idea could be advanced by any one. Instead of constitutional argument, he wished to substitute facts, examples, and legislative action. And he should feel happy, and consider himself fortunate, when a proposition was presented for the benefit of Maine, or Georgia, or of New York, if he could lend it any aid. For this was a great federal Union, one and indivisible; and he should extend, at all times, equal and exact justice to all its parts, so far as his judgment and his attachment to all would guide him. Wherever the salutary power of this Government was involved in the question, so long as it was regulated by discretion, he would vote for it. He never could or would consent to put so rigid a construction on the constitution, as to restrain the beneficial action of this Government when applied to the judicious system of internal improvements. Roads and canals were strong links in the chain of affection which bound this Union together as a band of brothers, and made our fellow-citizens rich, and happy, and independent. He knew that many honorable gentlemen in that House, far more intelligent than he, applied a strictness to all parts of the constitution which applied to those clauses only which guarded personal liberty—the freedom of speech and the rights of conscience. He should vote just as freely for this road if it were in Georgia, as in his own State. He had always acted on these principles; and his constituents, with a full knowledge of that fact, had honored him with a seat in that and in the other House for twenty-three years. Thus he had lived, and thus he hoped to die. He could truly say that it caused anguish in his very soul when he heard gentlemen on his right hand and on his left get up and say, "this part of the Union has been favored, and this part of the Union has been oppressed." He should be thankful to Providence if it were possible to distribute the taxes of this country with perfect and absolute equality—aye, to a cent, or to the millionth part of a cent. Then they might lie down, perhaps, on their pillows in peace, and not hear the same strain of complaint continually resounding in their ears. He hoped his friend from Georgia, should he bring forward any project for the benefit of his own State, would find him as good as his word, and always happy to lend him his aid. As to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HALL] he could assure him that he had no wish to take his money away from him.

[Here Mr. HALL interposed, and explained.]

Mr. JOHNSON resumed. If my friend suspects that I look for his vote when he thinks the constitution forbids it, he is greatly mistaken. I know the uprightness of his motives. I spoke of the effect of them only; and as to the effect, while he is willing to give me but a stone, I am willing to give him bread. I will go with him so far as I can do it on principles of magnanimity and equality; in the course I pursue, my conscience is at rest. But let any proposition be brought forward which violates the rights of conscience, the freedom of speech, or the liberty of the press, that gentleman will find me, I trust, among the foremost to defend the constitution, whether with body or mind; and give it a construction which shall guard that liberty for which we have all struggled, and for which our fathers nobly fought, and freely bled. Then my friend and myself will be found, I hope, in giving the same construction, although we may differ as to making roads and canals. But to the question. Is this road not a national work? I say, that if the Delaware and Chesapeake canal is national in its character, then this road is national; but if it can be shown that this was a private concern only, in which the nation had no interest, then I may give up this bill. So, I say, if the Chesapeake and Ohio canal is a national work, this road is such. Does it follow, that because you are now going to appropriate for sixty miles of a great connecting avenue between several States, that that avenue loses its nationality? Does it cease to be national because you cannot make it all at one time? I say that the Dismal Swamp canal was a national work, and we granted our aid to it against the will of that ancient State which is the mother of Kentucky. Yes, sir; we made her take the boon, whether she would or not. Has Virginia been injured by our appropriating money to finish the Dismal Swamp canal; just as we are going to do to South Carolina; for the citizens of South Carolina have petitioned Congress to aid them in a railroad; and a bill has been reported to give the money. I hope we shall pass on that bill, and that we shall pass it, too. Aye, sir, and there is another bill, interesting to the South, I hope we shall pass. I mean the Indian bill. Yes, sir, I am prepared to vote millions upon millions to remove those venerable relics of nations, if they voluntarily choose to go, to a region where they may remain at peace, unmolested by the intrusions, and uncorrupted by the vices, of their white neighbors. In this, too, I have the advantage of my friends to the South. Although their principles will not enable them to aid my native State to open a road, I feel free, and able, and willing to aid them in this great southern measure, as beneficial to the red man as it will be to our brethren of the South. Here, sir, is the request of the Legislature of my State that I will use my efforts to obtain the subscription of the Government to this road; she has directed her Senators and requested her Representatives to exert themselves for an object so important to the State. I ask you to grant us this little boon; it will set our whole State machinery in motion. The House is acquainted with the causes which have produced the embarrassments under which we labor; they know that these embarrassments have been incurred by exertions in the common cause of our country. They deprive us of the means of carrying into effect the improvement of the State by great and expensive works. Yet, sir, whenever similar aid was asked by other States, I and my colleagues have stood forward the constant supporters of their request. Kentucky has ever been found voting for the construction of roads and of canals, in which she had no direct interest, or local interest, except as a State, and component part of the Union. Did her neighbor, Ohio, ask our aid in advancing her internal prosperity, no petty spirit of rivalry, no mean and contemptible jealousy of the rising greatness of that State, induced Kentucky to withhold her influence and votes. The same remark will apply equally to Tennessee, her neighbor on the south. And, in the last place, permit me to remark, that I do not press this claim of Kentucky on the ground of her being the oldest of the States, after the original thirteen; that she has been with you in seven troubles, and will not leave you in seventy times seven; because she presented no request when hundreds of millions were spent (and well spent) upon the seaboard, in the erection of fortifications to defend your coast, and millions more in protecting your commerce from foreign aggression; I do not urge that Kentucky, although far inland, and secure from all danger of invasion, joined boldly in the cry, "do not give up the ship." No; I call on you to pass this bill, because the object in view is such a one as you ought to patronize. Surely this is as much a national object as the railroad from Baltimore to the mountains, and as the Ohio and Chesapeake canal; yet I voted in favor of that. I went home, and said to my constituents, this is a united country; we are all one family. I have voted thousands away, not for you, my constituents, but for your brethren in other parts of the Union. They needed the aid, and I knew you would never wish to withhold it from them. Now, sir, I ask aid for my State, and I expect help in our time of need. It is not the only appropriation I intend to ask for. My constituents are very deeply interested in other roads and highways passing directly through my district. We have no incorporated companies yet; and the time has not arrived when their claim can be presented. When that period arrives, the grant, in this case, will not at all interfere with the strong and irresistible claim they have upon your justice; and I shall not be wanting in my duty, and you will not be unjust or ungrateful.

Sir, we inhabit a fertile region—a fair and delightful habitation for man; it is surrounded not with water, but land, land in all directions, and to a vast extent. The pleasant Ohio rolls along its borders, bearing on its bosom the wealth of ten States. We wish to get at this great national highway, that we may carry the products of our industry to a market. The request is most reasonable, and you, I am confident, will not refuse it. If any State has been more liberal in her course toward the general interest of this Union, let her stand forth a monument of patriotism and public spirit. You have lent your aid to the Portland canal, to the Dismal Swamp canal, to the Chesapeake and Delaware canal. You have granted Ohio a million acres of land. You have given to Illinois, to Indiana, to all the new States. The donation to the Louisville and Portland canal was not a Kentucky boon; it was a gift to ten States of this Union, all equally interested in the navigation of the Ohio river. This road is the first object which Kentucky has presented to you. It is a great and important thoroughfare; not a road in the Union (except those between the great seaports) more travelled, and none of the same extent, by which you can more promote the public good. Under these circumstances, I trust you will not reject our bill.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, replied to some remarks of Mr. HALL relative to the cost, productiveness, and advantages of the New York canals.

Mr. HALL said, in reply, that, as the remarks of the gentleman were directed to the report emanating from the Legislature of New York, and not in answer to what he had said, he left the subject between them.

Mr. POLK next addressed the House, and renewed the argument advanced by him on a preceding day against the bill. He was opposed altogether to this system of appropriations for sectional purposes. It was a more easy matter, it appeared, to vote profuse sums in the Congress of the United States. He repeated that it was more easy to vote ten thousand dollars in Congress, than ten dollars in a State Legislature. What would be the result of this lavish mode of expending the public money—what its cause? The country looked to the present Executive for the adoption of a system of economy and retrenchment; and how could this be effected, but by the most vigilant attention? The practical operation of the system now prevalent was directly the reverse. The engineers entrusted with the surveys would not report adverse to a project, the adoption of which benefited themselves. The road in question received the sanction of the State Legislature in January last; so recently, he begged it to be observed, as January last; and yet an application was made to Congress for pecuniary aid towards its completion. Where [he asked] was this system to stop? He conceived the whole of these applications to be most pernicious in their tendencies, and unconstitutional in principle.

Mr. TUCKER reprobated the system upon which this bill, and numerous others of a similar nature, were founded. In his judgment, all such appropriations, besides being unjust and unconstitutional, were pregnant with the most disastrous consequences.

Mr. POWERS opposed the measure. He deemed it objectionable in every constitutional point of view. He spoke of the various ingenious arguments urged in favor of this project, and of others of a similar nature. The Buffalo Road bill had been objected to, because it was too long; and this one might be so objected to, because it was too short. This circumstance reminded him of the lady (And ladies were sometimes fond of complaining) whose husband was stated to find the bread occasionally burnt, and occasionally mere dough. The road had been called national in its object, because it led from one point of the Union to another. Now, he asked whether every road throughout the United States might not be said, by a parity of reasoning, to be a national road; for all of them led from one point of the country to another. This argument, therefore, was utterly fallacious. He concluded by an earnest deprecation of the passage of the bill.

Mr. CARSON objected to the bill. He was opposed to a system which went to make the Government of the Union a stockholder, from sordid views of interest, in public companies incorporated by a State.

Mr. CROCKETT said that he did not rise to make a speech upon the subject. Indeed, he was convinced in his own mind, that, if they were to speak for five days upon it, not a single vote would be changed. Every one, he thought, had already made up their minds with respect to it. He should therefore call for the previous question.

The call was seconded by a vote of yeas 101; nays not counted.

The main question, on the passage of the bill, was then put, and decided in the affirmative by the following vote: yeas, 102—nays, 86.

So the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

THE TARIFF LAWS.

The House then again went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. POLK in the chair, on the bill "altering the several acts laying duties on imports," and the amendment proposed thereto by Mr. McDUFFIE.

Mr. McDUFFIE resumed, and spoke nearly two hours in continuation of his argument.

Mr. McDUFFIE said that he entirely concurred with the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures as to the expediency of providing for the faithful collection of the revenue; but, differing very widely with that gentleman as to the best practical mode of effecting the object, he begged leave to submit the amendment which he had prepared for that purpose. I propose [said Mr. McD.] to secure a strict and honest observance of the revenue laws, not by arbitrary penalties imposed at the discretion of the officers of the customs, but by rendering the laws themselves so just, and moderate, and equitable, that the great temptation to evade them, which is now held out by the high rate of the duties, will be, in a great measure, removed. As the amendment I have offered obviously opens for discussion the policy of the entire system of prohibition and protection, I will now proceed to offer some considerations to the committee, which, I trust, they will find not unworthy of their grave and solemn consideration. I shall pass over, with a bare allusion to them, many of the topics which have been heretofore urged on this floor, to show the inexpediency of the system we are considering. The inevitable tendency of this system to destroy foreign commerce; and consequently our commercial marine and naval power, has been so repeatedly urged, and, on a very recent occasion, with such conclusive proofs and triumphant argument, by my friend from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENGE] that I will not attempt to add any thing to what he has said on the subject. Neither, sir, do I propose to go into an investigation of those abstract principles of political economy to which we have so often and so vainly appealed, for the purpose of convincing the majority of the inexpediency and injustice of the course they have been pursuing. That it is equally unwise and unjust to attempt to direct the course of national industry by Government restrictions—that individual sagacity and interest will infallibly find out and pursue those employments that are most profitable—are positions in which the enlightened writers on the science of political economy, in every part of the world, almost unanimously concur. Yes, sir, it is a singular and striking proof of the soundness of the doctrines for which we are contending, that, for the last half century, almost all the philosophers and political economists of Great Britain and France, in the midst of commercial restrictions imposed by their own Governments, have boldly maintained the folly and injustice of those restrictions. Theirs is the disinterested testimony of enlightened minds, seeking only for truth, and having no motive to pervert it. But I pass that over. Nor shall I now enter into any argument (as I have done in former discussions of this subject) to prove to gentlemen from other parts of the Union, that the interest of a majority of their own constituents would be better promoted by reducing the duties they have been so anxious to increase. I will barely state, that I do most sincerely and conscientiously believe that, even in those parts of the Union for whose exclusive advantage the existing high duties have been imposed, the interests of nine men are sacrificed where that of one is promoted by them. Nothing can be more clearly demonstrated, in my opinion, than that, even in Massachusetts, and Vermont, and Pennsylvania, the great mass of the community, the small farmers, and the persons engaged in handicraft employments, are subjected to unjust and injurious burdens, to promote the interest of a comparatively small number of large capitalists. But, sir, it is now too late to urge this view of the subject; and perhaps it would not be very becoming in me to attempt to school gentlemen from other parts of the Union in what relates to the peculiar interests of their own constituents. I shall, therefore, take it for granted that the existing system of commercial restrictions has been established by the majority of Congress, from a deliberate conviction that it is calculated to promote the interests of their constituents, and that there is no probability that the opinion of that majority will undergo a change. Now, sir, however much I may be disposed to question the rights and the powers of the majority in some other respects, I agree that they have the undoubted and exclusive right to determine for themselves what will best promote their own interests. How far they have a right to decide upon the interests and rights of others, is quite another question. I shall assume, then, as the basis of the remarks I intend to offer, that the system of prohibitory duties, which aims at the ultimate exclusion of all those articles of foreign merchandise which the southern States have an interest in importing, is the fixed and unalterable policy of Congress. I sincerely deplore the fact; but I should be guilty of exciting false and delusive hopes in my constituents, if I did not declare it. Sir, no man who will reflect upon the progress of this system for the last twelve years, can indulge the slightest hope that it will ever be abandoned by those who have imposed it upon us. From year to year the duties have been increased and the system extended, and, at each successive enlargement of the circle of monopoly, the majority in Congress has uniformly increased. So far from perceiving any indications of a reaction here, it seems obvious to me that the more odious, and oppressive, and intolerable the system is rendered to the people of that portion of the Union whose rights it grossly violates, and whose interests it is calculated to destroy, the more determined and obstinate are the majority in adhering to it, and extending its operation. Placing the question then upon the footing on which it is placed by the advocates of this system—conceding to them the right and the capacity to judge of their own interests—yielding the point, as I am compelled to do, that the prohibitory system does really promote what they regard as their true interests, I shall proceed to demonstrate, as I think I can most conclusively, that the interest of the majority thus to be promoted consists in the absolute annihilation of the rights and interests of the minority.

The Tariff.

In this state of facts, a very grave and momentous question irresistibly forces itself upon the consideration of this body: how far it is the right of the majority to destroy the separate and peculiar interests of the minority; and how far the minority are under any constitutional or moral obligation to submit to so monstrous an outrage.

Sir, I am well convinced that the people of the United States have not realized, even in a partial degree, the nature and extent of the oppression under which the people of the southern States are laboring. I shall proceed, therefore, to inquire, in the first place, what is the operation of your system of impost duties upon the various portions of the Union, regarding it merely as a system of revenue.

Has it any pretensions to be regarded as a just and equal system of taxation? Is not the fact undeniable, that almost the whole burden of federal taxation is thrown upon those branches of productive industry which furnish the exchanges of our foreign commerce, while all the other branches of domestic production are free from taxation, and a large portion of them derive considerable bounties, indirectly, from the very burdens imposed upon those productions which constitute the staples of foreign commerce? If I have not entirely mistaken the true operation of the revenue laws of the United States, there never was a more unequal and unjust system of taxation devised by any Government, of ancient or modern times.

A reference to the treasury statements of the commerce of the United States will show that the whole amount of the domestic productions annually exported to foreign countries, taking an average of years, is something less than fifty-eight millions of dollars. Taking this to be the aggregate value of the domestic exports of the whole Union, it may be estimated that those portions of the southern and southwestern States which are engaged in the production of the great agricultural staples of cotton, tobacco, and rice, constituting less than one-third part of the Union, export to the amount of thirty-seven millions of dollars; and those portions of the States just mentioned, which are engaged in the production of cotton and rice, constituting less than one-fifth part of the Union, export to the amount of thirty millions of dollars. Now, sir, it would be difficult to imagine a proposition in political economy more undeniable, than that the amount of imposts which belong to each respective portion of the Union, must be proportioned to their exports. It is wholly immaterial who are the carriers and importers of the merchandise received in exchange for domestic productions, or through what custom-house it happens to pass; it must still be regarded as constituting the commerce of that portion of the country, in exchange for the productions of which it is obtained; and every imposition of duties upon that commerce is a burden of taxation thrown upon the domestic industry by which it is sustained. If, therefore, you would know what stake any particular portion of the Union has in the foreign commerce of the country, you have only to ascertain what proportion the exports of domestic productions from that part of the Union bear to the whole amount of foreign merchandise imported for consumption. How, then, are the burdens imposed by this Government, regarding the impost duties as a mere system of revenue, distributed among the various States and sections of this Union? If I shall succeed in showing that the States engaged in the production of cotton, tobacco, and rice, are taxed by the Federal Government in proportion to the amount of their exports, it will follow that those States pay very nearly two-thirds of the whole amount of the federal revenue. It will also follow that the States engaged in the production of cotton and rice alone, with a population of little more than two millions, pay more than one-half of that revenue. I am aware, sir, that these propositions are calculated to startle those who have not examined the subject attentively. Gentlemen will think it scarcely possible that any population in the world could have existed, in tolerable comfort, under such a weight of taxes. I will proceed, then, to the proof of the proposition, that the exports of the planting States indicate the proportion of federal taxes paid by these States, taking fairly into view the entire operation of our fiscal system. And I beg that those gentlemen who are in favor of the existing policy, will examine my argument critically, and, if they can detect any fallacy in it, that they will expose it to this committee. My sincere desire is to arrive at the truth. If I am in error, it is my anxious wish that it may be clearly pointed out, as very important issues may probably hang upon it.

If the southern planters were to export their own productions in their own ships, and import, in the same way, the merchandise obtained in exchange for it, would any doubt exist that they actually paid into the treasury an amount of taxes proportioned to their exports? Exporting productions to the amount of thirty-seven millions of dollars, they would pay, assuming the average rate of the duties even at forty per cent., fourteen millions eight hundred thousand dollars, while the States producing cotton and rice would pay twelve millions. Now, as the importing merchant is nothing more than the agent of the planter, the true operation of impost duties will be much more clearly perceived by dispensing with this agency. It tends to confuse the inquirer, by keeping out of view the real parties to the proceeding. The merchant certainly bears his own share of the burdens of federal taxation; but the burdens of the planter are in no degree diminished by that fact. I assume, then, that the planter is subjected to precisely the same burden, as a planter, that he would be if he had no factor or commercial agent, but exported his own produce himself, and imported what he obtained for it abroad. Why, then, is it denied that he is taxed in proportion to the amount of his exports? It is denied, upon the assumed ground that the producer pays no part of the tax, as a producer, but that the whole burden falls upon the consumer of the articles subjected to impost duties. Now, although, as I shall hereafter attempt to show, the condition of the planter would be very little better, even if it were true that the consumer paid the whole tax; yet I deem it important to refute the common error, that indirect taxes, laid upon production, fall ultimately and exclusively on consumption. I know, sir, that indirect taxes do not exclusively rest upon those classes from whom they are actually levied. But upon what principle of reason or common sense can it be maintained that no part of them rests there?

Such an idea never would have been indulged for a moment, but for the disguised form in which indirect taxation operates upon the community. To strip the subject still further of the disguise and confusion in which it is enveloped, I will advance another step in the process of simplification. I maintain, then, that an import duty imposed upon those articles of foreign merchandise which are received in exchange for the domestic productions of the planting States, is precisely equivalent, in the existing state of our commercial relations, to an export duty levied upon the productions of those States. A very brief examination of the actual state of our commerce with Europe will satisfy the House that those articles of merchandise, which are now imported principally from Great Britain, France, and Holland, in exchange for our cotton, tobacco, and rice, are the only articles which can be obtained in those countries for the productions we send them. Whatever impost duty you impose, we must still continue to import the merchandise on which it is levied, until the duty reaches the point of prohibition. I am aware that a notion prevails, and I have recently seen it gravely maintained in a number of the North American Review, that if we were to prohibit absolutely and entirely the importation of all those articles which we now import from Europe in exchange for our cotton, that Great Britain and France would still continue to purchase the same quantity of that staple as they did before the prohibition; and that, instead of paying for it with merchandise, they would pay for it with money. This is an argument of some plausibility, and may impose upon persons unacquainted with the laws of commerce, and the functions of money. But to persons at all familiar with these important subjects, it can appear in no other light than as a gross and palpable absurdity. What, sir, is commerce between nations but a mutual exchange of those articles of intrinsic value which are mutually produced and consumed by the nations who carry it on? Great Britain, for example, cannot purchase our cotton, without giving for it, directly or indirectly, the productions of her own industry. Having no mines of gold and silver, she cannot pay us in those metals, until she obtains them from some other country in exchange for the productions of her own industry. But unless your duties increase the demand of the countries having gold and silver mines, for British merchandise, and also the demand of the commercial world for specie, Great Britain can neither sell any more goods to the mining countries, nor purchase any more specie from them, than she did before your prohibition. Your refusal to take any thing but specie for British merchandise, therefore, is refusing to take any thing but that which she cannot give. But the inquiry does not stop here. Suppose Great Britain had inexhaustible mines of the precious metals. There would still be wanting one of the indispensable conditions of a beneficial commercial exchange, to render it advantageous for us to receive specie in return for our produce. We have no use for any more specie than we already possess. It would be extreme folly to think of importing specie, as an article of consumption, in the United States. We can neither eat it nor wear it. It is not an article that we want for consumption. Its principal use is as the basis of our circulating medium, and for that purpose the supply is already ample, which we derive from our direct trade with the mining countries. Suppose the staple States were to import annually, if such consummate folly may be imputed to them, thirty, or even twenty millions of specie. What would they do with it? Of what value would it be to them? We should have no demand or use for a fiftieth part of it in the United States. To what country, then, should we export it? To Mexico or South America? They are the countries from which it originally came. To Great Britain, or France, or Holland? These are the countries from which, upon the supposition, we should receive it. But even if we could find a foreign demand for this specie, what article could we receive in exchange for it, that is not excluded by the principle of your prohibitory system? Sir, it is by confounding specie as an article of commerce, with specie as the mere representative of value, that public writers have fallen into the strange delusion which I have thus attempted to expose. Specie, as an article of trade, is subject to the same laws that apply to any other article of commerce. It is only between the nations that produce it, and those which require it for actual use, that it can be an article of profitable trade. Between all others, it can answer no other purpose than that of a common circulating medium, by which the accidental balances of their annual exchanges may be adjusted and paid. I think, then, I have shown that the only articles we can receive advantageously from the countries which consume our agricultural staples, are those which are produced by the industry of those countries; and these are precisely the manufactures which it is the design of the prohibitory system to exclude altogether.

But, whatever may be said as to the matter of theory, no doubt can be entertained as to the matter of fact. Highly as you have taxed the manufactures of Great Britain, France, and Holland, we do actually import those manufactures, almost to the precise amount of the agricultural staples exported to the countries in question. We find it more advantageous to import the productions of those countries under a tax of forty-five per cent., than to import specie free of duty. Such being the actual state of the trade in question, does it not follow that a duty upon the exports of cotton, tobacco, or rice, would not be more burdensome to the planter, nor to any other interest concerned, than an equal duty upon the manufactures received in exchange for those exports? No ingenuity can draw any substantial discrimination between the actual operation of the two kinds of duty. Can it be at all material to the planter, whether he pays the duty upon the cargo he sends out, or upon that which he brings back? To give a familiar illustration, which every man of common sense will readily understand—would it be any more burdensome to the planter to pay a toll of forty per cent. upon the cotton he sent to market, than it would be to pay the same toll on the goods he received in exchange for it? The question is too plain to be argued. It would simply be the difference between paying as he went to market, and paying as he returned home. If, then, the duties were levied upon the export of our productions, what would become of the argument that the consumer pays the whole of the duty? It would be too absurd for grave consideration.

As our cotton, tobacco, and rice are consumed in foreign countries, it would follow, according to this argument, that we levied our taxes from foreign countries. It would only be necessary, therefore, to transfer our impost duties from imports to exports, to exempt our citizens entirely from the burden of our own taxes, and throw it upon the subjects of other nations.

But, sir, we cannot make foreigners pay the taxes we impose upon our own citizens. The market of Great Britain, for example, regulates the price, as well of the cotton we export to that country, as of the merchandise we import from it. Does not every man acquainted with the commerce of the country know that the price of cotton at Liverpool controls and determines the price at Charleston; and that the price of that article in Liverpool depends not upon your duties, but upon the supply compared with the demand—a supply derived not only from the United States, but from all the cotton-growing regions of the world? And, on the other hand, does any man suppose that the price of British merchandise, in New York, controls and regulates the price at Manchester? The price of this merchandise depends upon the general demand for it, in all the markets of the world. For the same reason, therefore, that a duty upon the exports of cotton cannot raise the price of that cotton in the British markets, a duty upon the imports of British merchandise cannot depress the price of that merchandise in those markets. The American cotton planter, then, pays a duty of forty per cent. upon the export of his cottons, or, which is the same thing, upon what he obtains for it, and cannot indemnify himself for any part of this duty, by raising the price of his cotton, or by diminishing the cost of the merchandise he receives in exchange for it. Who, then, ultimately, bears the burden of the tax? It is evidently levied upon the producer, in the first instance; for the merchant, who really pays it, is nothing more than the agent of the planter. Upon what principle of political economy, then, can it be maintained that the whole burden of the tax is ultimately thrown upon the consumer, on whom it is not laid by the Government, and that no part of it rests upon the producer, where the Government originally placed it? The producer has no power to throw the whole burden from his own shoulders, and place it upon those of the consumer. It would be most extraordinary if he had. The truth is, that every duty levied upon production, whether direct or indirect, whether of impost or excise, whether upon exports or imports, naturally divides itself between the producers and consumers, according to the relative circumstances in which they are placed. At first it must operate, in all cases, principally as a tax upon the producer. Suppose, for example, that an excise duty of forty per cent. were all at once levied upon hats. The tax would be collected from the hatters. They would actually pay the money to the Government. Could they immediately raise the price of hats in proportion to the tax levied upon them? They certainly could not. The only possible means by which they could raise the price of hats at all, would be by diminishing the production of them. If the supply was not diminished, nor the demand increased, no addition whatever could be made to the price. Now, a tax upon any article certainly does not increase the demand for it. Until the supply is diminished, therefore, by the withdrawal of some of those engaged in making the article, the price cannot be enhanced; and this withdrawal can only be made slowly and gradually. Let it be remarked, that it is only by the faculty of abandoning the branch of industry subjected to a tax, and engaging in some other that is more profitable, that the producer can throw any material part of the burden of taxation upon the consumer. If, therefore, a tax were laid upon all the other productions of the community equal to that supposed to be laid upon hats, the hatters could not find any relief by resorting to other pursuits. They surely would not leave an employment to which they were trained and accustomed, and in which their capital was already invested, to embark in a new and unaccustomed pursuit, subject to the same taxation. Such a change would not relieve them from the tax, and it would deprive them of all the advantages of their existing investments and acquired skill. The result would, therefore, evidently be, that the tax would fall almost entirely upon production. There would be a general fall in the profits of capital and the wages of labor. The tax would be paid by the producer, and yet he could not, in consequence of it, raise the price of his productions any thing like in proportion to it. Now, whatever circumstances in the condition of any class of producers prevent them from promptly and easily transferring their capital and labor from the pursuits in which they are engaged to other pursuits, will prevent those producers from raising the price of their productions, in consequence of any tax that may be imposed upon them; and, of course, from throwing the burden of that tax upon the consumers.

Let us now apply these obvious and well established principles of political economy to the actual condition of the southern planters. The Government has laid a tax (I will assume it to be forty per cent.) upon the productions of their industry. What is the power they possess to throw the burden upon the consumer? Can they diminish their production, in consequence of the tax imposed upon their staples? Can they resort to any other employment more profitable than the one in which they are engaged, even with the burdens imposed on it? Sir, I answer from my own knowledge and experience, that they cannot. Nothing could be more impotent than any attempt to raise the price of their cotton in foreign markets, by diminishing their production of it. Their great and principal markets are in foreign countries, where they meet competitors from all the cotton-growing regions of the world. If we were to diminish the quantity of our own production, therefore, with a view to enhance the price of our staple, we should only create a vacuum in the foreign markets, to be immediately filled up by the cotton of South America, Egypt, Greece, and the East and West Indies. We cannot, therefore, diminish our production with impunity. It would be a fatal policy; for we should diminish the demand for our cotton, and open a market for the cotton of other countries, in exactly the same proportion. There is neither philosophy nor common sense in the idea that a tax imposed upon a branch of productive industry which depends almost exclusively on foreign countries for a market, can be thrown upon the consumers. Foreigners, sir, are the principal consumers of the productions of southern industry. But, even if we could enhance the price of our productions, by diminishing the quantity produced, how is this to be effected? Our entire capital is invested in lands and negroes; and the only staples we can cultivate to any advantage, or for which we can find a market, are those we now produce. Shall we, then, abandon our lands, manumit our slaves, and then go forth to seek new fortunes in distant regions? No, sir; our citizens would sooner perish than to be thus driven from their rightful inheritances and the homes of their forefathers, by this unrighteous system of oppression.

There are insuperable objections to the transfer of the capital and labor of the southern planter from the production of their present staples to any other employment. It has been suggested that we might enter upon the manufacturing business. All our habits disqualify us for this sort of employment. It would require ten or fifteen years of ruinous experiment before we could acquire even a tolerable degree of skill, and, even then, we could not rival the manufacturers either of Europe or of the northern States of this Union. But, even if we could succeed so far as to equal our domestic competitors, where should we find a market for our productions? It would be absurd to go to Europe, and equally so to go to the manufacturing States of our own country. From Mexico we are excluded by absurd restrictions, in imitation of our own; and, wherever a foreign market might be open, we should find ourselves forestalled and excluded by the manufactures of Great Britain and New England. Is it not an insulting mockery, then, to tell us that we ought tamely to submit to a system which drives us from our natural pursuits, because we have the wretched privilege of embarking in the production of manufactures, which we have no skill in making, and for which we could find no market after they were made? Great Britain alone could supply the whole world with manufactures, at little more than half the price for which we could afford to make them.

It must be perfectly obvious, that, even with more oppressive burdens than they have yet borne, the southern planters cannot, to any extent worth consideration, divert their capital and labor to other employments, and thereby diminish the production of their staples, with a view to an enhancement of their price.

Experience proves this most conclusively. And here I beg leave to notice, as connected with what I am now saying, a statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report of 1828. To prove that the commerce of the country had been increased by the tariff of 1824, he stated, and correctly stated, that the imports of the four years succeeding that tariff exceeded those of the four years preceding it, to a very considerable amount. Now, nothing evinces the unsatisfactory and inconclusive nature of lumping statistical statements more clearly than this example: for, on analyzing the statement of our exports during the two periods alluded to, I find that almost the entire increase of those of the latter period over the former, consisted of the single article of cotton. And yet, sir, we were gravely told from high authority, that this fact conclusively proved that the tariff of 1824 had increased our foreign commerce. But, sir, though it did not prove what it was designed to prove, it established one thing quite conclusively, that the cotton planter, so far from having it in his power to relieve himself from the burden of taxation, by limiting his production, and thereby increasing the price of what he produces, is compelled, as the alternative least ruinous, to increase his production, in the hope of making up in that way for the diminished price. Yes, sir, the heavier and more oppressive your taxes have been, the harder has the planter labored; incessantly struggling against a declining market, and yet, by his extraordinary exertions, regularly adding to the aggregate value of the national exports. Between the years 1820 and 1828, the production of cotton exported was increased from one hundred and twenty-seven millions to three hundred millions of pounds, while the aggregate value of it was only increased from twenty-two to twenty-eight millions, indicating a fall in the price of cotton from eighteen to nine cents a pound; on the other hand, the exports of most of the other productions of domestic industry, and particularly grain, during the same period, decreased more in quantity than in value, indicating a gradual rise in their price. No contrast could exhibit, in a more striking point of view, the unequal and oppressive operation of federal taxation on the different portions of the Union; and none certainly could more conclusively show that it is utterly impossible for the planters to throw the taxes imposed on their productions upon any other class of the community.

The Tariff.

It is so important, to a just comprehension of the operation of our tariff regulations, that we should clearly ascertain where the burden of our impost taxes really falls, that I must be excused for presenting to the committee another illustration, to show that it principally falls upon the producers of our exports. To avoid the confusion of ideas, which results from estimating the value of merchandise, and the duties imposed upon it, in money, I will dispense with the use of this, as I have done with the agency of the merchant. I will suppose, then, that the Government levies the duties in kind, and that, for every hundred bales of cotton the planter exports, the Government takes forty, and then places agents on board the vessel of the planter, to go with him to Great Britain, and sell the cotton thus taken from him, in common with his own. Is it not apparent that the very same quantity of cotton would go into the foreign market, as would have gone if no duty had been levied, with this difference only, that forty bales would belong to the Government, and sixty to the planter, instead of the whole belonging to the planter? No change, therefore, would be made in the British market by this division of the property between the individual and the Government. If we suppose each bale of cotton to be worth a piece of cloth, the planter would bring back sixty pieces, and the Government forty. The very same quantity would be brought into the domestic market as if the Government had levied no duty, with this difference only, that, instead of the whole belonging to the planter, it would be divided between him and the Government. Although the planter would receive only sixty pieces of cloth instead of one hundred, yet he could not get any higher price for it than if he had been permitted to import the whole hundred pieces: for it is wholly immaterial, as to its effect upon the market price of the cloth, whether it is all imported by the planter, or a part by him, and the remainder by the Government. While the demand and the supply remain unchanged, no imposition of the Government can increase the price.

Let us suppose, then, that the Government takes no part of the cotton when exported, but permits the planter to export it without diminution. With his hundred bales of cotton, he purchases a hundred pieces of cloth. This would be the product of his industry—cotton converted into cloth. When he reaches the custom-house, the agent of the Government takes forty pieces of his cloth, as a contribution to the treasury. It is equally obvious, as in the former case, that the same quantity of cloth would come into the market, as if none of it had been taken by the Government. The price would be the very same, and, consequently, the planter would be deprived of forty of his hundred pieces of cloth, by the exaction of the Government, without any means of indemnifying himself by obtaining a higher price for the remainder. This, sir, is the actual operation of your import duties, stripped of the disguise with which they are invested. They are taxes upon those productions of domestic industry which go into foreign commerce; and although the consumers, as a class distinct from the purchasers, will, in the long run, be incidentally injured by whatever oppresses the producers, yet the burden primarily and principally falls upon the latter class. According to this view of the subject, the southern planter would bear the principal part of the burden of the imports levied upon the productions of his industry, even if he did not consume any of them himself, but imported them exclusively for the purpose of making exchanges for western and northern produce.

But, sir, even if we grant that the tax falls exclusively upon the consumer, I ask you, who consumes the productions of southern industry, if they are not consumed by the southern people? They are certainly the natural consumers of what they receive in exchange for their own productions. If they do not consume the very same articles they import, entirely and exclusively, they must consume some other articles obtained in exchange for them. Let us examine a little in detail what becomes of the imports of the South. In the first place, the Government takes forty dollars out of every hundred. That portion, of course, the planter cannot consume. But surely this circumstance does not diminish the burden imposed upon him. The fact that he does not consume it, is the very thing that makes the law, which deprives him of it, a burdensome tax upon his industry. As to the remaining sixty dollars, there can be no doubt that the people of the southern States are the direct consumers of the principal part of it. A portion of it, to be sure, is exchanged with the people of the northern States, either for other foreign merchandise imported by them, such as East and West India produce, or for their own manufactures. But this is precisely the same thing as if the southern people consumed the very articles obtained abroad for their own produce. What does it matter to the planter, whether he consumes the very cloth for which his cotton is exchanged, or the tea, and coffee, and sugar imported by the people of the North, in exchange for their productions and industry, or the manufactures of the North? These foreign productions and domestic manufactures are enhanced in price, quite as much as the cloth imported by the planter, in consequence of the duties. Thus far, then, the southern people pay the whole amount of the imposts laid upon their productions, regarding them as consumers merely. But it has been said that we exchange some three millions of our imports for the live stock of the western States, which is not enhanced in price by any duty. But even here the planter is not entirely relieved from his burden. Can he purchase as much live stock with sixty pieces of cloth, as he could with a hundred? It would be absurd to maintain such a proposition; and yet this is the only way in which he could relieve himself from the whole burden of the impost. The fact is, that he would be able to purchase but little more than half the quantity of live stock from the western people, that he could have purchased if no duty had been laid upon his imports. In this way, undoubtedly, the burden would be seriously felt by the western people. But this would not mitigate the suffering of the planter. You deprive him of the means of purchasing live stock to a very great amount, and to that extent cut off the market for the productions of western industry. By this process, as in all cases of prohibition, you destroy two values—that of the planter to the extent of the imposts, and that of the grower of stock to the extent that he is injured by losing a market for the productions of his industry.

Upon a general survey of the condition of the United States, it will be perceived that, owing to the causes intimately connected with the restrictive system, production is every where overrunning consumption. When to this circumstance we add the fact that the consumers of those articles of which you propose to enhance the price by your high duties, have so many other resources, and can resort to so many substitutes, to avoid paying the duties, every gentleman must be satisfied of the utter impossibility of throwing any thing like the whole burden of the impost duties from the producers, upon whom they are actually laid, to the consumers, upon whom they are not laid. The consumers of manufactured articles in the United States are very differently situated, thank heaven, from the consumers of grain in Great Britain. The enormous burden of the corn laws falls almost exclusively on the consumers. Corn is an article of absolute necessity, for which no domestic substitute can be obtained. The miserable British laborer, therefore, is obliged to consume the grain of the lordly landowner, at double the price it could be imported, or perish. But it is not so with the American consumers of cotton and woollen manufactures. Before they will consent to pay an enhanced price, proportioned to the duties imposed, they will clothe themselves in homespun.

Upon the whole, then, the only means which the producer has to throw the burden of a tax from his shoulders, is to diminish his production of the article taxed; and the means which the consumer has to avoid having it thrown upon him, is to diminish his consumption of that article. In this contest, the consumer has a decided and obvious advantage. It may be very confidently assumed, therefore, that at least one-half of the burden of the impost duties laid upon the return productions of the planter would be sustained by him as a producer, even if he consumed no part of those productions. But it cannot be doubted that the people of the southern States consume, of the articles imported in exchange for their staples, of other foreign articles subject to pay duties, and of domestic manufactures, equally enhanced by the tariff, to the amount of three-fourths of the entire return which they receive for their exports. It follows that the direct operation of the impost duties throws upon the people of the staple-growing States a weight of taxation very nearly proportioned to their exports.

But, sir, there remains to be presented a view of this subject, very little considered heretofore, either in this country or in Europe, which will exhibit the unequal and oppressive operation of this Government in a most striking light. When this is taken into the estimate, the committee will perceive that I have been quite within the mark, in assuming that the staple-growing States are burdened in proportion to the amount of duties levied upon their commerce. Next to the unequal exactions of Government, nothing can be more distressing to a country of such vast extent, than the unequal disbursement of its revenues. Great as I have shown the inequality to be, in the contributions exacted from the different sections of the Union, the inequality of the disbursements of the Federal Government is still much greater. South of Norfolk—through the entire region extending thence south and southwest along the Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico—a region which contributes two-thirds of the revenue of the whole Union—there is not annually expended an average sum of five hundred thousand dollars! Now, sir, I do not mention this unequal disbursement for the purpose of complaining of it, so much as with a view to explain the actual injury and suffering which result from it. I do verily believe, then, that a tax of ten millions of dollars, expended among those by whom it is contributed, would not be more burdensome and oppressive than a tax of five millions of dollars expended in a foreign country, or a distant portion of the Union. In other words, I believe any State, Pennsylvania for example, would find it an advantageous pecuniary speculation, to pay a million of dollars to the federal treasury, annually, upon the condition that the Federal Government should annually disburse two millions of dollars among the people of that State, in the purchase of grain, iron, manufactures, and such other productions as are there made for market. It is obvious that a new demand would be annually created for a million of dollars worth of the productions of Pennsylvania, and a new value thereby given to those productions. It would of course give the highest possible stimulus to productive industry; and at the end of the year the aggregate wealth of the State would be increased more than it would be diminished, by this fiscal operation of paying one million in taxes, and receiving two millions in disbursements. The most striking example of the influence of Government disbursements, of which history has kept any record, and that which first drew my attention to the subject, is that exhibited by Great Britain in the war against the French republic and the French empire. The extraordinary financial resources of Great Britain, in that eventful struggle, have excited the wonder and admiration of the world, scarcely less than the unparalleled military achievements and extensive conquests of the Emperor Napoleon. The spectacle of a nation annually expending some two hundred millions of dollars, and yet flourishing almost beyond any former example, seemed almost to baffle the profoundest speculations of political philosophy.

But the mystery is completely unravelled, when we advert to the fact that she annually borrowed, during fifteen years, one hundred millions of dollars. By this operation alone, the annual disbursements of the Government were made to exceed the annual amount of the taxes, very nearly one hundred millions. We have, therefore, almost the very state of things I supposed, in regard to Pennsylvania. The Government levied an annual tax of one hundred millions of dollars, and made an annual disbursement of two hundred millions of dollars. Great Britain was never so flourishing; and, if the same operation could have lasted forever, she would have continued to flourish on to the end. But it was not in the nature of things that it could last much longer than it did. Great Britain was acting the part of the prodigal, who converted his inheritance into an annuity for fifteen years, and then expended his whole annual income. She was living upon the resources of posterity, and, if she had gone much further, she would have exhausted them. But when peace was restored to Europe, the picture of British prosperity was reversed. When superficial observers were expecting an increased prosperity from the cessation of war and its expenditures, a scene of distress and ruin ensued, not more astonishing and apparently unaccountable than the former prosperity. But the one was just as natural as the other. The sudden withdrawal of the disbursements of the Government, to the amount of more than one hundred millions of dollars, without any corresponding reduction of the taxes, was like withdrawing his accustomed stimulus from a man who habitually took his bottle of wine a day. A paralysis was thrown over the industry and prosperity of the nation, from which no one can predict when she will recover.

Now, sir, when you have looked at this picture, and then looked at that; when you have compared the distress and suffering of Great Britain since the peace of Europe, with the prosperity which preceded it, you have, on the one hand, an exemplification, and only a faint one, of the blasting and withering influence of enormously unequal taxes levied in one portion of the Union, with scarcely any return in the form of Government disbursements; and on the other, of the animating and invigorating influence of large disbursements in portions of the Union that make scarcely any contributions, comparatively speaking, to the public revenue.

I will now ask the attention of the committee to a comparison which I propose to institute between the actual distribution of the burdens of the federal taxes among the different classes of productive industry and the different geographical subdivisions of the Union; and the distribution that would take place under a just and equitable system of taxation. What, then, is the true principle of distributive justice, in the apportionment of taxes among the different portions of the community? It is laid down in a work of the highest authority—and, indeed, no authority is necessary to give sanction to a rule of such apparent justice—"That the subjects of every State ought to contribute towards the support of the Government, as nearly as possible, in proportion to the revenue which they enjoy under the protection of the State. The expense of Government to the individuals of a great nation, is like the expense of management to the joint tenants of a great estate, who are all obliged to contribute in proportion to their interest in the estate. In the observance or neglect of this maxim, consists what is called equality or inequality of taxation."

According to this fundamental rule, the justice and equity of which no man, I am sure, in this committee, will venture to controvert, an income tax would be the nearest approach that could be made to that equality which ought to be the aim of every Government, and which our own constitution most carefully, but vainly, attempted to secure. With a view to ascertain what would be the result of such a plan of taxation, so far as regards its distribution among the various portions of the Union, I have made an estimate of the aggregate amount of all the incomes of the United States, giving, as the result, fifty millions of dollars. I have subjected this estimate to the test of several modes of calculation, and I think it rather under than over the truth. A British economist estimated the income of Great Britain, in 1820, at three hundred and fifty millions of pounds sterling; and I cannot suppose it will be deemed extravagant to estimate the income of the United States, in 1830, at as many dollars. What, then, would be the distribution of the burdens of the federal taxation among the different sections of the Union, if the people were taxed in proportion to their incomes? It is to be remarked that the exports of the staple-growing States constitute the principal part of their annual income. But that I may be certain of not making too low an estimate, I will assume that the income of all the persons engaged in producing cotton, tobacco, and rice, is seventy millions of dollars, nearly double the amount of their exports; and that the income of those engaged in producing cotton and rice is fifty millions of dollars. To produce a revenue of twenty-four million five hundred thousand dollars, a tax of only seven per cent. upon the aggregate income of the nation would be necessary. In the apportionment of this sum, upon the principles of an income tax; there would fall to the share of the growers of cotton, tobacco, and rice, only four million nine hundred thousand dollars, and to that of the growers of cotton and rice only three million five hundred thousand dollars; whereas all the other branches of productive industry in the United States would have to contribute nineteen million six hundred thousand dollars. Let us now compare this equitable distribution of the taxes, with that which actually exists under our present system. The growers of cotton, tobacco, and rice, as I have heretofore shown, now actually contribute to the support of this Government fourteen million eight hundred thousand dollars, being nine million nine hundred thousand dollars more than their just proportion; and the growers of cotton and rice contribute twelve millions, being eight million five hundred thousand dollars more than their just proportion.

I am aware that the inequality of our present system of impost duties, as a scheme of taxation, is so enormous, that it is calculated to astound those who have not thoroughly examined the matter. With a view, therefore, of presenting the question in a more practical and a familiar point of view, I will suppose that a general excise were imposed upon all those productions which constitute the basis of the internal commerce of the Union, and that the impost duties upon foreign commerce were reduced to the same rate. As a mere question of distributive justice, it cannot be doubted, for a moment, that the exchanges of internal commerce should be subjected to the very same impositions with the exchanges of foreign commerce. It is essential, indeed, to the perfect equality of taxation, that all indirect taxes should fall precisely alike upon all the productions of domestic industry, made or manufactured for sale, whether at home or abroad. If the planter is called upon to pay a certain per centage upon the annual value of the cotton he exchanges for foreign manufactures, upon what human principle can it be contended that the farmer is not equally liable to pay the same per centage upon the annual value of the grain and other productions which he exchanges with the neighboring manufacturer; and that the manufacturers, of every description, are not equally liable to pay the same per centage upon the annual value of the manufactures they exchange for agricultural and other productions in the domestic market? An impost and an excise duty are precisely the same in principle, differing only in the solitary particular, that they fall upon different productions of domestic industry. And, whether the tax ultimately falls upon the producer or consumer, a just regard to the principle of equality would require that all the producers and all the consumers of the country should equally participate in sustaining the financial burdens of the State.

If the value of the cotton exported by the planter is to be regarded as the measure of his income, upon the very same principle the value of the grain sold by the farmer, or of the cloth sold by the manufacturer, should be regarded as the measure of his income, and the duty imposed accordingly.

Now, sir, it will be found, upon examination, that a general system of impost and excise duties, equally applicable to all commercial exchanges, whether foreign or internal, would bring us almost to the very same result as an income tax.

The advocates of the prohibitory system have habitually dwelt upon the insignificance of our foreign when compared with our internal commerce. In the well known address of the Harrisburg convention, it was assumed that the internal commerce of the Union amounted to five hundred millions of dollars, being nearly ten times the amount of our foreign commerce. I think this estimate extravagant, and will not, therefore, use it, even against the manufacturers themselves. It may be safely assumed, however, that the internal commerce of the Union amounts to two hundred and eighty millions, exclusive of the coasting trade in foreign merchandise. It follows, therefore, that while the whole of the taxes of the Federal Government are thrown upon less than one-fifth of all the productions of national industry—the average amount of imports being less than seventy millions of dollars—there are productions equally liable to taxation upon every principle of equity and justice, amounting to two hundred and eighty millions of dollars, which are not only entirely free from all Government impositions, but a large portion of which actually receive Government bounties! Sir, it is in vain for gentlemen to attempt to disguise this gross and monstrous inequality, under the vague notion that the ultimate burden of taxation falls exclusively upon the consumer. Even if this were true to the letter; it would not materially vary the case as to the unequal operation of the revenue laws upon the different sections of the Union. The complaint is, that upon less than seventy millions of the commercial exchanges of the country—principally belonging to the planting States—the whole of the federal taxes are levied, while upon commercial exchanges, equally liable to taxation, belonging to the farming and manufacturing States, to the vast amount of two hundred and eighty millions of dollars, no imposition at all is laid by this Government. Now I challenge any gentleman to point out a single instance in the history of the world—I will not except the cruel exactions of the Roman Government from the conquered provinces—that can be compared with our own revenue system, for the injustice and inequality of the contributions it draws from the people of the southern and southwestern States. When all the States of this Union were Atlantic States, and were interested very nearly in an equal degree in the foreign exchanges of the country, no great injustice resulted from making these exchanges sustain the whole fiscal burdens of the Government. But even in 1790, the period to which I refer, Alexander Hamilton, the putative father of the prohibitory system, deemed it unwise and inexpedient to carry the duties upon foreign merchandise higher than seven and a half per cent. How would he have been astonished if any one had predicted that, in less than forty years, fourteen million eight hundred thousand dollars, out of a revenue of twenty-three millions of dollars, would be raised by duties upon little more than one-ninth part of the productive industry and commercial exchanges of the Union!

The Turiff.

I am sure, if gentlemen did not permit themselves to be carried away by a mere distinction in names, this unequal distribution of the taxes would strike them more forcibly than it now does. If the whole revenue of the United States were raised by an excise, and, instead of levying an impost on the merchandise imported, an excise duty to the same extent were levied upon our cotton when sold to the merchant, and before it reaches the custom-house, the palpable injustice, the outrageous inequality of the system, would be apparent to every one. It could not then be disguised, that the Government was exacting an excise duty of forty per cent. from the cotton planters, while, upon the productions of other parts of the Union, standing upon precisely the same footing, and amounting to nine times the value of the cotton made for exportation, it exacted no duty at all. Now, as I have heretofore shown that an import duty is precisely equivalent to an export duty upon the same commercial exchange, it follows, from the same course of reasoning, that an excise duty paid upon cotton when it leaves the storehouse of the planter, is precisely equivalent to an export duty paid at the custom-house. Both are equally taxes upon the productions of the planter, and operate precisely alike in all their bearings, whether we regard them as throwing the burden of the tax upon the producer or the consumer. And I have no hesitation in saying that I would regard a law imposing an excise duty of forty per cent. upon all cotton sold by the planters in the United States, and providing at the same time that foreign merchandise received in exchange for it might be imported free of duty, as making not the slightest change in the burdens under which we now labor. How, then, let me ask—and I beg gentlemen to answer me the question, if with clear consciences they can—how would a law strike them, which provided, in terms, that an excise duty of forty per cent. should be levied upon all the productions of the southern States, whereas, of the immense amount of the productions of the northern, middle, and western States, only twenty millions should be subject to a similar excise, and the remaining two hundred and eighty millions expressly exempted from any imposition at all? Would such a law bear inspection? Would not such an invidious and unjust distinction shock the moral sense of every man in the community? And yet, sir, the law I have supposed would do nothing more than express, in words, what actually exists at this moment in the revenue laws of this Government, wrapped up and disguised in the indirectness of their operation, and the generality of the terms in which they are expressed.

I have been recently looking into a British production of high reputation, which speaks in strong terms of the intolerable weight of British taxation. As a conclusive argument in favor of a reduction of the taxes, the writer asserts that they amounted, including the corn laws and poor rates, to a tax of thirty-three and one-third per cent. upon the income of every individual in the kingdom. This he regarded as being so very oppressive, that no people could possibly endure it. Now, sir, every cotton planter in the United States pays a tax of at least thirty-three and one-third per cent. upon his income to sustain the Federal Government, in addition to his contribution to the revenue of the State in which he resides. Indeed, as almost the whole of his income is derived from the exchanges of foreign commerce, the tax he pays upon the annual amount of that income cannot be estimated at much less than the rate of the duty which is indirectly laid upon the productions of his industry. And thus it is, that while we are vainly and ignorantly boasting of our freedom from taxation, the people of a portion of the Union are subject to a more oppressive burden than the most heavily taxed people on the face of the earth.

Thus far, I have confined myself to the consideration of the mere fiscal operations of the Federal Government, and have attempted to show the unequal action of your revenue system upon different parts of the Union, without reference to the protection afforded by the impost duties to certain branches of domestic industry. It now becomes my duty to trace the operation of what has been very inappropriately denominated the protecting system; and to ascertain, if possible, how far it contributes to increase the inequality of the burdens imposed by the Federal Government upon the people of the staple-growing States.

And, sir, let it be remembered that a revenue system, grossly and palpably unequal in itself—a system which, under the most favorable modification, would levy the entire amount of the federal taxes from one-fifth part of the productions of the Union, while the other four-fifths are entirely exempted from all manner of imposition—let it be remembered, I say, that this is the substratum upon which has been reared this monstrous and iniquitous superstructure—the protecting system. It did not satisfy the manufacturers and their confederates, that the whole expense of supporting the Federal Government should be sustained by those branches of domestic industry which make up the foreign commerce of the country—it did not satisfy them, that they themselves were not only exempted from all impositions of the Government, but actually received an indirect bounty from the imposts laid upon other branches of industry for the purposes of revenue. No, sir; all this did not satisfy them; they are now making a sure and steady, and, for any thing that can be done here, an irresistible progress in the system of legislative warfare, by which will be ultimately swept from the face of the ocean a large and valuable branch of foreign commerce, exclusively belonging to the staple-growing States, and which now actually contributes two-thirds of the revenue of this Government. And, this, sir, is what they are pleased to denominate a system of protection.

This system, which has been gradually built up, as far as it has gone, by successive acts of Congress, on the ruins of southern commerce, has now become, in the estimation of some gentlemen, an object of idolatry too sacred to be touched without profanity. When, at an early period of the session, I had the honor to introduce a bill to modify the existing tariff by a very moderate reduction of the duties, a very extraordinary excitement was manifested. A gentleman from Pennsylvania rose in his place, and, as if some great indignity had been offered against the majesty of the protecting system, approaching to the guilt of treason, the measure was unceremoniously condemned, and strangled at the very threshold, without the common forms of parliamentary proceeding. The gentleman to whom I allude, [Mr. RAMSEY] as an excuse for a course so unusual and uncourteous, stated that he had no idea of having the repeal of the tariff of 1828 discussed or agitated, until we had ascertained, by experience, whether it was really as injurious as it had been represented. I should be very unwilling to permit an ignorant physician, wholly unacquainted with my constitution and habits, to indulge in experimental quackery, at the imminent hazard and almost certain sacrifice of my life. For the same reason, I cannot consent that the vital interests of my constituents should be put to hazard upon the result of an experiment in political quackery, which can only end in the ruin of those interests. The gentleman says, give it a trial; not reflecting that, when the result is ascertained, the patient may be dead. What has taken place, forcibly reminds me, sir, of the mode of trial adopted in times not quite so enlightened as the present, for ascertaining the guilt or innocence of certain venerable old women, charged with the dreadful crime of witchcraft. In the dark ages of jurisprudence, these predestined victims were subjected to a species of trial, denominated, I believe, the water ordeal. The mode of trial was very simple; and, as it was no doubt supposed, perfectly fair and equitable. A large stone was tied around the neck of the person accused, and she was cast into deep water, under the very natural belief, that if she was really guilty of dealing with the devil, he would not permit her to sink. While, therefore, humanity cried out for the rescue of the struggling and sinking victim, the stern justice of the times replied, "let her alone! let her alone! if she be really a witch, she certainly will not sink." I need hardly state to this enlightened audience the final issue of the trial. The innocence of the accused was most conclusively established; but, unfortunately for the poor old woman, it was not ascertained until after she was consigned to a watery grave, and placed beyond the hope of resuscitation. And such, sir, will be the inevitable fate of that branch of our foreign commerce which is the rightful and almost exclusive property of the planting States. I have no idea of indulging gentlemen in these witchcraft ordeals with the rights and interests of the whole southern and southwestern portions of this Union.

I am not unaware, sir, of the prevalence of an idea that the Government stands pledged to maintain the system of high and prohibitory duties, from the mere circumstance of having once enacted it. Nothing can be more utterly fallacious, than the idea that the faith of the Government is concerned in the maintenance of an unjust and oppressive system, simply because it has been adopted. It assumes that the Government is some ideal being at Washington, who has persuaded the manufacturers and others concerned to invest their capital in certain pursuits, by giving them the assurance that the high duties would be maintained. Now, sir, what is the Government by which this pledge has been given to the manufacturers? Is it not composed of the representatives of these very manufacturers, and of the interests associated with them, making together that interested and despotic majority, by which the most undoubted rights and interests of the minority have been sacrificed? And, sir, is it to be endured, that these men should gravely get up and urge their own acts of injustice and oppression as creating a pledge to maintain and extend their encroachments upon the rights of the minority? Sir, I protest against a doctrine which thus sanctifies and consecrates to-day, what was admitted to be injustice and oppression yesterday.

What, then, let us briefly inquire, is the tendency, and what has been the effect, of the high duties imposed for the purpose of protecting manufactures and other domestic productions? It is too plain to admit of argument: indeed, it has been candidly admitted by the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, in former discussions, that domestic productions can only be protected by prohibiting the foreign articles that would come in competition with them. He openly avowed that he aimed at prohibition, and it would have been folly to have aimed at less, if he really meant to give protection. No duty can give any protection to any domestic fabric, which does not exclude a similar foreign fabric; and, in the very nature of things, the amount of protection cannot exceed the amount of prohibition, though it may, and generally does, fall short of it. You cannot create a demand, for example, for any domestic manufacture, by legislation, otherwise than by excluding a similar foreign manufacture; and as your legislation is calculated to enhance the price of the article, you certainly cannot create by it a demand for a greater amount of the domestic fabric than you exclude of the foreign. It may be confidently assumed, therefore, that whatever may be the amount of iron and salt, and manufactures of cotton, wool, iron, and hemp, which have been brought into existence in the United States by the system of high protecting duties, at least an equal amount of foreign rival productions has been excluded by those duties. It will not be deemed an extravagant estimate to suppose that the protecting system has caused to be produced, annually, articles of these various kinds, to the amount of twelve millions of dollars, which would not have been produced, but for the protection given them. It follows, then, as a corollary, that at least an equal amount of these articles of foreign production must have been excluded. But these are the very articles which we receive from Great Britain, France, and Holland, in exchange for our agricultural staples. By excluding twelve millions of such articles, therefore, we necessarily diminish the foreign demand for our staples, and principally cotton, to that amount. There is scarcely any limit to the consumption of our cotton in Europe, but that which is imposed by our refusal to take manufactures in exchange for it. If, therefore, we were permitted to import the twelve millions of dollars worth of manufactures that have been excluded by our commercial restrictions, or, rather, if they had never been excluded by those restrictions, it cannot be reasonably doubted that we should now have a demand in Europe for four hundred thousand bales of cotton, beyond the existing demand. Even, therefore, if we grant, what is not the fact, that the whole of the domestic demand for cotton has been produced by the prohibitory effect of our tariff, it will follow that we have gained a market for one hundred and fifty thousand bales, by sacrificing one for four hundred thousand. From this estimate, it will be seen that the prohibition of foreign imports has resulted in curtailing the entire demand for cotton in the markets of the whole world, including our own, two hundred and fifty thousand bales. In addition, then, to the annual burden he bears in paying the duties upon the imports he is still permitted to bring into the country, the planter sustains an annual loss of seven million five hundred thousand dollars, being the value of the cotton for which he has lost a market, in consequence of the unjust restrictions imposed upon his lawful commerce by the suicidal policy of his own Government.

I think I have by this time satisfied the committee that

I have not exaggerated the burdens of the southern planters in stating that a duty of forty per cent. upon the amount of their exports may be taken as the measure of these burdens. I have not the slightest doubt that I have greatly under-estimated those burdens, looking to the operation of your impost duties in the double aspect of a system of revenue and a system of protection. Having now, sir, made out the case of the southern planters—having demonstrated the grossly unequal and oppressive operation of your whole tariff system upon the productions of their lawful industry, I will now proceed to the consideration of the principal ground upon which the advocates of this system have attempted to rest it, as a measure of justice and expediency. It is almost universally conceded by all the supporters of the protecting policy, from Alexander Hamilton down, that if all other nations would throw off the restrictions they have imposed upon commerce, it would be wise in the United States to pursue the same policy. But it is contended, that, as long as other nations continue to impose restrictions upon the free importation of our productions, it is expedient and necessary that we should countervail their regulations, by imposing similar restrictions upon their productions. Now, sir, if I am not greatly deceived in the view I have taken of the matter, this is the capital error which lies at the foundation of the whole protecting system. And nothing will, perhaps, tend more clearly to expose the true genius and character of that system, than a brief examination and exposure of this error. I waive, for the present, as belonging to another branch of inquiry, the policy of countervailing regulations, calculated and designed to induce other nations to abandon their restrictions. No one pretends that ours are of that character, either as to their design or tendency. As a mere question of political economy, then, I maintain that the restrictions which foreign nations impose upon the importation of any production of ours, in pursuing their established policy, furnish not the slightest ground, upon the score of interest or expediency, for imposing similar restrictions upon any of the productions of these foreign nations. I will illustrate my view by considering the operation of the British corn laws upon the commerce of the United States. Let it, then, be granted that Great Britain has absolutely prohibited the importation of foreign grain. No one pretends that she has not an undoubted right, under the law of nations, to do so. We have no just cause to complain of it. Indeed, her policy in this respect is not only imitated, but applauded by the advocates of the restrictive system here. Then, sir, the exclusion of our grain from Great Britain is simply a fact to be considered by this Government, without any regard to the causes that have produced it. It is precisely the same thing to the grain growers of this country, as if the increased fertility of Great Britain, resulting from a newly discovered manure, had enabled the farmers of that country to produce grain as cheaply as it can be produced in Kentucky or Ohio. There could be no more effectual exclusion of our grain than would result from this. And yet I can hardly suppose there is a man in the world who would be so absurd as to contend that these agricultural improvements in Great Britain would furnish any colorable ground for excluding her manufactures; or, in other words, for prohibiting the free exchange of those of our productions which she might still require, for such of her own as she could most advantageously give us for them. Now, it seems impossible for human ingenuity to draw any substantial discrimination between the case I have supposed and that of the British corn laws. In both instances, we lose a market for our grain, in the one from natural and in the other from artificial causes; and the question which arises upon this state of facts, is simply this: would it be wise in us to deprive ourselves of our remaining commerce with Great Britain, because circumstances beyond our control have deprived us of a portion of it? The value of what remains, and the importance of preserving it, are certainly not diminished by what we have unavoidably lost. On the contrary, the inducements to preserve and extend it are rather increased than diminished; and if a common interest pervaded the whole Union, a doubt would not be entertained on the subject. To exemplify this, sir, I will suppose the whole United States to be the property of a single individual. Would the owner of this vast estate be guilty of the consummate folly of refusing to carry on a free and unrestricted trade in cotton, tobacco, and rice, because his customer either would not purchase or could not purchase his grain also? Such absolute fatuity cannot be ascribed to any individual having the common use of his faculties. And yet, sir, such is the wisdom that governs the affairs of nations, this Government is now actually exhibiting the very infatuation which cannot be imputed to any individual, however ignorant and stupid.

The great misfortune is, sir—and it gives us the true key to this whole system—that, while this Government is an undivided and indivisible unity, the country over which it extends is divided into various and—disguise it as we may—diametrically adverse interests. Hence, it results, that the law which throws a restriction upon the commerce of the southern States, to the great and obvious injury of the planter, is obviously calculated, and professedly intended, to promote the interest of the northern manufacturer. If the manufacturer can gain ten per cent. by the restriction, it is his interest to adhere to it, though it impose a burden of forty or fifty per cent. upon the planter. Hence it is that the majority of this House are pursuing a policy with regard to the interests of the whole Union, which no human being would pursue in regard to his own interest. It is worth while, sir, to trace the operation of this policy a little more in detail. Great Britain, it is alleged, will not, or, which is the same thing, does not, in fact, purchase the grain of the northern, middle, and western States, and, consequently, those States have nothing wherewith to purchase British manufactures. This is the complaint. Now, sir, if this be true, the wisdom of man could not more effectually exclude British manufactures, or give a more complete protection to domestic manufactures, in those States. If they have nothing to give in exchange for British manufactures, what earthly necessity is there to exclude them by law? The domestic manufacturer is absolutely secured against foreign competition by the single fact, that the British manufacturer will not take any thing in exchange for his fabrics, which the people of those States have to give. What, then, is the real object of the restrictions which the tariff States are so anxious to throw about our foreign commerce? It is not, sir, be assured, to prevent those States from importing British manufactures, who have nothing to give in exchange for them. That would be impotent and gratuitous legislation. The true object—disguise it as gentlemen may—is to prevent those States who have the means of paying for British manufactures, and who have a deep and vital interest in preserving that branch of commerce, from importing those manufactures, in order to promote the interest of those States who have not the means of paying for British manufactures, and who really have, or believe they have, a deep and vital interest in destroying that branch of commerce. Twist it and turn it as you may, “to this complexion it must come at last.” Hence it is, that to the gross inequality of the revenue system of the United States, the majority of Congress have superadded the intolerable burdens of the prohibitory system. Will any gentleman from Massachusetts, or Rhode Island, or Vermont, have the hardihood to maintain that the duties imposed on cotton and woollen manufactures, varying from forty to sixty per cent. are equally a burden upon his constituents as they are upon mine? Will any gentleman from Pennsylvania assert that the enormous duty upon iron imposes an equal burden upon the people of Pennsylvania and upon those of

The Tariff.

[APRIL 29, 1830.]

South Carolina? On the contrary, do not these gentlemen distinctly and openly avow that the duties which throw a grievous and oppressive burden upon the people of the southern States, operate as a beneficial and sustaining bounty to the people of the northern and eastern States? I do firmly believe, that, if the proceeds of the public lands would defray the whole expenses of the Government, or if the staple-growing States would assume the responsibility of paying those expenses out of revenues raised by themselves, there are certain States in this Union—I allude to those emphatically denominated tariff States—that would not consent to a repeal of the impost duties. No, sir, they gain much more than they lose, by the aggregate effect of the duties imposed, and the disbursements made, by this Government, regarding the system in the light of a mere pecuniary speculation. If a foreign invention were made, by which the operations of Government could be carried on without the expenditure of a single dollar, those States would regard it as a nuisance, and prohibit its importation by as rigorous penalties as are now proposed in regard to foreign manufactures. A greater calamity could scarcely happen to the interests of northern capital, confederated in favor of the protecting system, than would result from an entire suspension of the fiscal operations of this Government, including both taxation and disbursement. This extraordinary, but undoubted fact, that those who control the legislation of Congress have a decided pecuniary interest in the increase and perpetuation of the burdens of taxation, brings me to the consideration of a view of this subject deeply interesting to the people of the southern portion of this confederacy, and involving the highest principles of constitutional liberty.

The southern States, actuated by that uncalculating patriotism for which they have always been distinguished, have submitted, without a single murmur, to a system of taxation which has drawn from the productions of their industry, at least, double the amount of their just contribution to the federal treasury. But, sir, when they find an interested majority, "which feels power and forgets right," steadily aiming the imperial ban of the prohibitory system at the absolute annihilation of that very branch of commerce which has so largely and disproportionately contributed to support the expenses of the Federal Government—when they find that majority, confident in the strength of numbers, openly and boldly avowing the unjust, and, I had almost said, nefarious and piratical purpose of sweeping from the very face of the ocean a lawful branch of trade, which almost exclusively belongs to the people of these States—it is time for them to rise up in the majesty of their rights, and demand, in the name of the principles of eternal justice and of constitutional liberty, "by what authority do you commit this monstrous outrage?"

Sir, I never have been an advocate of strict limitations or technical refinements, in construing the constitution. I have always interpreted that instrument as I would any other, by its plain sense and obvious intention, having regard both to the letter and spirit. Taking these for my guide, I utterly deny that Congress has the constitutional power to carry on a legislative warfare, either open or disguised, against any branch of foreign commerce, with a view to the advancement of any other branch of national industry. I know, sir, that I shall be asked if Congress have not the power of laying impost duties for the purposes of raising revenue, and also the power of "regulating commerce with foreign nations;" and to these questions I answer in the affirmative. I shall be then asked, how it would be possible for the Supreme Court to pronounce a law of Congress unconstitutional, which purports, upon the face of it, to be a revenue measure, or a measure for the regulation of commerce. To this I answer, that the Supreme Court could not, and would not, pronounce such a law unconstitutional, because they cannot look into the motives of the Legislature. But, sir, a law, or a system of laws, calculated and designed to destroy commerce, or any branch of it, is not the less unconstitutional because the Supreme Court cannot pronounce it to be so. It is not a question of which that court could take cognizance. It turns upon great political principles, which would be entirely out of place in a mere technical argument before a judicial tribunal, but which this body is under the most solemn obligations to regard in all its proceedings.

As no one now pretends that these prohibitory duties are imposed for the purpose of raising revenue, I shall proceed to inquire how far they can be justified by the clause of the constitution which authorizes Congress "to regulate commerce with foreign nations." What, then, was the object of the convention in clothing Congress with this power to regulate foreign commerce? I put it to the conscience of every member of this body, upon the high responsibility under which he is acting, to answer me the question, whether this power was not vested in Congress for the sole and exclusive purpose of preserving, protecting, and defending the very commerce which it proposes to regulate. No one, I am sure, can seriously believe that there is any other legitimate object for which this power can have been conferred, or for which it can be rightfully exercised. By constituting Congress the guardian of our foreign commerce, the constitution has imposed upon that body the high duty of extending its protecting arm equally and impartially to every lawful branch of that commerce. No restriction, therefore, can be lawfully and constitutionally imposed upon the foreign trade of any part of this Union, that has not for its object the preservation, security, or improvement of the very branch of trade upon which it is imposed. Any man who will look into the history of the times which immediately preceded the Federal Convention, will be satisfied that the great object of convoking that assembly, and of creating this Government, was to provide for the security of our foreign commerce. What language then can be used strong enough to characterize those prohibitory regulations of Congress which are inevitably calculated, and openly and avowedly intended, not only to suspend for an indefinite time, but utterly to abolish and destroy, forever, a great branch of commerce belonging to eight sovereign States of this confederacy? There is nothing, sir, either in history or fable, that can be compared with this most unnatural and monstrous perversion of power. The very commerce which this Government was created to preserve, and which it is under the clearest and most solemn constitutional obligations to protect and defend against all foreign outrage, is actually destroyed by the Government which was created to preserve it, and professing to act under a power evidently conferred for no other purpose! Yes, sir, and to add mockery to the outrage, Congress very modestly claims the title of a parental and protecting government, for the very act of sacrificing that commerce which it is bound to preserve, to build up on its ruins a distinct branch of industry—domestic manufactures—which the constitution has not committed to the guardianship of the Federal Government in any respect whatever. The monster which should devour his own offspring, would not commit a greater outrage against nature, than this body is thus perpetrating against the constitution under which it assumes to act, and from which only it can derive any legitimate authority. The only cause which can justify Congress in imposing restrictions and prohibitions upon commerce, is the violation, by foreign powers, of those principles of international law which are the guaranty of our commercial and other sovereign rights as a nation; and the only constitutional object to which these restrictions and prohibitions can be directed, is to induce or constrain foreign powers to repeal the regulations, or abandon the course of action by which our national rights are violated. This Government was principally designed by its framers to concentrate the whole power of the confederacy, for the purpose of resisting the aggressions of foreign nations upon our rights on the ocean. If no such aggression has been committed, if all our rights of commerce and navigation are secure under the protection of the law of nations, even from apprehended encroachments, then, sir, I maintain that the case has not occurred, in which this Government may rightfully interpose its power to vindicate the sovereign rights of the confederacy, either by military force or legislative restrictions and prohibitions.

I will now illustrate my views on this subject, by a brief examination of the embargo of 1807, a measure too memorable to have been forgotten, and with the history of which, I take it for granted, every member of the committee is familiar. It is a well known fact, that an entire political party, constituting a decided majority of the people of New England, and headed by men of very distinguished talents and great political experience, denounced the measure in question as an unconstitutional perversion of the power to regulate commerce. I believe, sir, that every public functionary, from the chief Executive downwards, and every department of the Government in almost every New England State, solemnly pronounced the embargo law unconstitutional.

There never was a political party arrayed against this Government with more unanimity upon any question, than were the federal party of New England upon the unconstitutionality of that measure. Now, sir, what was the ground upon which it was contended that the embargo was unconstitutional? I have recently heard that ground stated, from high authority, in a speech delivered not far off, in which the idea seemed still to be maintained. The ground was this: that the embargo law contained no limitation upon its face, and was, therefore, an indefinite suspension of commerce. To suspend commerce indefinitely, is to destroy it; and the power to regulate commerce does not confer the right to destroy it. Such, sir, was the argument, as I understand it. Though it is certainly a plausible and imposing argument, I do not think it a sound one. It entirely overlooks the cause which induced Congress to pass the embargo law, and the object to accomplish which it was enacted, both of them considerations essential to the correct determination of the question of constitutionality. Let it be remembered that the belligerent powers of Europe had committed a series of outrages upon our national and commercial rights, in open violation of the clearest principles of the law of nations. Here, then, was an undoubted case for the constitutional interposition of the power of the Federal Government. The casus fœderis of the constitutional compact had evidently occurred. The rights of the citizens were violated by foreign powers, and this Government, having in charge the foreign relations of the country, was not only authorized to vindicate those rights by commercial restrictions, but even by war itself—the last resort of injured nations. Indeed, the embargo was a war measure in all its material characteristics, viewed in reference either to its causes or its objects.

And what, sir, was the end, the final end, which Congress proposed to accomplish by the embargo? Was there a man in America at the time—is there a man in America at present, so far gone in the delusions of party prejudice, as to believe that Mr. Jefferson, in recommending the embargo, or Congress in adopting it, aimed at the permanent destruction of commerce, or of any branch of it, as the ultimate and final end of that measure? It will hardly be doubted, at this day, that the sole and exclusive object which the Government had in view, in this temporary suspension of foreign commerce, was to compel the belligerent powers to relieve that very commerce from the shackles and restrictions which they had thrown around it, contrary to the law of nations, and in violation of the sovereign rights of the United States. I am decidedly of the opinion, therefore, that the embargo was a constitutional measure; but I am very far from believing that it was a wise one.

Let us now see how the prohibitory acts of 1824 and 1828 will stand a comparison with the embargo of 1807, in regard to the two essential requisites of a constitutional regulation of commerce. I mean a sufficient cause, and a justifiable object. What, then, was the cause of these two prohibitory acts? Was it pretended that any foreign power had violated our rights, by imposing restrictions upon our commerce, not warranted by the law of nations? So far from this being the case, the only measure of a foreign power, which has been alleged as a motive for a prohibitory tariff on our part, is the prohibition of foreign grain by Great Britain; a measure as highly applauded as it was unwisely imitated by the advocates of the prohibitory system in this country. It was not to vindicate any violated right, then, that the acts of 1824 and 1828 were passed, and thus far they want the justifying cause that existed in the case of the embargo. What, then, is the object, the final end, which these acts purpose to accomplish? Are they intended to compel any foreign power to abandon restrictions injurious to our commercial rights, or even detrimental to our commercial interests? This will scarcely be pretended. The only foreign restriction which has been alleged as an interference with our commerce, is that imposed by the British corn laws.

Now, will it be seriously argued that the manufacturers of the United States are anxious to induce or constrain Great Britain to repeal her corn laws? Will any man in this House hazard the assertion, that the prohibitory duties imposed by Congress were designed to produce such an effect? Nothing, sir, was more remote from the wishes of those by whom these duties were imposed. When the subject of negotiating a commercial treaty with Great Britain, providing for a reciprocal free trade between the two countries, was agitated some months ago in the public journals, in what tone and temper was it denounced by the advocates of the manufacturing interest? And when a bill was reported a few days ago by the Committee on Commerce, proposing to effect the same object, in a partial degree, by legislation, what an electric terror seemed to run through the ranks of the tariff party in this House?

No measure could be adopted by any foreign Government, and particularly by that of Great Britain, that would be more earnestly deprecated by the friends of the protecting system in this country, than an unconditional repeal of all commercial restrictions. If the British Parliament were about to abolish the corn laws, the manufacturers of the United States, if there was any disguise in which they could present themselves, would pray for a continuance of those laws as devoutly as the British landlords. Their repeal, sir, would be the most fatal blow that could be inflicted on the manufacturers in this country, next to the repeal of our own prohibitory duties. What would be the effect of this repeal upon the competition between the British and American manufacturers? While it would diminish the price of grain one-half in Great Britain, and produce a corresponding reduction in the price of labor, and consequently in the cost of manufactures, it would produce an effect almost precisely opposite in the United States. It is an established principle of political economy in Great Britain, founded upon the actual condition of the laboring classes, that every rise or fall in the price of grain produces a rise or fall in the price of labor, almost exactly equal to increased or diminished cost of food for the laborer. This results from the fact, that the laborer is reduced to the minimum of human subsistence. His employer will not give him more, and cannot give him less. A reduction in the price of corn, therefore, from two dollars to one dollar a bushel—an effect which would probably result from the repeal of the British corn laws—would reduce the price of labor twenty-five per cent., and the cost of producing ma-manufactures twelve and a half per cent. This would be equivalent to a bounty to the British manufacturers, in their competition with those of the United States, while the latter would experience the disadvantage resulting from the increased price of grain, and consequently of labor, in this country, proceeding from the same cause. That I have not overrated the effect of the repeal of the corn laws of Great Britain, may be inferred from the fact, that a very intelligent writer in that country has expressed the opinion that the productive industry of the nation would be as much relieved by the abolition of the corn laws, as it would by the total extinguishment of the public debt. It would be absurd to suppose, therefore, that the tariffs of 1824 and 1828 were designed to produce a repeal of the British corn laws. It follows that there is nothing, either in the causes which gave rise to those measures, or the objects they were designed to accomplish, at all connected with the foreign relations of the country, or of a nature to give them any pretensions to be considered constitutional regulations of commerce.

The Tariff.

What, then, was the real cause, and what the real object, of the prohibitory laws of 1824 and 1828? Did they proceed from any commercial regulation of foreign powers, injurious to the rights or interests which have been committed by the constitution to the guardianship of this Government? Assuredly they were not. Were they intended to foster and protect any branch of our foreign commerce, or any other national interest entrusted to the protection of Congress? The very reverse, sir. It cannot be disguised, indeed, it has been openly avowed, that they were intended for no other purpose than to annihilate, not for a season, but for all time, a lawful branch of commerce which Congress is constitutionally bound to protect, in order to build up on its ruins another branch of industry with which Congress has no more right to interfere than with the parish poor rates.

I ask you then, sir, in the name of the constitution, and of the principles of eternal justice, what right has Congress—what right can any human Government possess—to destroy the interests of one entire section of this confederacy, to promote the interests of the other sections? What right have you—I put the question to the majority of this House, in the name of all the people of the southern States—what right have you to lay your hands upon our property—upon that which is ours by the highest of all earthly titles—the blessing of God upon our own honest industry, and arbitrarily appropriate it to your own use, or to that of your constituents? No freak of tyranny, ever committed by an absolute despot, can exceed this outrage upon the principles of natural justice, which you are perpetrating under the perverted powers and prostituted forms of a free Government.

We have an undoubted natural right to the enjoyment of that commerce which you are now engaged in the unrighteous work of sweeping from the great highway of nations. Superadded to this natural right, we have a constitutional right to call upon the majority of Congress, as the special guardians of this very commerce, to guaranty the enjoyment of it, not only against the lawless pirates of the ocean, but against the injurious regulations of foreign States. And it is in this state of our mutual rights and obligations, that this majority are carrying on a system of legislative piracy—degrading the Government from its high estate, and reducing it from the sacred relation it ought to bear to all the interests of the Union, into a disgraceful confederacy with sea robbers and outlaws. Sir, this is no picture of the imagination; for I solemnly declare that I would rather, as a southern planter, take my chance, unaided by the public arm, against all the pirates that ever infested the great deep, than to be subject to the comprehensive and desolating sweep of the prohibitory system.

And now, having shown that the tendency and object of this system is to confiscate the commerce of the South, under the false and delusive pretext of regulating it, and to appropriate the proceeds of the property thus confiscated and condemned by the high admiralty of this system of plunder, to the special and exclusive uses of the northern capitalists, I beg leave to call the attention of the committee to a view of this subject, well calculated to develop and illustrate the true genius and character of the system.

The representatives of the manufacturing and tariff States allege that they have large and extensive manufacturing establishments, which it is their interest and their right to encourage and protect, and deny the right of the southern representatives to interfere with their protecting policy. Now, sir, as a southern representative, I claim no right to interfere with any protection, which any portion of the northern States may choose to extend, at their own expense, to their own manufactories. All I pretend to claim, is the right to put my veto upon this scheme of injustice and plunder, by which the property, the rightful and exclusive property, of my constituents, is unconstitutionally applied to that object.

There cannot be a proposition more self-evidently just and equitable, than that those States in which the manufacturing establishments are situated, should bear the burden of protecting them. Can a man be found, sir, in this House, or out of it, who would have the boldness to contest this position? Then why do not the manufacturing States protect their own manufactures? Will it be pretended that they have not the constitutional power? Has not the Legislature of every State in the Union an unlimited power to impose taxes upon the people of the State, and appropriate the proceeds, in the form of bounties, for the protection of domestic manufactures, or any other branch of domestic industry? No man of common information—no man, indeed, of common sense, will deny that every State Legislature has this power. Why, then, is it not exercised? Is the protection it would afford less direct and efficient than that which is afforded by the imposition of high impost duties? I will answer this question in the language of a man to whom the manufacturers have always looked, as to an oracle—I mean Alexander Hamilton. Speaking of "pecuniary bounties," he says: "This has been found one of the most efficacious means of encouraging manufactures; it is in some views the best."

"It is a species of encouragement more positive and direct than any other, and, for that very reason, has a more immediate tendency to stimulate and uphold new enterprises."

"It avoids the inconvenience of a temporary augmentation of price, which is incident to some other modes, or it produces it in a less degree, either by making no addition to the charges on the rival foreign article, as in the case of protecting duties, or by making a smaller addition."

"As often as a duty upon a foreign article makes an addition to its price, it causes an extra expense to the community, for the benefit of the domestic manufacturer. A bounty does no more."

These quotations are perfectly conclusive as to the superior efficacy of pecuniary bounties over protecting duties, as a means of encouraging domestic manufactures. I will add an additional advantage, which the advocates of the bill before us will not surely regard as unimportant. The protection given by these bounties cannot be evaded by smuggling or by false invoices. This, of itself, would seem to be perfectly decisive in favor of the bounty system. Under that system, sir, there would be no occasion for creating custom-house inquisitions and arbitrary appraisements. How, then, has it come to pass, that, while the manufacturers have been, for more than ten years past, clamoring at our doors for protection, the Legislature of no single State in the Union, so far as I am informed, has ever appropriated a cent, or raised a finger, to sustain these languishing and suffering interests; which certainly have a claim upon the States for protection, if indeed they have any claim at all? Sir, I have frequently put this question in former discussions upon this floor, and have never found a man bold enough to answer it. The advocates of the protecting system have invariably passed it over with a prudent and profound silence. The reason is obvious. No man dare to avow openly the true cause why the manufacturing States, having the undoubted power, will not extend any protection to their own manufacturers, but send them to Congress for relief.

The Tariff.

The moral sense of this nation would not tolerate the avowal, that the State of Massachusetts, for example, will not tax her own citizens to afford protection to her own manufactures, because the Federal Government can be made the unrighteous instrument of taxing the people of the southern States for the purpose of affording that protection.

This, sir, disguise it as gentlemen may, is the true question involved in the protecting system. The tariff States would permit every establishment within their limits to sink into utter ruin, before they would levy taxes from their own citizens to nourish and sustain them. That would be too plain and palpable a proceeding. It would instantly open the eyes of the people to the true character of the protecting system. It would tear off from the monster the veil which conceals its horrible deformity, and break its infatuating charm forever. If the protection afforded to the manufacturers by this Government were entirely withdrawn to-morrow, I do not believe there is a State Legislature in the Union, that would dare to substitute an equivalent protection in the form of pecuniary bounties drawn from the people of the State, and appropriated from the public treasury. Nothing that could be possibly suggested, in the way of argument, would exhibit the palpable injustice of this system in so strong a light as the course pursued, in this respect, by the Legislatures of the tariff States. Would any man believe, sir, that the Legislature of a sovereign State would memorialize Congress to protect the manufactures of that State, by imposing restrictions and duties upon the commerce of other States, when that Legislature, having the admitted power to protect those manufactures, utterly neglects to do it? Yet such was the conduct of the Legislature of Massachusetts; and such is, substantially, the course pursued by the Legislatures of all the tariff States.

I have, thus far, considered this system as involving an unconstitutional perversion of the power to regulate foreign commerce, with a view to bestow indirect bounties upon the manufactures of certain States, by imposing taxes and restrictions upon the commerce of certain other States. I will now invite the attention of the committee to some considerations calculated to show that it involves a violation of the great and fundamental principles of civil and political liberty. There is not one of those principles of more vital importance, or more absolutely consecrated by all the historical associations of both Great Britain and the United States, than that which secures the people against all taxes and burdens not imposed by their own representatives. This principle, indeed, is essentially involved in the very notion of self-government. Now, sir, owing to the federative character of our Government, the great geographical extent of our territory, and the diversity of the pursuits of our citizens in different parts of the Union, it has so happened that two great interests have sprung up, standing directly opposed to each other. One of them consists of those manufactures which the northern and middle States are capable of producing, but which, owing to the high price of labor and high profits of capital in those States, cannot hold competition with foreign manufactures, without the aid of bounties, directly or indirectly given, either by the General Government or by the State Governments. The other of these interests consists of the great agricultural staples of the southern States, which can find a market only in foreign countries, and which can be advantageously sold only in exchange for the foreign manufactures which come in competition with those of the northern and middle States. It follows, as a necessary consequence, that it is the interest of the manufacturers in the northern and middle States to prohibit, by heavy taxation, the importation of those foreign manufactures, which it is as undoubtedly the interest of the southern planters to import as free from taxation as possible.

These interests, then, stand diametrically and irreconcilably opposed to each other. The interest, the pecuniary interest of the northern manufacturer is directly promoted by every increase of the taxes imposed upon southern commerce; and it is unnecessary to add, that the interest of the southern planters is promoted by every diminution of the taxes imposed upon the productions of their industry. If, under these circumstances, the manufacturers were clothed with the power of imposing taxes, at their pleasure, upon the foreign imports of the planter, no doubt would exist upon the mind of any man, that it would have all the characteristics of an absolute and unqualified despotism. It will be my purpose, then, to show, that, by the aid of various associated interests, the manufacturing capitalists have obtained a complete and permanent control over the legislation of Congress on this subject. A great number of causes have contributed to give the manufacturing interest this ascendancy. The prominent and leading cause is, beyond all doubt, the natural influence of accumulated capital in the hands of a comparatively small number of men, acting with the sagacity, perseverance, and concert, for which they are invariably distinguished, in matters affecting their own pecuniary interests. It is a melancholy fact, to which all history bears the most unequivocal testimony, that whenever society becomes so far advanced in commerce and the arts, as to have produced a considerable accumulation of capital, the holders of that capital are perfectly irresistible on all those questions in relation to which the action of the Government is brought to bear upon the great pecuniary interests of society. Every one knows that there was a time, not very remote, when the great and leading feature in the policy of this Government was to favor and foster, by every species of exemption and bounty, the navigating and commercial interests of the nation. I need hardly add, that, at the period to which I allude, almost the whole of the accumulated capital of the country was embarked in the business of navigation and commerce.

But as soon as this capital was transferred to the business of manufactures, the whole policy of the Government, and the political principles of an entire region of country, on the subject of free trade and commercial restrictions, underwent a corresponding change. One would almost imagine, who had been long enough in Congress to have witnessed this extraordinary political transmutation, that the New England members of Congress were sent here as the representatives of capital, and not of numbers, so implicitly have they followed its direction.

Sir, no man of the slightest observation can be insensible of the influence of large capitalists upon the members of this House, on all questions affecting their peculiar interests. It is not to be disguised, that two or three wealthy iron-masters in a congressional district will exercise more influence over the representative here, than all the rest of his constituents united, upon the question of increasing or diminishing the tax upon foreign iron. The same is equally true as to the sugar planters, salt makers, and manufacturers of cotton and woollen fabrics. It is not a difficult matter to account for this influence of capital, employed in manufactures. I do most confidently believe that two or three large establishments, carried on by white laborers who were entitled to vote at elections, would be an overmatch for all the other interests in any congressional district in the Union. I have seen enough, even in my own district, to convince me that even that forms no exception to the general rule I have laid down.

What number of farmers, scattered over the country and unaccustomed to combination, could resist the influence of three large manufacturing capitalists, each having three hundred free laborers in his employment entitled to vote? Upon any question affecting the interest of the manufacturers, three thousand farmers would hold no competition with them. In the first place, there would be a perfect unity of action among the capitalists themselves, on the question, for example, vital to their own interests—of inducing Congress to give them a bounty, or impose a prohibitory duty having the same effect. In the second place, all the laborers in their employment would, upon the most obvious principles of human action, give their votes in such a way as to gratify the wishes, and promote the interest, of their employers. This would indeed be their own interest. In the third place, a considerable number of farmers and other persons, in the vicinity of these manufacturing establishments, would find a market for a great number of agricultural productions, which would otherwise be of scarcely any value to them. All these causes would produce a perfect unity of action amongst this large number of voters, directly and indirectly connected with the manufacturing establishments, and all their efforts in political contests would be directed to a single object—the protection of the manufacture in which they were engaged or interested. Whatever division might take place among other interests of the district, you would never find the manufacturers divided. Every candidate for popular favor would be made to understand that the consolidated vote of this manufacturing interest would be given against him, unless he would promise to support their applications for the bounty and protection of Congress. In this manner it would come to pass, that the contest between the manufacturers and the farmers would be like that between regular soldiers and untrained militia men, in which superior discipline would overbalance superior numbers. Men confederated together upon selfish and interested principles, whether in pursuit of the offices or the bounties of Government, are ever more active and vigilant than the great majority, who act from disinterested and patriotic impulses. Have we not witnessed it on this floor, sir? Who ever knew the tariff men to divide on any question affecting their confederated interests? If you propose to reduce any one of the duties, no matter how obvious the expediency of the reduction, they will tell you, if not in plain words, at least by their conduct, that the duty you propose to reduce is very oppressive and unjust, as in the case of salt; or very absurd and suicidal, as in the case of raw wool; but that, if you reduce either of these duties, a proposition will be made to reduce some other, and then some other, until the whole system of confederated interests will be shaken to its centre. The watchword is, stick together, right or wrong, upon every question affecting the common cause. Such, sir, is the concert and vigilance, and such the combinations by which the manufacturing party, acting upon the interests of some, and the prejudices of others, have obtained a decided and permanent control over public opinion in all the tariff States. All the representatives of those States, however decidedly opposed in principle to the prohibitory policy, are constrained to regard the interest of the manufacturers as that of their constituents at large. No man, sir, from a manufacturing district, would dare to vote against any measure, however unjust and oppressive, if it be only deemed beneficial to the manufacturers, and denominated a tariff.

In addition to the reasons I have stated, for regarding the manufacturing as the controlling interests in the tariff States, I will add another, which every reflecting man will duly appreciate. The manufacturers, in their applications to the General Government, naturally enlist the symthies and prepossessions of the States and sections of the Union to which they belong. The question of granting relief, for example, to eight or ten manufacturing establishments in Massachusetts, would be evidently regarded as a State question, though not ten thousand people should be directly or indirectly interested in it; and the member of Congress who should oppose it, would be deemed to have deserted the interest of his own State. There is another consideration still more decisive. The relief sought by the manufacturers is to be obtained by imposing burdens and restrictions upon the commerce of other States, and remote sections of the Union. All classes, therefore, in a manufacturing State, will naturally take sides with the manufacturers, in regard to all those measures which propose to advance the interests of those manufacturers, by taxing the commerce of the southern planters. Viewing it as a sectional question, there can be no doubt that the aggregate interest of the State would be promoted by such a measure, however inconsiderable the number of manufacturers. It is, indeed, the interest of Massachusetts to protect any of her manufacturers, however small the number, and however heavy the imposition necessary to effect it, if the benefit, however small, accrues to her citizens, and the burden, however great, falls upon the citizens of other States.

The unanimity with which the members of this House vote, even for private claims coming from their own States—when scarcely anybody else can perceive any justice in them—is a commentary upon what I have been saying, which every gentleman will know how to estimate.

On all questions to be decided by Congress, therefore, affecting the interests of the manufacturers, or any of those associated interests which the persons concerned are pleased to denominate domestic industry, I am constrained to regard the policy of the tariff States as fixed and unalterable; as much so, as if the representatives of those States were chosen exclusively by the manufacturers themselves, and sent here as their special agents, acting under instructions.

What, then, becomes of the great principle of liberty, to which I have adverted—which secures the people against any burdens of taxation not imposed by their own representatives? Is it not absolutely annulled—nay, is it not completely reversed, as to the people of the southern States, in all cases involving the interest of the manufacturers, and the policy of the protecting system? Is not the majority of Congress composed of the representatives of those who have a direct and positive pecuniary interest in imposing taxes upon the people of the southern States, in the form of high and prohibitory duties upon their lawful commerce—the product of their honest industry? Does not that majority declare it to be its interest, and avow it to be its object, to pursue this system of prohibitory duties until the whole of that commerce which gives value to the agricultural productions of the southern States, and without which our fields would be left desolate, shall be utterly and absolutely abolished? It is not many days since I heard an honorable gentleman from New York express the opinion, that, in less than ten years, probably in half the time, the whole of those foreign manufactures which fall within the purview of the prohibitory policy, and which are the only articles the southern planters can receive, to any tolerable extent, or with any sort of advantage, in exchange for their staples, would cease to be imported, leaving not a vestige of that important branch of our foreign commerce. There is too much reason to believe, sir, that this opinion is well founded. When the tariff of 1828 shall have reached its maximum, and the rigorous enforcement of the duties shall be secured by the bill on your tables, I have no doubt you will have provided a system which will accomplish the work of entire prohibition in the time limited by the member from New York, to whom I have alluded.

The Tariff.

[H. of R.]

It is in vain, then, that the people of the South attempt to palter with this question, or to disguise any longer the sad reality of their condition. They have no security against taxation, but the will of those who have a settled interest and fixed determination to increase their burdens; they have no rights of property, no title to that commerce which gives the principal value to the productions of their industry, which they do not hold by the same miserable and degrading tenure. They are, to all intents and purposes, the slaves of northern monopolists. If I were called upon to give a definition of slavery, I could not use language more appropriate than that which should accurately describe the condition of the people of the southern States.

There is no form of despotism that has ever existed upon the face of the earth, more monstrous and horrible than that of a representative Government acting beyond the sphere of its responsibility. Liberty is an empty sound, and representation worse than a vain delusion, unless the action of the Government be so regulated that responsibility and power shall be co-extensive. Now, I would be glad to know, under what responsibility the majority of this House act, in imposing burdens upon the industry of the southern people, and in waging this merciless warfare against their commerce. Are they, in the slightest degree, responsible to those upon whom they impose these heavy burdens? Have they any feelings of common interest or common sympathy to restrain them from oppression and tyranny? Does the system of prohibitory duties, which falls with such a destructive power upon the dearest interests of the southern people, impose any burden, or inflict any injury at all, upon the constituents of that majority by which it has been adopted?

The very reverse of all this is the truth. The majority which imposes these oppressive taxes upon the people of the South, so far from being responsible to them, or to those who have any common interest or common sympathy with them, in relation to the matter, are responsible to the very men who have been, for the last ten years, making the welkin ring with their clamors for the imposition of these very burdens. Yes, sir, those who lay the iron hand of unconstitutional and lawless taxation upon the people of the southern States, are not the representatives of those who pay the taxes, or have any participation in it, but the representatives of those who receive the bounty, and put it in their pockets.

Can there be a more gross, monstrous, and insulting mockery, than to tell my oppressed and outraged constituents that their rights are secured by the principle of representative responsibility? It would be just as rational to talk about the responsibility of a Roman emperor to the Prætorian bands by whom he was elevated to the throne, as a security against plundering the subject provinces for the purpose of paying the stipulated donatives by which he had purchased the empire.

The very principle of representative responsibility, when the Government is thrown from its balance, becomes itself a principle of the most despotic tyranny. It would be far better for the southern people, so far as this tariff policy is concerned, (and, as God is my judge, I would prefer it,) that the majority of Congress should be responsible to no earthly power, than that they should be responsible to the very persons who have the deepest interest of all the people on earth in the taxation and oppression of the southern people. Sir, these things cannot, must not, be. It is utterly impossible that such a state of things can be permitted to continue in a land where liberty, constitutional liberty, is endeared by so many glorious associations.

I am aware that the answer given to all this will be, that it is the right of the majority to govern, and the duty of the minority to submit. There is no political principle more undeniably true, in all the cases to which it properly applies. But it is subject to two very important limitations in our federative system of Government, growing out of the constitutional compact, and founded upon the principles of natural justice: In the first place, the majority cannot rightfully do any thing not authorized by the constitutional charter. The great object of a written constitution is to restrain the majority. It is founded upon the idea that an unchecked majority is as dangerous as an unchecked minority. I believe, when cut loose from the moorings of an effective and real responsibility, it is more so. But of that hereafter.

In the second place, the right of the majority to govern, in a political system composed of confederated sovereignties, and extending over geographical subdivisions having diversified and conflicting interests, must be limited to those cases where there is a common interest pervading the whole confederacy. This is a limitation growing out of the very nature and object of the compact, even upon the exercise of powers expressly granted. The submission of interests which are essentially adverse to the control of a common Government, necessarily involves the destruction of one or the other of them. This is the foundation of the checks and balances, even of consolidated Governments, and of the partition of power among distinct sovereignties in this confederacy.

It is contrary to the clearest principles of natural justice, that the majority, merely because they have the power, should violate the rights and destroy the separate and peculiar interests of the minority. This would make power and right synonymous terms. The majority have no natural right, in any case, to govern the minority. It is a mere conventional right, growing out of necessity and convenience. On the contrary, the right of the minority to the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property, without any unjust interference on the part of the majority, is the most sacred of the natural rights of man.

When the great antagonist interests of society become arrayed against each other, particularly when they are separated by distance, and distinguished by a difference of climate, character, and civil institutions, the great object of the Government should undoubtedly be, not to become the partisan of either of those interests, but to interpose its power for the purpose of preventing the stronger from destroying the weaker. Instead, however, of assuming this attitude, instead of restraining the major interest from doing this act of injustice and oppression, this Government degrades itself into the character of a partisan of the stronger interest, and an instrument of its oppression. It cannot be otherwise, sir, as long as the majority in Congress, being nothing more than the agent of the major interest in the confederacy, assumes the power of arbitrarily and unjustly appropriating to its own use the rightful and exclusive property of the minority. The majority can have no such rightful power. It is neither more nor less, stripped of the disguise thrown around it by the empty forms of legislative proceeding, than downright swindling and robbery; crimes which, in any civilized country in the world, would subject the individual perpetrator to infamous punishment. What human power can confer upon one set of men; however numerous, the right to commit such an outrage upon another set, however few in number? Will any advocate of the tariff policy admit that ten men have any greater right to rob him of his property, than he has to rob the ten of theirs? Yet this would be a legitimate consequence of admitting that a majority of Congress have an unlimited and uncontrollable right to dispose of the property of the minority.

If the commerce which this prohibitory system proposes to destroy were the common property of the whole Union; if the great agricultural staples, which are the basis of that commerce, were equally the productions of all the States of the confederacy, the principle of representative responsibility would furnish to the southern planter all the security against oppression which human wisdom can provide: There would be a real and effective responsibility pervading the whole system. A citizen of South Carolina would confidently confide his interests to a representative from Massachusetts, not because that representative was responsible to him, but because he was responsible to persons having the very same interest. It is this community of interest that can alone ensure the effective responsibility of a representative Government. Where this does not exist, the principle of responsibility ceases to afford any security against oppression, and the power of the common Government should cease with it.

Whenever the Federal Government, therefore, assumes to act upon the local or peculiar interest of particular States or sections of the Union, it as clearly transcends the appropriate sphere of its constitutional and responsible power, as a State Government would do, in attempting to control those common interests that have been committed to the protection of the Federal Government. In the one case, it would be despotism; in the other, anarchy. God forbid that we should ever be driven to the dreadful alternative of choosing between them, even for a time.

I have said that there cannot be imagined a more odious and intolerable form of despotism, than that of a majority, stimulated by motives of self-interest, and acting without any restraining power upon the interests of the minority. A just analysis and exposition of the true character and principles of that combination, or, more properly, conspiracy of interests, which constitutes the tariff majority in the United States, will exhibit this idea in a more striking point of view than any thing I have yet advanced on the subject. I venture the assertion, that no priesthood, in the darkest ages of ignorance and superstition, ever pursued their selfish objects with more untiring perseverance and consummate art, than the manufacturing capitalists have prosecuted their mercenary schemes of monopoly. Commencing with a few followers—like other impostors of whom we read—they have successively enlisted under their banner a sufficient number of confederate interests to render themselves formidable; and, finally, by addressing themselves to the ambition of some, and the prejudices of others, they have disseminated the delusion of their false doctrines through all ranks of society in the tariff States. Aspiring politicians, finding it conducive to their political advancement, have not scrupled to form an alliance, cemented by avarice and ambition, and not less ominous to public liberty than that which has existed in other times, and in other countries, between church and State. By the artful use of cant phrases and cabalistic terms, addressed to the national pride and local prejudices of the people—such as the “American System” and the “British System,” “Old England” and “New England,” the “Free States” and the “Slave States”—they have succeeded in working up the public mind in the manufacturing States to a state of infatuation almost incredible, and, in my opinion, utterly incurable. What, then, are we to expect from a majority, thus bound together by the two strongest of human passions—avarice and ambition; and acting under the imposing disguise of disinterested patriotism? It has been said, sir, by a wise man, that one hundred philosophers, thrown together, and acting under the impulse of a common interest, and the contagion of a common passion, would be converted into a mob. There can be no doubt of the correctness of the principle; and it is even more powerfully exemplified in its application to large masses and communities of men, united by common interests, common passions, and common prejudices, and directing their efforts to a common object. It is but too apparent that entire sections of the Union, bound together in a confederacy of interest and ambition, urged on by the master spirit of manufacturing monopoly and political management, and sustained by the blind and demoralizing delusion that it is the dictate of true patriotism to oppress and plunder the minority, because they prosecute trade with a foreign country—it must be apparent, I say, that whole sections of the Union, distinguished from the minority by the peculiarity of their civil institutions, and arrayed against that minority by this united motive of interest, and ambition, and prejudice, will prosecute their schemes of injustice and oppression with all that want of moral responsibility which distinguishes the proceedings of an infuriated mob. Yes, sir, the mighty mass, blinded by a delusion which converts plunder into patriotism, will perpetrate, under the prostituted forms of legislation, acts of oppression and injustice, which no individual composing it would think of perpetrating, when acting on his separate responsibility. Such, then, is a faithful portrait of that majority, which we are told have a natural right to regulate and confiscate the interests of the minority. What despotism can be pointed out, either among the dark realities of history, or the wilder fictions of poetry, more fearful to contemplate? What refuge, what hope, what security have the minority, when this devouring monster walks abroad, clothed with the mantle and armed with the sceptre of power, and stimulated by the insatiable spirit of monopoly? Shall I be told that the minority must throw themselves upon the humanity, justice, and moderation of this majority? What, sir! are we to expect justice, humanity, and moderation from the spirit and genius of monopoly itself? You had as well think of striking fire from an icicle! You had as well attempt to satiate the appetite of a cannibal by the cries of infant tenderness!

I solemnly declare that I would prefer the Government of a single despot to that of such a majority as I have described, acting upon the rights and interests of the minority, without any restraint but that imposed by its own will. The subjects of an imperial despot are not without some security against the extremes of oppression. The greatest tyrant that ever reigned—even the Emperor Tiberius, was still a man, having the soul, and the feelings, and the sympathies of a man, and could not, therefore, behold, without some “compunctious visitings,” the sufferings of his subjects, and the desolation and plunder of his provinces. But such a majority as I have described has no more soul than a corporation, and, in the very nature of things, is utterly incapable of human sympathy.

There is another restraint upon the power of a single tyrant, which does not operate upon this tyrant majority, appropriately denominated in another place “king numbers.” The physical force of society is on the side of the oppressed, in the case of a single despot. An act of tyranny will vibrate through the hearts of all his subjects, from one extremity of his dominions to the other. Every man will feel that the blow which strikes down his fellow-subject to-day, may fall upon him to-morrow. A sense of common danger and common suffering will induce the most degraded population in the world to impose such limits upon the practical exercise of despotic power, as will prevent the extremes of oppression. It is a historical fact, sir, that there does not exist on the face of the earth a despotism that is not restrained by some principle, moral, religious, or political, which operates as a practical check upon power, and a security against oppression. But what human principle, what earthly power, is there to restrain the majority? To what tribunal can the oppressed minority carry their appeal, and urge their plea against oppression and injustice? Can they appeal to public opinion, that high tribunal by which the despotism even of Napoleon, with all his military power, was controlled? That public opinion is the very spirit and soul—the animating principles of the tyranny that oppresses them. Then, sir, there is no refuge for the minority, if the sacred and protecting power of the constitution cannot be interposed—“Their final hope is flat despair.”

There is another particular in which the despotism of a single tyrant is preferable to that of a legislative majority, such as I have described. His appetite for taxation and plunder is infinitely less voracious. There is a limit to the exactions of an absolute monarch, which he has no motive to exceed. When his subjects have supplied his exchequer with a sufficient treasure to gratify his imperial vanity, by covering him with the decorations appropriate to his rank—when they have provided the means of keeping up his civil and military establishments, and of maintaining the pomp and pageantry of power; ambition itself can supply no motive for any further exaction. But where is the people whose resources are sufficient to satisfy the voracious cravings of a majority, acting upon the principles of the manufacturers and their confederates in this unholy crusade against the commerce of the southern States? The wealth of the Indies might be exhausted, and yet the appetite for plunder would be as far from being satiated as ever.

It cannot be doubted that, when a majority of the common legislative council, in a federative system of Government, assumes the power, and makes it the avowed and final object of its exercise to injure or destroy the local, peculiar, and exclusive interests of a part of the States composing the confederacy, the principle of confederation itself is converted into the heaviest political curse that can afflict any people. Its very end is utterly perverted. The only legitimate purpose of a confederation of States is the preservation of every member of the league, both from foreign injustice and violence, and from the injustice and violence of the other members. But it cannot be disguised that, in the case under consideration, the power of the confederacy is prostituted to the perpetration of the very injustice and violence it was specially, if not exclusively, intended to prevent, and to the destruction of the very rights and interests it was intended to secure; and that, too, in the most injurious, because the most insidious, of all forms—the substitution of legislative power for physical force. In this way, the States composing the majority are as distinctly arrayed against those composing the minority, in a war of legislation, as they possibly could be in a war of arms, if they were unconnected sovereignties. If the States were not united by this confederacy, a greater outrage could not be conceived, as well against the principles of natural justice, as against the law of nations, than an attempt of two-thirds of those States to prohibit and destroy the lawful commerce of the other third. The universal sense of all civilized nations would cry out against the enormity. Yet this is precisely, and to the very letter, the outrage which the tariff States are now perpetrating against the southern States, through the instrumentality of a Government formed for the very purpose of preventing it. The Federal Legislature, under these circumstances, entirely loses its conservative character, ceases to be the common council of the confederacy, and becomes a mere substitute for armies and navies, to carry on the work of plunder and desolation by which the tariff States propose to counteract the bountiful dispensations of Providence in favor of the southern States. The hall of Congress is nothing more nor less than a field of battle, in which the conflicting powers are arrayed against each other in a species of warfare, in which neither valor, nor skill, nor reason, nor justice, are of any avail to the combatants, but of which the issue is ultimately decided by the mere brute force of numbers. This palpable prostitution and perversion of the federal power of the Union not only fails to secure every member of that Union from the injustice and violence of the other members, but places in the hands of a majority of States an instrument more powerful and more dangerous than cannon, for the destruction of the interests of the minority.

Without fleets or armies, and, what is of infinite importance to tender consciences—without hazarding the loss of a single drop of human blood, a prosperous commerce is swept from the face of the ocean by the mere mathematical power of numbers. All that is required, is that the Clerk at your table should count over the votes, and the Speaker pronounce “the yeas have it,” and the work of desolation is done. This, too, is all accomplished peaceably. Yes, sir, war is prevented between the members of the confederacy, but that is substituted which is infinitely worse for the minority. If the majority, in waging a war of piracy and plunder, were exposed to the perils of their vocation, there would be some security in that, even to the minority. “The battle is not always to the strong.” Valor and skill might supply the place of numbers in the open field, and a just cause would give a threefold energy to every freeman, in resisting the lawless invader of his rights. But when it is reduced to a mere matter of counting, what valor, what skill, what power of argument or eloquence can make a minority of votes in a just cause of equal power with a majority in an unjust one?

I beg leave now to suggest, for the consideration of the committee, some historical analogies which are calculated to exhibit, in a strong, practical point of view, the tyranny and injustice of this proscriptive system of legislation which the majority of Congress have carried on for the last ten years against the lawful commerce of the southern States. What, then, is the sum and substance of that system? It is precisely this, sir: that the southern States shall be prohibited from carrying on commerce in certain articles with the nations of the world, and shall be restricted to an intercourse with the tariff States of this Union. This reduces the southern States to a state of colonial vassalage to the tariff States, decidedly worse than that of our ancestors to Great Britain. What was the amount of the colonial vassalage of our ancestors? It was nothing more than that they should be “prohibited from carrying on commerce, in certain articles, with the nations of the world, and should be restricted to an intercourse with Great Britain.”

The southern States, then, are reduced to the very same relation to the tariff States, in point of principle, as that in which all the colonies formerly stood to Great Britain. They have changed their masters, to be sure; and I will now proceed to inquire what they have gained by the change.

I confidently assert that the restrictions imposed by the tariff States upon the commerce of the planting States, are one hundred times more injurious and oppressive than all the colonial restrictions and taxes which Great Britain ever imposed, or attempted to impose, upon the commerce of our forefathers. Yes, sir, a revolution which severed a mighty empire into fragments, and which history has already recorded as the first in the annals of human liberty, originated in restrictions and impositions, not a whit more tyrannical in principle, and, as I will proceed to demonstrate, not a hundredth part so oppressive in point of fact, as the restrictions and impositions now unconstitutionally imposed upon the southern States.

The prohibition which excluded our ancestors from the commerce of all other countries but Great Britain, was almost purely nominal. Without that prohibition, the trade of the colonies would have been confined almost exclusively to the mother country. She furnished them with the best market in the world for all the productions of their industry. She supplied the articles they wanted cheaper than they could be obtained from any other nation, and gave them a better price for their productions. But the very opposite of this is true as to the restrictions of which we now complain. Instead of coinciding with the natural course of trade, they come directly in contact with it. The southern States are excluded from their natural markets—the very best in the world, for the purpose of confining them to a market which is, in all respects, the very worst. Europe now consumes five-sixths of our agricultural staples, and the consumption would be indefinitely extended, if the trade was unrestricted; the tariff States could not consume, under any circumstances, more than one-fifth of these staples. Great Britain, France, and Holland could furnish us with such manufactures as we want, at a price one-third less than that for which they ever can be furnished by the manufacturing States of this Union; and, under these circumstances, we are compelled to purchase from these States, and denied our natural right of purchasing from foreign nations. In one word, we are excluded from the very best markets in the world, and confined to that in which we can get least for what we have to sell, and are compelled to give most for what we desire to purchase.

The duties and restrictions imposed upon the commerce of the southern States for the exclusive benefit of the tariff States, amount to a larger sum of taxation and oppression in a single year, than all the restrictions and taxes imposed upon all the colonies by the British Parliament, from the date of the stamp act to the breaking out of the revolutionary war.

The southern States are to all intents and purposes recolonized, as much so as if the British Parliament had the supreme legislative power of regulating their commerce.

I am aware that it has been attempted to impair the force of this analogy, by adverting to the fact that the southern States are fairly represented in Congress. But when the power of this Common Council is directed against the interest of the minority, so isolated and distinguished by geographical and civil peculiarities and commercial interests, as that laws, apparently and nominally general, may be, in effect, local and exclusive in their impositions, it is obvious that a representation of the minority, on all questions affecting its distinct and local interests, is substantially no representation at all. When the proposition before Congress is the imposition of a common and equal burden upon the whole country, or the appropriation of the common funds to defend the rights of a single State, or even of a single individual, I should consider the southern States really represented, however much they might differ with the majority. But when the proposition is to impose an exclusive burden on those States, or appropriate their peculiar funds for the benefit even of all the other States, I should regard them as having no representation at all, though they were entitled to ninety-nine votes in a council of two hundred. On such a question, any thing less than a majority, or, at least, an equality, of votes, is precisely equal to no vote at all. It is not a question of deliberation, concerning common interests, but a question of naked, numerical power, concerning interests that are entirely adverse.

Nothing, therefore, can be more unfair and ridiculous, than to maintain that the unjust and unconstitutional impositions of the tariff system are, in any respect, less tyrannical in their operation upon the southern States, merely because those States are represented in Congress. What would have been the nature of a colonial representation in the British Parliament in 1776? The wisest of our patriotic ancestors rejected the idea as a miserable mockery. What is the value of an Irish representation in the British Parliament, on all questions affecting the local interests of Ireland, and in which the interests or prejudices of England stand opposed to them? Let the oppression and ruin of Ireland answer the question. What would be the value of West India representation in Parliament, on the question of negro emancipation? And what is the value of a southern representation in Congress, when the question to be determined is, whether ten millions of southern commerce shall be subjected to the legislative rapacity of the majority? They serve no other purpose than to be nominal parties to the immolation of their constituents, and thus furnish to their oppressors a pretext and disguise for the outrage.

The course of these remarks forcibly suggests another historical analogy, calculated, if that be possible, to exhibit, in a still stronger point of view, the state of political degradation to which the southern States are reduced by the prohibitory system. The recent war with Great Britain will be memorable in the history of the country, as the second war of independence. The evident tendency of the British pretensions to recolonize the United States, caused every enlightened patriot to see and to feel that such was the true character of the contest. Now, what were the pretensions of Great Britain? In the very strongest point of view, they amounted to no more than the assumption of a right, on the part of Great Britain, not to prohibit, but to shackle and encumber, during war, the commerce of the United States with the adverse belligerents. Suppose she had set up the broad pretension—similar to that now enforced by the tariff States—that we should trade exclusively with her, and should not trade with France, either in peace or in war. There is not a patriot in the Union who would not have seen his country one vast catacomb of slaughtered freemen, before he would have tarnished the memory of his ancestors, by submitting to terms so ignominious and degrading. Every plain would have been a Marathon, and every strait a Thermopylæ; and Great Britain would never have succeeded in establishing her arrogant pretensions, until none but slaves survived to acknowledge and submit to it. And yet the southern States, who so gloriously sustained a war waged against this pretension, are now actually reduced to a state of degradation and dependence, beyond all question worse than that which would have resulted from its establishment. If we had been actually conquered by the British arms—if we had been compelled to prostrate the insignia of our sovereignty at the feet of the conqueror, and the terms of our submission had been dictated at the head of victorious legions, nothing worse could have been imposed upon the whole confederacy, by the right of conquest, than the oppression and vassalage to which the southern States are now subjected by the legislation of Congress.

If all the commercial nations in the world were to unite in a conspiracy to cripple and restrict our commerce, by hostile regulations, so far as their own interests would be promoted by it; if all the restraints interposed by the law of nations to protect that commerce were annulled, and the nations of Europe had the unlimited power to make what regulations they pleased in regard to it, nothing worse could possibly be done, than what our own legislation has done already. It is true, sir, if there be any consolation in that, that the injury is not inflicted by a foreign power, but by those who call themselves our brethren and fellow-citizens. But I am far from perceiving any thing in this circumstance to mitigate the injury. I solemnly declare, I would rather it were inflicted by a foreign power. A dagger plunged by the hand of a brother carries a severer pang to the heart of the injured party, from the very consideration that the blow was inflicted by one who was under the most sacred obligations to arrest it, if aimed by another.

I must now invite the attention of the committee for a few moments to a brief exposition of the actual condition of suffering to which the southern States have been reduced by this system. I will draw no picture of the imagination, but present a few decisive facts that will speak a language too unequivocal to admit of but one interpretation. For the last twelve years, the condition of the country has been growing worse and worse, in a steady progression. During this time, the price of cotton has fallen from thirty to ten cents a pound, and every thing else in a corresponding degree. This state of things is peculiarly distressing. Almost any condition is tolerable which is permanent. We become reconciled to it by habit, and make all our calculations and pecuniary arrangements to accord with it. But when tariff is passed after tariff, extending further and further the oppressive influence of the system, constant pecuniary embarrassment is the almost unavoidable result. No prudence can avoid it. An unexpected decline in the price of produce baffles the calculations even of the most cautious; and, in this downward tendency of things, the planter almost invariably finds, each successive year, his means of meeting his pecuniary engagements less than he reasonably calculated when he made them.

The profits of the cotton planter, with all the natural advantages with which Providence has favored him, are now actually less than those of any other description of capitalists in the Union. I speak of what I personally know, when I assert that the labor of a slave in the field does not yield the owner more than twelve and a half cents per day, on an average. Now, sir, I leave it to any gentleman from the middle or eastern States, to say whether the price of common field labor is not three or four times as high. Taking the average of the various kinds of labor in those States, I feel authorized to say, it may be set down at fifty cents a day. I am aware of the prevalence of an idea that slave labor is not as efficient as free labor; but, as regards agricultural pursuits, it is entirely erroneous. No white man from New England, or any where else, can do more field labor than a South Carolina slave. Taking the average of the year, the southern planter has greatly more labor performed by each hand, than the northern farmer. With us, there is no season of rest from one end of the day, or from one end of the year, to the other. The winter season, which is a period of festivity and rest with the northern farmers, is, with our planters, a period of active and laborious preparation for the ensuing spring. If, notwithstanding, he cultivates the most valuable staple in the world, and works thus incessantly through the whole year, the labor of the southern planter is not one-fourth part as productive as the average of northern labor, does it not furnish a striking commentary upon the ruinous and exhausting effects of your oppressive system of taxation? If the soil and climate of Pennsylvania or New York were as well adapted to the culture of cotton as those of South Carolina or Georgia, I am well satisfied, a Pennsylvania or New York farmer could not afford to cultivate cotton for less than twenty cents a pound, with all the industry and economy he could use. Let any man acquainted with the business of cotton planting make an estimate of the price for which he could afford to raise cotton, using hired labor at fifty cents a day, and he will find the statement I have made amply confirmed by the result.

I know there was a time, sir, when it was believed that the southern planters were realizing so rich a harvest of prosperity, and such enormous profits, that it was thought nothing more than justice to cut down their incomes, by this new species of agrarian legislation, to a level with those derived from other modes of employing capital. But, even if you had any semblance of right to exercise this arbitrary power of curtailing incomes and equalizing profits, you have carried it entirely beyond the point at which your own principles would require you to stop. If you have a right to reduce the labor of the planter to a level with your own, have you any right to carry the reduction so far, that you shall receive three or four times as great a reward for your labor as the planter does for his? No agricultural community, that carried on the labors of the field by free labor, could have endured, or would have submitted to this system of oppressive exaction, until the price of labor had reached so low a point of depression as it has in the southern States. There is no example existing, of so great a fall in the price of any agricultural production, as that which has taken place in the southern staples. From century to century, the price of corn, for example, maintains almost a uniform price, because the cost of its production—the actual labor required to produce it, cannot, as in the case of manufactures, be materially diminished by machinery. Thirty years ago, the price of cotton was nearly three times as high as it is at present, although the same quantity of manual labor is necessary to produce it now as at the former period. A corresponding reduction in the price of labor is the necessary consequence. On the contrary, the price of grain is very nearly as high in the grain growing States, taking an average of several years, as it was thirty years ago. No reduction, therefore, has taken place in the price of the labor employed in producing it. In fact, the average price of labor in the northern States, including all pursuits, has evidently advanced during the period under consideration. It cannot be otherwise, under a system of taxation and oppression which annually draws from the southern planters one-third of their incomes, to be distributed, in bounties and disbursements, among the people of the other states of the Union. It is the natural result of that system, and God only knows at what point of depression, short of absolute ruin, it will stop, if this Government shall persevere in the course it has hitherto pursued.

A great and solemn crisis is evidently approaching, and I admonish gentlemen that it is the part of wisdom, as well as of justice, to pause in this course of legislative tyranny and oppression, before they have driven a high-minded, loyal, and patriotic people to something bordering on despair and desperation. Sir, if the ancestors of those who are now enduring, too patiently enduring, the oppressive burdens unjustly imposed upon them, could return from their graves, and witness the change which the Federal Government, in one quarter of a century, has produced in the entire aspect of the country, they would hardly recognize it as the scene of their former activity and usefulness. Where all was cheerful, and prosperous, and flourishing, and happy, they would behold nothing but decay, and gloom, and desolation, without a spot of verdure to break the dismal continuity, or even

"A rose of the wilderness left on the stalk, To tell where the garden had been."

Looking upon this sad reverse in the condition of their descendants, they would naturally inquire what moral or political pestilence had passed over the land, to blast and wither the fair inheritance they had left them? And, sir, when they should be told that a despotic power of taxation, infinitely more unjust and oppressive than that from which the country had been redeemed by their toils and sacrifices, was now assumed and exercised over us by our own brethren, they would indignantly exclaim, like the ghost of murdered Hamlet, when urging his afflicted son to avenge the tarnished honor of his house—

"If you have nature in you, bear it not."

Sir, I feel that I am called upon to say a word or two on the subject of the deep excitement which now exists in South Carolina, and to vindicate the motives and the character of the people of that State from imputations which have been unjustly cast upon them. There is no State in this Union distinguished by a more lofty and disinterested patriotism, than that which I have the honor in part to represent. I can proudly and confidently appeal to history for proof of this assertion. No State has made greater sacrifices to vindicate the common rights of the Union, and preserve its integrity. No State is more willing to make those sacrifices now, whether of blood or treasure. But, sir, it does not belong to this lofty spirit of patriotism, to submit to unjust and unconstitutional oppression, nor is South Carolina to be taunted with the charge of treason and rebellion, because she has the intelligence to understand her rights, and the spirit to maintain them. God has not planted in the breast of man a higher and a holier principle than that by which he is prompted to resist oppression. Absolute submission and passive obedience to every extreme of tyranny, are the characteristics of slaves only.

The oppression of the people of South Carolina has been carried to an extremity, which the most slavish population on earth would not endure without a struggle. Is it to be expected, then, that freemen will patiently bow down and kiss the rod of the oppressor? Freemen, did I say! Why, sir, any one who has the form and bears the name of man—nay, “a beast that wants discourse of reason,” a dog, a sheep, a reptile—the vilest reptile that crawls upon the earth, without the gift of reason to comprehend the injustice of its injuries, would bite, or bruise, or sting the hand by which they were inflicted.

Is it, then, for a sovereign State to fold her arm, and stand still in submissive apathy, when the loud clamors of the people whom Providence has committed to her charge, are ascending to heaven for justice? Hug not this delusion to your breast, I pray you.

It is not for me to say, in this place, what course South Carolina may deem it her duty to pursue in this great emergency. It is enough to say that she perfectly understands the ground which she occupies; and be assured, sir, that whatever attitude she may assume, in her highest sovereign capacity, she will firmly and fearlessly maintain it, be the consequences what they may. The responsibility will not rest upon her, but upon her oppressors.

And here, sir, I beg leave to offer a few remarks on the subject of the celebrated resolutions of Virginia and Kentucky, about which much has been recently said in Congress and out of it. It is not my object to give any opinion upon those resolutions, but to show what they really are, and the principles they distinctly avow.

I have before me a preamble to certain resolutions, recently adopted by the Legislature of Kentucky, in which it is stated that, “at a former epoch, when certain acts were passed by Congress, called the alien and sedition laws, which were believed to be unconstitutional by the General Assembly, it neither interposed nor threatened the adoption of any measures to defeat or obstruct their operation within the jurisdiction of Kentucky.” Will it be pretended that the Legislature of Kentucky did not avow the right to adopt such measures? Listen, sir, to the language of the resolution she adopted in 1799—a resolution drawn up by the hand of Thomas Jefferson: “That the several States who formed that instrument, (the federal constitution) being sovereign and independent, have the unquestionable right to judge of its infraction, and that a nullification by those sovereignties of all unauthorized acts, done under color of that instrument, is the rightful remedy.” I will make no comment on this language. It is too plain to be perverted. I will barely add, that the celebrated resolutions of Virginia maintain the same doctrine, in language equally explicit, and that Pennsylvania adopted similar resolutions at a subsequent period.

But, sir, in a case of extreme injustice and oppression, I will not stop to moot points of constitutional construction. I place the right and the obligation of a sovereign State to interpose the shield of its sovereignty between its citizens and oppression, upon much higher grounds.

There is one objection to this system of Government protection, and Government bounties, which I intended to have presented more fully than I feel warranted in doing under existing circumstances. I allude to its strong and inevitable tendency to corrupt one portion of the people, while it oppresses and enslaves the other. No state of things can be conceived more unfavorable to liberty, than that in which large multitudes of people, embracing entire classes of the community, are taught to look habitually to the Government for pecuniary aid and support. It is not in the nature of things that such a population can have the feelings of independent freemen. They look up to the Government with an idolatrous feeling, as if the sun of heaven could not shine, or its showers fall upon the earth, without the special interposition of that Government. I have said, on a former occasion, that the days of Roman liberty were numbered, when the people consented to receive bread from the public granaries. The result was, that the demagogues of the time secured the favor of the people more effectually by a liberal dispensation of the grain drawn from the subject provinces, than by the highest talents, the most exalted patriotism, and the most signal services. Now, sir, what is the difference in principle between the distribution of grain and the distribution of disguised bounties, amounting to millions, many millions of dollars annually? The latter I consider incomparably the worst, because of the very disguise which is thrown around the proceeding. But the evil does not stop with the degradation and corruption of the people. The system tends also to corrupt the Government. The enormous sum annually taken from the pockets of the southern people, is, to all intents and purposes, a fund of corruption, by which the Presidency itself may, at no distant period, be bought and sold.

Do not the people of the tariff States distinctly hold out the idea that they will not support any man for the Presidency who is opposed to the protecting system? Has it not been openly avowed on this floor as the paramount claim, the indispensable qualification of a candidate for the Presidency? And is not this an open avowal that the Presidency of the United States is to be conferred, not upon the man of the greatest talents, the purest patriotism, or the most important public services, but upon the man who will consent and stipulate to bestow millions of money, unconstitutionally and unrighteously exacted from the people of the South, as a largesse to the northern manufacturers and their associates? Sir, disguise it as you may, by calling it a question of principle and general policy, it is a mere traffic between avarice and ambition, in which it is stipulated that money, first to be obtained by extortion and plunder, shall be given in exchange for political power. It is nothing different, in principle, from the sale of the Roman empire by the Prætorian cohorts, for imperial donatives. If General Washington could rise from the grave, and were presented as a candidate for the Presidency, with an avowal of his opposition to the tariff, any man who would pledge himself to support that system, though covered with “all the multiplying villanies of nature,” would carry the election against him. Under these circumstances, I put it to gentlemen to answer me the question, what is the motive which induces the people of the tariff States to support for the Presidency a man who will pledge himself to support the tariff? The answer, sir, in plain English, is money, money, nothing but money. If this be principle, it is political bargaining reduced to principle. Such, however, is the unavoidable result of the system. The moment that Government assumes the prerogative of interfering with the great pecuniary interests of society, with a view to change the distribution of property, its action becomes essentially corrupt and corrupting.

I have now gone through the various topics I intended to discuss, and I will say, in conclusion, that in all I have uttered, there has not been mingled one feeling of personal unkindness to any human being, either in this House or out of it. I have used strong language, to be sure, but it has been uttered “more in sorrow than in anger.” I have felt it to be a solemn duty which I owed to my constituents and to this nation, to expose the unjust and oppressive operation of the tariff system, and to make one more solemn appeal to the justice of their oppressors.

Let me, then, beseech the advocates of that system, in the name of our common ancestors, whose blood was mingled together as a common offering at the shrine of our common liberty—let me beseech them, by all the endearing recollections of our common history, and by every consideration that gives value to the liberty and union of these States, to retrace their steps as speedily as possible, and relieve a high-minded and patriotic people from an unconstitutional and oppressive burden, which they cannot longer bear.

Judge Peck.—Navigation and Impost Law.

JUDGE PECK.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the committee appointed for the purpose, reported an article, to be exhibited to the Senate of the United States in behalf of themselves and of all the people of the United States, against Judge Peck, a judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, in maintenance and support of their impeachment against him. It was laid on the table and directed to be printed.

FRIDAY, APRIL 30, 1830.

NAVIGATION AND IMPOST LAW.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill respecting the navigation laws and duties on imports, which having had its first and second reading by its title, Mr. C. moved to commit it to a Committee of the Whole House, and print it.

Mr. MALLARY called for the reading of the bill; and it having been read, he said it would be impossible to act on such a measure at this session, if it ought to be acted on at all; therefore, he moved to lay the bill on the table. At the request, however, of Mr. CAMBRELENG, he withdrew the motion, to give an opportunity for explanation.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that the majority of the Committee on Commerce, under whose directions he had reported this bill, were perfectly aware that the sentiments of the majority of the House were in opposition to it at this time. The committee had directed him to say that it was not their intention to ask for its consideration during the present session—perhaps not at the next. The provisions of the bill are novel and important, and require mature deliberation. All that the committee now desire is, that the measure should go forth to the nation—that it may be generally understood, and that the great agricultural interest of the country should determine for themselves whether they will exchange the produce of their farms for the merchandise of other countries, on terms of just reciprocity. There is no novelty in the principle of the bill—it merely proposes to carry out the rule of reciprocity which this Government has acted upon ever since the war. We have been for sixteen years proposing to all nations to abolish all restrictions on navigation—we have been proclaiming, by our acts, our willingness to meet them on fair and honorable ground—and that we were ready, whenever they were, mutually to exchange our productions on reciprocal terms. This, I know, is not the doctrine of some gentlemen of this House, but it is the voice of two-thirds of the American people. They are willing to exchange the vast amount of their own products for those of all other nations who are willing to receive them on terms of fair reciprocity.

Sir, we cannot be insensible to the contest now going on in England—a contest between the democracy and aristocracy of that country, similar to that which we now see in this country. [Here Mr. DONNING rose.] Sir, I believe I am entitled to the floor, and understand whether I am out of order or not. The whole question is open. I was noticing the contest now going on in England, where the democracy who were crying for cheap bread, were oppressed as the democracy of this country is by the aristocracy. Sir, what have I seen in this House? How were the tariffs of 1824 and 1828 passed? Have we not all seen duties voted by majorities of four and five votes? Were they not carried by the votes of those who were interested, directly or indirectly, in the stock of cotton and woollen companies—of members whose patriotism lies in the pocket?—who imagined that their bankruptcy or prosperity depended on the vote they might give? Nay, sir, have I not seen the very chair you now occupy filled by a distinguished gentleman, and did I not see him, in 1824, give, on more than one occasion, his casting vote on questions which he had deeply at heart? And did not the ultimate fate of the tariff of 1824 depend on the casting votes of the Speaker given on some of the items of the bill? Yes, sir, I say there is in this country an aristocracy of manufacturing capitalists, who would, if they could, grind the democracy of this nation to ashes, as the nobility of Great Britain would the poor laborer who cries for bread. Sir, the committee entertain no delusive hope that this bill will affect the policy of Great Britain—at least, for some years to come. No! her policy in relation to grain is fixed and settled. It is regulated and controlled, as ours has hitherto been here, by those who are deeply interested in perpetuating monopoly. The great land proprietors of the House of Lords—the hereditary nobility—control the policy of Great Britain by their votes. It is not to be expected that a majority of that description will consent, at least for the present, to receive our grain in exchange for British productions. Neither is it probable that France will, for some time to come, reciprocate commerce with the United States on the equal terms proposed by the bill. But there are other nations with whom a beginning may be made. Portugal is one. We had once a valuable trade with that country—it has been entirely sacrificed by the unwise restrictions of both countries. There are in our commerce with that nation no conflicting interests—I have no doubt that a treaty stipulating commercial reciprocity might be formed with that nation to-morrow, by which we should very soon enjoy a large and valuable trade with that country in the mutual exchange of our productions. There are countries also in the North of Europe, with whom reciprocal arrangements might be made. But, sir, I have gone further into this question than I had intended to do now.

The committee merely propose the measure for the consideration of the House and of the nation—the laboring, the mechanic, and agricultural interests of the country; they have no expectation of changing the opinions of our masters, whose pecuniary interests are involved. We ask nothing, sir, from the majority of this House, but what we have a right to ask. The minority has its rights as well as the majority. They have a right to expect parliamentary courtesy from the majority—an opportunity to be heard, to have their measures fully and fairly debated—an open and honorable contest. This new course of arresting measures at their second reading, of stopping inquiry and stifling debate, is not only extraordinary, but alarming. That, sir, is the object of the gentleman from Vermont. The House has already treated one important measure—the bill proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. McDUFFIE] in that way. [Here the Chair called the gentleman to order for reflecting on the conduct of the House.] Mr. C. replied, that it was not his design to reflect upon the House for the course of its proceedings, but to show the alarming consequences that might result from such a course, when a minority, a powerful minority, too, were denied an opportunity, even to an important measure discussed, when the rights of the minority were openly trampled upon. Whenever such should become the practice of a majority of the House, he should consider it one of the most alarming symptoms of approaching dissolution. We do not, I repeat it, desire to go into this debate during this session. Let the measure go forth to the nation—let us debate it at the next session, and then let gentlemen do as they please with it.

Mr. MALLARY observed, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] seemed to be greatly alarmed at the course he was taking. But, sir, what is the real character of the bill he has proposed? It is a measure that is intended to give the power to the President to control the great interests of this country. Let this remain with the representatives of the people. Let Congress keep this power to itself. Hold it fast. No such power should be put in the hands of any one man living. The gentleman tells us that the whole manufacturing interest is in the hands of an aristocracy, who oppress and grind to dust the democracy of the nation. This shows clearly and plainly that he knows nothing about either the aristocracy or democracy of the country. I say that the great agricultural interest north of Mason and Dixon's line, and a solid proportion south of it, are in favor of the protecting policy—the tariff. If the gentleman wants to find friends and advocates to that policy, let him go into every hamlet and house in Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, New England, and he will find a vast majority in its favor. Talk of the aristocracy of the country! It is the real democracy of the United States, who are the friends and advocates of the protecting system. Not British agents—Liverpool merchants. Talk of aristocracy! The farmers, the agriculturists, are the men who support the tariff. They are the men. Why? They well know that the manufacturer gives a market for their productions, which no foreign nation allows. They consider the manufacturers as their agents, at home, in their own country. The farming interest knows this. If our farmers did not know that their interests, their salvation, did not almost depend on the manufacturing system, they would be willing to give it up. Sir, the gentleman openly avows that his object in bringing this bill forward is not for discussion or action this session, and perhaps not the next. What, then, in the name of heaven, is his intended object? Sir, I think I know. Indeed, for some time, I have been aware that it has been in contemplation. The object manifestly is, to have the measure hang over our protecting policy in terrorem, like a portentous cloud. It is for the purpose of scattering doubts, and fears, and apprehensions among our manufacturing interests, and to invite foreign nations to press down upon us with all their power, and overwhelm our system of national independence. The gentleman seems to want that foreign nations should believe that this Government is trembling and shivering in its course—wishes to see them interfering in the domestic regulations of this country. Sir, I cannot, will not, consent to see such a measure, brought forward under such auspices, held up to terrify and alarm our own country, and give hopes and expectations to another. The gentleman says he does not expect that the bill will make the smallest impression on England. Good nation! What! Make no impression on England? I supposed the gentleman considered England a perfect model for our imitation; that free trade was her motto, and that she really meant what she had published to the world! that she was ready to throw her doors wide open to the commerce of all nations. What! England opposed to free trade? Monstrous! And even the gentleman from New York admits it! Surprising! He tells us that the measure is intended to help the laboring classes of England—the democrats of England. This is a new idea. The democrats of England! He says they are crying for bread, and she wants to feed them. His feelings are all engaged for the democrats of England. Sir, I am for sustaining the democrats of the United States. So people will differ. On whom do these democrats of England depend? Why, I suppose of course, on the democratic manufacturers of that country. All democrats, then! Our manufacturers, in this country, are represented as aristocrats, nabobs, monopolists—in England, it seems, they are all democrats. Sir, these English democrats have but little affection for their brother democrats this side of the water. They are hostile to our prosperity. They tremble at the sight of a rising manufactory in the United States. They, like the gentleman from New York, would like to see the domestic industry of this country palsied, prostrated. The gentleman says the bill will have no operation on France. Why, sir, we all well know that. France minds her own business. She has adopted the protecting policy; and all the arts and efforts of England cannot divert her from her own independent course. France, sir, minds her own concerns. She is not eternally dabbling in the affairs of other nations. She understands her own true interests, and pursues them without troubling her neighbors. But up the Baltic we can have free trade. Pennsylvania can send corn to Dantzic! That is flattering! What a noble thought! But we can have the trade of Portugal. That the gentleman seems to suppose would be every thing to us. It would be a grand affair! So, for these fancied benefits we are to invest the President with the most extraordinary powers. The great interests of this country to be regulated by the caprice or policy of any nation in the world, and the President compelled to execute it. The market of Portugal! what does the gentleman really mean? If there is any hidden object, let the gentleman lift up the veil—let him draw back the curtain—tell us, at once, his object. I would not trust the power he proposes, to any man. If the measure should pass, I have the fullest confidence that the present Chief Magistrate would exercise his power and discretion as fairly and soundly as any man living. The interests of his country would never be sacrificed for the benefit of any other. This is a subject that belongs to Congress; to the representatives of the people. Here let it be retained. Never give it up. I hope the day will never arrive, when we will place such power in the hands of any Executive.

But [said Mr. M.] the gentleman declares that the bill proposes reciprocity—only reciprocity. Let England put her duties at thirty per cent. and we will do the same. The scheme looks well. How will it work? The disparity will be as great as now exists. Thirty per cent. on the flour of Ohio, Pennsylvania. Now see, sir. Thirty per cent.—reciprocal on the face. What will be the expense of sending a barrel of flour from Louisville, in Kentucky, by New Orleans, to Liverpool? Why, sir, it would cost more to send a barrel of flour, worth five dollars in the New York market, to Liverpool, than it would cost to bring one thousand—five thousand dollars' worth of foreign manufactures into this country. Equalize duties in this way, and a vast proportion of the agricultural interests of this country is ruined at a single blow. How much does it cost England to send her broadcloths and gimlets to New York? How much to send our heavy productions to England? Every man of common sense well knows. The difference may be five hundred per cent. against us. Thirty per cent. on lace—thirty per cent. on flour! Reciprocity with a vengeance! The farming interest of the United States will not be deluded by such a show of reciprocity.

The gentleman tells us about a tremendous explosion, if the friends of the tariff policy persist. This means, in plain English, rebellion. Are we to be driven from our path of duty—from the true interests of the country—by threats of a tremendous explosion? Is a minority on the floor of this House to tell a majority, you shall submit to our will, or the most dreadful consequences will follow? For one, I say, plump and plain, I will not be driven from my course by such language. What will be the condition of this country, when a minority overawes a majority by threats and menaces? We have recently heard of the tyranny of a majority—a strange kind of tyranny, to be sure. But we are called on to submit to the tyranny of a minority. When a minority can, on any question, by threat and menace, overawe the majority, this country must be reduced to the most extraordinary condition. It is worse than no Government at all. We come here as the representatives of the people of all parts of the Union, for the purpose of mingling our common counsels, and deciding on the course best calculated to promote the great interests of the nation—our common country. The sound discretion of every member ought to be exercised. We must finally decide. As the representatives of the people of this Union, we are called upon to act. How are we to decide on any great question, whether it relates to the established policy of the country, or to any new measure presented for deliberation and action? Is a majority to shrink back, give way, surrender, when a minority demands a right to rule? Submit to the tyranny of a minority!—a strange despot under a Government, when its fundamental rule is that a majority should govern. What would such a Government be worth? A minority rule! This is the essence of aristocracy. In plain truth, sir, if Representatives cannot come here, and exercise their own independent opinions, without being awed and menaced into submission by those who may happen to differ, the Government is not worth preserving. Its republican character is gone—it is not worth a fig. I always respect the minority. I am in it often. We are all, often, in a minority. When we are, shall we cry out tyranny, oppression, abuse the Government, curse it, and let it go? If so, we can tear it in pieces in an hour, any day. If such is the wish of any portion of this country, they may be indulged for all me. What is a Government, a republican Government worth, where a majority is ruled by a minority? I should like to be informed. If this is not aristocracy, I do not understand the term. The most perfect tyranny is when the fewest rule—I may be mistaken. I thought I had some republican principles—I may have been mistaken. Whatever may be my errors of opinion, I feel anxious to sustain the interests of my own country—I want to see Liverpool the other side of the Atlantic. Mr. M. concluded by again moving to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. WAYNE, of Georgia, a member of the Committee on Commerce, said the gentleman ought to give an opportunity for reply to his misapprehensions.

Mr. MALLARY said, he had done no more than reply to the gentleman from New York, but he again withdrew his motion to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. BATES, of Massachusetts, hoped the gentleman from Georgia, when he had finished the remarks which he desired to make on the subject, would allow the friends of the protecting system an opportunity of discussing the subject, and defending their views.

Mr. WAYNE. That is what the friends of the bill desire. Let it take its ordinary course, and it can then be fully discussed. He hoped, therefore, the opposition to it in this stage would be withdrawn, and the bill be committed. He yielded the floor to

Mr. GORHAM, of Massachusetts, who was decidedly opposed to the bill, but he wished it not to be laid on the table, as that would preclude discussion; and he thought an opportunity should be afforded for exposing the impolicy of the measure.

Mr. WAYNE then rose to proceed with his remarks on the bill; but

The SPEAKER interrupted him, by stating that the Clerk had informed him that the bill had received its second reading by its title, which fact the Chair had overlooked; and the question being now simply on the commitment, it precluded a discussion of the merits of the bill.

Mr. WAYNE bowed to the decision of the Chair; and, after some under-conversation between other members,

Mr. GORHAM, for the purpose of opening the bill to discussion, moved its indefinite postponement.

Mr. CAMBRELENG regretted that he had not, on this occasion, the powerful aid of the gentleman from Massachusetts. He remembered, nine years ago, when that gentleman was a captain among the advocates of free trade. The House was electrified by that gentleman for near three hours; and without intending any disparagement to a distinguished gentleman who now occupies another body, he must say, that he heard on that day what he thought then, and still thought, the most able, eloquent, and convincing argument he ever listened to, in favor of the broad principles of free trade. He hoped that the gentleman from Massachusetts would vary his motion so as to postpone the question till the first Monday in January next, when he was not without hope that the gentleman from Massachusetts might change his opinions, again become an advocate of free trade—at all events, give the friends of this measure a fair opportunity to defend its merits.

Mr. WAYNE again rose, but said he had no desire to go into the merits of the bill at this time, if it should take such a direction as would bring it up regularly for discussion hereafter.

Mr. GORHAM said, the gentleman from New York must think him very sincere, if, after the extravagant but altogether unmerited compliments of the gentleman, he still persisted in his opposition to this bill, as a measure of the most extraordinary character ever proposed in this House. Sir, [said Mr. G.] this bill contains provisions which in their operation will derange our whole revenue system, and change all our commercial relations at home and abroad, introducing at the same time an endless series of frauds and perjuries. It transfers, too, to the President almost the whole control over the commerce and revenue of the country. If practicable, which I doubt, it will introduce a principle into commercial policy, mischievous in the highest degree. This discussion [said Mr. G.] had arisen so suddenly, and the hour was so nearly expired when the debate must terminate for to-day, that he should be able hardly more than to mention a few of the most striking objections to the principles and provisions of the bill. But, [said Mr. G.] before I do this, I think it proper to say a word or two touching the proceedings of the Committee on Commerce upon this bill. At our last meeting upon public matters, three or four weeks ago, and not more than fifteen or twenty minutes before we were to separate to take our seats in the House, the honorable chairman of our committee [Mr. CAMBRELENG] handed me the draught of this bill, (though I think with a different title,) asking if I agreed that such a bill should be reported. After looking through it, I replied, that it was a sort of consolidated repeal of the tariff laws, that it was introducing principles altogether new into our revenue system, and our commercial relations at home and abroad, &c. &c.; and it would be in vain to report such a bill to the House, which had rejected much less objectionable propositions. The rest of the committee having looked into the bill, the chairman called for our opinions, and, by a vote of four to three, the committee being full, it was ordered to be reported to the House. I had reason to be surprised that a measure which was to work a complete revolution in our commerce and revenue, should be thus hastily adopted. But, sir, I will hasten to state a few of the many objections to this extraordinary scheme. In the first place, it reduces at once all duties to thirty per cent. ad valorem, and to the extent of that reduction is a repeal of the tariff laws, not, indeed, as it may suit the interest and convenience of our own Government, or our own citizens, but when the will or interest of any foreign nation may require it. The mere reduction of duties I do not regard as the worst aspects of this part of the bill. Sir, it is, that foreign nations are to judge for us, and not we for ourselves; that all specific duties are, with regard to some nations, to be charged in ad valorem duties and reduced, while, with regard to others, they are to remain specific, and at their old rate; and that the duties on articles of the same kind, from different countries, are not only of different rates, but differently estimated. And then, too, what numberless frauds will be practised in fixing this thirty per cent. ad valorem, by appraisements without end, not only in our own ports, but in those of the nations which may come into this strange and novel scheme of reciprocity?

Time does not permit me now to say any thing upon the extraordinary principle of transferring to the Executive Department, as this bill would substantially do, almost the whole control over our foreign and domestic commercial relations. Nor can I now enumerate half the mischiefs of a different character, which would result from the adoption of this most pernicious project. A single instance will serve to illustrate its effects in a hundred other cases; and I will ask the attention of the House to only one branch of commerce—the sugar trade. The sugar of Louisiana is now protected by a duty of three cents per pound upon the imported article, which is more than a duty of fifty per cent. ad valorem. The prosperity of that State depends, in a great measure, upon sugar planting. Now, we bring sugar from Cuba and other of the West India islands, from South America, particularly from Brazil, and from the East Indies, places wholly independent of each other.* Should this bill pass into a law, some one of these countries, Brazil, probably, (and I believe Brazil alone,) would accept our offer of reciprocating duties; and what would be the consequence? The sugar of Brazil, which costs but four or five cents per pound, would come here charged only with a duty of thirty per cent. ad valorem, equal to a duty varying from a cent to a cent and a half, less than half the present duty. There can be no doubt, then, that in a very short time the importer of that article would drive the Louisiana planter from his own market. The ruinous effects to that State are obvious; her prosperity is destroyed at a blow. Nor is this all: Brazil will probably agree to this scheme, but Cuba and Porto Rico, being dependencies of Spain, could not. The places in the East Indies from which we bring sugar, from the peculiarity of their political condition, could not, or would not, adopt it. And thus the high duty of three cents on sugar from those places is virtually a prohibition of trading with them; and our trade at present with Cuba, as every one knows, and particularly in sugar, is one of the most flourishing and important branches of our commerce. Frauds, too, of a different character from those I have mentioned, would be resorted to. England and France would not, indeed, cannot, reciprocate this rule. But they would be very desirous that we should adopt it with other nations; because they could, through those nations, derive every advantage from it, without yielding us any equivalent in return. There is little doubt that Hamburg, Bremen, and all the Hanseatic towns, Sweden and Denmark, and, perhaps, Holland—some, if not all of these, would agree with us. The course of things would then be, that British and French goods would be shipped to those places; and either there, or at home, so marked and packed, that they might be imported into the United States as Dutch, Swedish, or Danish goods, at the reduced duty. And thus France and England, holding firmly to their restrictive system towards us, would enjoy, through other nations, all the advantages of a total relaxation of our system towards them.

But, sir, [said Mr. G.] I must close. Many other evils might be pointed out, and will be readily perceived by any one at all acquainted with commerce; and, indeed, there must be many more than perhaps the most experienced merchant can foresee. The measure, if adopted, is a radical change in our revenue system, and all our commercial relations, and cannot but be followed by the most pernicious consequences. The bill is strangely entitled a "bill to amend the navigation laws of the United States," yet makes no reference to any one of those laws, and contains not one word about either ships, vessels, or navigation. It should be entitled "a bill to encourage frauds and perjuries, disturb the revenue, and embarrass and restrict the commerce of the United States." Mr. G. concluded by saying that he had been surprised into this debate, and he threw out these few remarks, the suggestions of the moment, to show the impolicy and ruinous tendency of the measure.

Mr. WAYNE said he had two things to complain of, one of them in common with the gentleman from Massachusetts. First, he had been surprised into the debate, and then he had been surprised out of it. He would now proceed to submit a few considerations on the bill.

[Here the hour expired, and the debate was arrested for the day.]

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN,

Ordered, That the article of impeachment against James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

LAND CLAIMS IN FLORIDA.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill entitled "An act for the final settlement of land claims in Florida;" and the question recurred on the passage of the said bill; when

A motion was made by Mr. WICKLIFFE, that the said bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands, with instructions to amend the same, so as to exclude from the provisions of the bill all such claims as have been confirmed by the register and receiver, upon the evidence of the confirmation of the governors of Florida, after the 24th of January, 1818; and, after a long debate, in which Messrs. WHITE and WILDE zealously opposed the motion, and Mr. WICKLIFFE supported it, the motion was negatived by a large majority; and then the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

[The following are the remarks of Mr. WHITE:]

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, said, he was too sensible of the value of the time of the House, at this late period of the session, to ask its attention longer than was absolutely necessary to reply to some of the most prominent objections that had, in the various stages of its progress, been offered against the passage of the bill now under consideration. I did hope [said Mr. W.] that, after the discussion in Committee of the Whole, and the decisive indication given of the sense of the House at that time, this bill would not have been embarrassed by a motion to recommit, which, if successful, puts an end to all prospect of its becoming a law at this session of Congress.

If I can be able to command the attention of the House for a short time, I trust I shall satisfy them that this bill proposes no new principle in legislation; and that the apprehension of any bad consequences resulting from the first section, in its present shape, is entirely fallacious. The object of Congress in organizing special tribunals for the adjudication of these claims, is to free ourselves from the trouble or necessity of going into an examination of the voluminous documents and evidence exhibited by the claimants, and the various intricate questions of Spanish usage and law that must arise in the decision of these questions. Such a body as this, organized to consult and legislate upon the various and complicated affairs of a great empire, has neither the time nor the means of going into a minute or satisfactory investigation of such questions. It has higher duties to perform; and in consequence of the utter impracticability, as well as impolicy, of an attempt to decide upon every small land claim, derived from a foreign Government, in the territories acquired by treaty, it has been the established practice to organize a board of commissioners, to sit in the country where the grants were made, where the archives are deposited, and where the land lies. These officers hold their commissions, and receive their compensation, from the Government, one of the parties directly interested in the decision of every claim presented. If there is any leaning on either side, it is always on that from which the power is derived. With the most honest intentions, and a constant effort to act without prejudice, there is a constant attraction between all federal officers and the Government and its interests. Federal judges pronounce, with great indifference, State laws to be unconstitutional, and State judges pronounce the acts of Congress to be unconstitutional; when neither, unless in an extraordinary case, pronounced the laws of the Government, from which they hold their commissions, unconstitutional or void. To make an application of this principle, I ask any gentleman to read this report, and, instead of striking from this bill one-half of the cases confirmed, I do not hesitate to say that he would be more inclined to say that the number of confirmations ought to be doubled. I do not say that injustice has been done; but I will say, that, if any has been, it is to the claimants. I say that the rigor with which these claims have been examined, will operate more unjustly to them than the United States. I believe that this is the first instance in the history of our legislation since the Louisiana treaty in 1803, in which an attempt has ever been made to reverse the decisions of our commissioners, and strike out half of the claims confirmed by them. Numerous instances can be found at every session of Congress, for twenty years, in which the rigor of the commissioners has been mitigated by the clemency of Congress, in giving to every equitable claim the most liberal and favorable interpretation.

Land Claims in Florida.

If this motion succeeds, we shall reverse the order of things, and introduce a new system, as impolitic and unwise in the Government, as it will be oppressive upon a people transferred to us, with a guaranty, on our part, to do what Spain would have done. I have had occasion to look into the history of all that has been done by this Government on this subject, and I do not hesitate to declare that the principle in this bill has been sanctioned at every successive session of Congress for twenty years. What is the object of this motion? To recommit the bill, with instructions to strike from it every claim which the Governor of East Florida had confirmed subsequently to the 24th of January, 1818, the time limited in the treaty, prior to which all grants should have emanated, to be recognised and confirmed by this Government.

By the eighth article of our treaty with Spain, the United States agreed to confirm and ratify all grants ("todas las concesiones") and concessions made by the Spanish authorities prior to the 24th January, 1818, to the same extent that they would have been valid, if the territories had remained under the dominion of His Catholic Majesty. This article contemplated the recognition of complete grants, and the completion of imperfect ones, as Spain would have completed them. The quo modo of doing this was left to the justice of this Government, under a full conviction that the United States would be just, if not liberal, to their newly acquired citizens. The act of 1828 conferred the power of doing this upon the register and receiver, who were to act as ex officio commissioners to carry this article into effect. These officers sat in the province in which the land lies, having before them the archives of the Spanish Government. They have presented this report, from which it appears that they have confirmed seventy-one small claims, and rejected one hundred and thirty-five. The proposition now is, to recommit this bill, to strike from it thirty cases. Sir, if this motion succeeds, these people will have occasion to regret the day that they were ever transferred to the United States. The act which, according to our ideas, made them free, will, according to their conceptions, make them beggars. I fear some of them will not love liberty so much, as to be entirely contented with your disfranchisement of their property. I say their property, because, if Spain had retained the territories, she would have completed every imperfect title in East Florida, whenever a petition had been presented to the Governor.

It was a part of the policy of France, England, and Spain, to grant lands gratuitously to all the inhabitants who would receive them. The most informal and incomplete of these titles were the most honest, and best entitled to our confirmation, when the policy of that Government is considered. The lowest order of these titles, a "permit of settlement," was declared by the commissioners of West Florida the most honest, as well as the most certain title. To complete it, and obtain a title in the name of the King, called sometimes "title in form," or

"título de propiedad," or "royal title," it was only necessary to summon witnesses to appear before the Governor, and prove a settlement upon the land, and a continuance a certain length of time. This proof entitled the occupant to a grant in the name of the King. It was a favor to the crown, and not to the subject, to settle and strengthen their distant provinces and colonies. In the interpretation of this treaty, we should remember their policy, and not ours, which holds up the land at a price so high, that it is difficult for a poor man to purchase even the smallest legal division of the surveys. Looking to this policy, can any man doubt what Spain would have done? I cannot doubt but that she would have confirmed every one of those one hundred and thirty-five cases rejected. If any man was not satisfied with his land, he had only to petition the Governor, and a transfer of the location was granted, as a matter of course.

The motion now made to recommit this bill with instructions, is placed by the honorable mover on two grounds: the one of which is founded upon the idea that there are grants made subsequent to the time at which Spain was interdicted from making them by the treaty. If gentlemen will take the trouble to look into this report, they will find that every claim dated after that period has been rejected. The commissioners have not, in any instance, confirmed a single claim posterior to the 24th of January, 1818. They have, in about thirty cases, considered the royal title given by the Governor subsequent to that day, and before the delivery of the province to the United States, as evidence of the performance of the condition. I beg the attention of the House to the fact, that these confirmations are made upon concessions, the largest part of which eventuated from the legitimate authorities of Spain twenty years before the treaty was ever thought of. A concession is a grant, upon condition of settlement. One of the concessions is given as early as the year 1794.

In 1819, the concessionary or claimant came before the Governor, who was a judicial as well as executive officer, and offered his testimony. The witnesses were examined; the proof recorded, and deposited among the public archives on the protocol called "diligencias." The royal title, as it is called, begins with a recitation, "Por quanto," &c.; or "whereas." It recites that a concession issued on such a day upon condition, and that certain witnesses were called and sworn, who proved the performance. These archives are before the commissioners. The testimony is recorded, the witnesses known to the commissioners, or, if dead, or removed to Cuba, their characters are known from their neighbors. The commissioners say we receive this evidence of the performance of the condition. It would be a nugatory and useless act to call the witnesses over again, when their testimony is recorded, and recited in the royal title given by the Governor. Instead of looking to every act of a Spanish tribunal as a scheme to defraud the United States, I would rather put this more liberal and charitable construction upon it, and consider the act as an evidence of what Spain would have done if the territories had remained under the dominion of His Catholic Majesty. I do not believe that the Governors of East or West Florida were informed of the provisions of the treaty until it was published here after its final ratification in 1821. Until that period, they were acting under a sense of their responsibility to their royal master, and their acts ought to be received in the same manner as if there had been no limitation in the treaty. So long as the Governor had a right to exercise jurisdiction, he had the unquestionable power to examine witnesses, record testimony, either with a view to its perpetuity, or to be used in foreign courts. This would seem to be a power so naturally inherent in every tribunal, that it hardly needs a reference for its support to that well known and universally acknowledged principle, in all civilized nations, to receive with respect the acts of all tribunals of other nations, and to presume that they acted within the sphere of their jurisdiction and duty. It is nothing more than a principle of comity and courtesy—one which our courts of admiralty are in the practice of acting upon, and which has been repeatedly recognised by the Supreme Court of the United States. The King of Spain, and his officers, have as much right to disregard the acts of our tribunals, as we have those of Spain, on principles of national law; and if these claims are denied on such grounds as are now urged, they will have more reason to question the justice of our decisions, than we have ever yet had to condemn theirs. I am neither the defender nor the apologist of the Spanish authorities. The special court appointed by this Government, having the archives before them, have received this evidence, and confirmed these claims, not on the authority to grant subsequent to the limitation in the treaty, but upon a concession made ten or twenty years before. The performance of the condition only has been proved in due form after the time. The honorable gentleman should recollect that the authorities of Spain, were not interdicted by the treaty from the exercise of any jurisdiction, or the execution of any of their functions, until the delivery of the country to the United States. The provision is, that all grants made posterior to that date shall be void. In this report, all grants of that description are declared void. The class proposed to be stricken out were made prior, but witnesses were sworn, and proved a settlement according to the terms of the concession subsequently. The commissioners of West Florida, in every case of this kind, confirmed the claim. In the abstracts of the confirmations of that board, in the Executive Documents of 1824-5, which I now hold in my hand, it will be seen that where concessions and royal titles were both made, the one prior and the other subsequent to the 24th of January, 1818; we confirmed the title upon the concession. This was done by the commissioners of East Florida, and by the register and receiver in their report of 1828—all of which have been approved and confirmed by acts of Congress. The principle here is precisely the same, and it is for this House to say whether they were bound to summon witnesses to prove that which had been already proved before a Spanish tribunal, the evidence of which was before them. It would have been an act of supererogation, a useless consumption of time.

The next ground of objection is, that we shall establish a dangerous precedent for the courts, which will be injurious to the public interests; and this is seriously urged upon Congress as a reason why this bill should be recommended. Sir, it is the first time I ever knew that a legislative act was to be received as a precedent for the admissibility of evidence in courts of justice. Congress may declare that every man may make affidavit to the genuineness of his own grant. Will that justify a court in allowing a man to be a witness in his own case? The distinction between a legislative body and a judicial tribunal, the one governed by considerations of policy, and the other by fixed laws, seems not to have occurred to the gentleman. Who ever heard of the decisions of our committees on the evidence offered to them being quoted before judges as a precedent for their decisions? What Congress, in its legislative discretion, chooses to do, has never yet been, and never will be, a precedent for the courts. The courts might as well attempt to pass an appropriation act, as to say they will confirm claims because Congress confirmed them. I need not pursue this part of the subject further, because the question can never be made in the courts. All the cases which are or can be presented to them are now printed by order of this House, and now upon my table, to which access can be had by every member. There is not among that number a single case in which a royal title is given after the 24th of January, 1818; and if the courts were to look to legislative acts as precedents for them, the case will never occur in which such a reference can be made. All the apprehensions from this quarter may be quieted by the examination of the cases referred to the courts for decision. The limitation in the treaty, it is well known, was introduced expressly with a view to exclude the grants to the Duke of Alagon, De Vargas, and Count Punon Rostro, and no other. It was so declared at the time of making the treaty, by those who negotiated it. The idea of excluding any other was indignantly repelled by the Spanish minister, and never insisted on by our Government. The President of the United States (Mr. Monroe) informed Congress, in an executive message, that such was the object of that provision. Although such was the view of those who negotiated the treaty, that clause has been so rigidly enforced, as to exclude from confirmation every claim derived from the Spanish Government when they possessed the sovereignty of the provinces, between the 24th of January, 1818, and July, 1821, when the provinces were delivered. All these claims were intended to be, and ought to be, confirmed; but, by the use of general words, to get rid of the large ones, these, too, have been rejected. Not content with this advantage, thus secured against a population that Spain was about to transfer, and about whose rights the King and his ministers were somewhat indifferent, rendered more so from a conviction that the inhabitants of the ceded territories desired the change, we are now about to strike out one-half of what has found favor under the rigid construction of the commissioners, because a Spanish governor had the witnesses sworn and the testimony recorded. I cannot persuade myself that this House is prepared to sanction a principle so unjust and odious.

The whole amount of land in these thirty small claims does not exceed fourteen thousand acres, which is not worth the expenses of this House during the time of this debate. If these claims are stricken out, what is proposed to be done? Is a new board to be organized, after a delay of nine years in the adjustment of these titles? If a new board is to be created, their expenses will be greater than the value of the land. The public surveys will be stopped, the private property cannot be separated from the public, the population of the territory will be retarded, and the most mischievous consequences result from the delay.

Those who are here from the new States well know the difficulties and embarrassments arising from unsettled titles to the country itself; and those who have never seen it, can form but a very imperfect conception of the misery of pursuing, for ten years, an uncertain title in the tribunals of a country, the language and forms of which the petitioner cannot comprehend. The cry of fraud at this period of the session, the denunciation of all that is of Spanish origin, is enough to overturn the most beneficial measures; but I trust that this House, from the confidence reposed in its own tribunal, from the long delay and injustice already done to these claimants, and from a regard for the territory itself, will not recommit this bill, and produce confusion in the country, and certain ruin among its inhabitants.

SATURDAY, MAY 1.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to amend the navigation laws of the United States, reported by Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee on Commerce, yesterday.

The question recurred on the motion made by Mr. GORHAM, that the further consideration of the said bill be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WAYNE, of Georgia, rose, and addressed the House until the expiration of the hour, in support of the policy proposed by the bill. He had not concluded when the hour expired.

JUDGE PECK.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to postpone the orders of the day, for the purpose of taking up and acting on the article of impeachment.

Mr. WHITTLESEY said, (this day being set apart by themselves for considering private bills,) he, as the member charged with attending to this class of business, would say, that it was perhaps inexpedient to press the consideration of many more of the numerous private bills yet on the docket, because, if they were passed, and sent to the Senate, and not acted on there, they would be in a worse situation than if they remained as they are, for the House to take them up at the next session. He should not, therefore, oppose the motion for postponement.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. STERIGERE in the chair, and took up the article of impeachment reported by the select committee against Judge Peck.

Some verbal amendments being made to the article, on motion of Mr. BUCHANAN,

The committee rose, and reported the article to the House; and by the House it was agreed to without objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN then moved that the House proceed now to the appointment of five managers, to conduct the impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WILLIAMS inquired how many managers were appointed in the case of Judge Chase.

Mr. BUCHANAN replied that seven managers were appointed on that occasion, but it was thought that five were as many as were necessary for the present case.

Mr. B.'s motion being agreed to,

The House proceeded to the appointment of five managers, by ballot, when the following gentlemen received a majority of votes, and were appointed, viz.

JAMES BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania.

HENRY R. STORRS, of New York.

GEORGE McDUFFIE, of South Carolina.

AMBROSE SPENCER, of New York.

CHARLES WICKLIFFE, of Kentucky.

The first four were appointed on the first ballot. Four ballots took place before a fifth manager was chosen, in all of which till the last the votes were pretty much divided between Mr. WICKLIFFE and Mr. DODDRIDGE, besides whom a large number of members received more or less votes.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, it was

Resolved, That the article agreed to by this House, to be exhibited, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, against James H. Peck, in maintenance of their impeachment against him for high misdemeanors in office, be carried to the Senate by the managers appointed to conduct said impeachment.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, it was

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate, to inform them that this House have appointed managers to conduct the impeachment against James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, and have directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the article agreed upon by this House, to be exhibited in maintenance of their impeachment against the said James H. Peck, and that the Clerk of this House do go with said message.

MONDAY, MAY 3, 1830.

CULTURE OF SILK.

Mr. A. SPENCER, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the Manual on the growth and manufacture of Silk in other countries, transmitted to this House by the Secretary of the Treasury on the fifth day of February, 1828, be printed for the use of this House.

Mr. POLK moved to lay the resolution on the table, but the motion was negatived—nays 80.

Mr. McDUFFIE opposed the resolution, having understood that the work proposed to be reprinted possessed no value. The instructions were too complex for unlettered people, and experience proved that it was of no use to them. Persons in his part of the country, who made many pounds of silk every year, could derive no benefit from this book.

Mr. CAMBRELENG concurred in the opinion that the book was not worth printing. A person engaged in preparing a work on the same subject, and who understood it well, informed him that the manual was worthless. Let the committee take all the works on this subject, and compile one containing the best of each. Several works have been since issued, that are superior to the one in question.

Mr. BATES, of Massachusetts, said, here was experience against experience. It was alleged by gentlemen that practical, intelligent persons, professing to be able to give an account of the subject themselves, had denounced the work in question as worthless. Now, he had in his district some men of some little intelligence, who were engaged in the silk culture, who said the work was a very valuable acquisition. He had received letter on letter for a copy of the work, but not one was to be had. The book was valuable, because it gave an account of the best modes of cultivating silk in countries where it had been cultivated for centuries. As he had no doubt of the value of the work, and as it was not voluminous, he hoped the House would have it disseminated, without regarding the pittance it would cost.

Mr. WAYNE would not undertake to pronounce on the merits of the work, but he knew that many of the people whom he represented were very desirous to obtain it. In the early settlement of Georgia, the object of many was the growth of silk, and it was commenced and tried for some time. Why was it discontinued? From one of two causes: Either by being superseded in value by other pursuits, or being discouraged by the want of information. Many, however, continued the culture, and some have prosecuted it for forty years, who, residing on lands too arid for other cultivation, have gone on in the original pursuit; the culture has not been extended because of the want of suitable information to instruct them in it. He wished, therefore, that the information contained in the work in question should go forth for the benefit of those who needed it. He referred to societies formed or forming in Georgia, for the cultivation of silk, to whom the information would be particularly useful and acceptable.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, rose to make some remarks, but the expiration of the hour arrested the debate.

TENNESSEE LANDS.

Mr. MALLARY moved to postpone the consideration of the bill relative to the Tennessee lands until Thursday next.

Mr. CROCKETT expressed a hope that the bill would not be postponed. He would rather the bill were taken up and rejected, than that it should be thus sported with, as this would be the third time it had been postponed. He stated a number of facts and urged several reasons against its further postponement.

The motion to postpone was negatived: yeas, 62—nays, 81.

The bill was then taken up. An amendment offered by Mr. BARRINGER was accepted by Mr. CROCKETT; which was concurred in.

The question being then on the engrossment of the bill, Mr. GRENNELL spoke at considerable length in opposition to the bill.

Mr. CROCKETT earnestly defended the bill, and was replied to by Mr. VINTON.

Mr. CHILTON demanded the previous question; which being seconded,

Mr. VINTON moved to lay the bill on the table, and asked for the yeas and nays on the question; which were ordered.

The Tariff.

[MAY 3, 1830.]

The question was then taken on laying the bill on the table, and decided in the negative: yeas, 75—nays, 86.

The House then ordered the main question to be now put.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked for the yeas and nays on the engrossment of the bill; which were ordered.

The question was then taken on the engrossment of the bill, and decided in the negative: yeas, 69—nays, 90.

The bill was therefore rejected.

TARIFF REGULATION.

The House then proceeded to consider the bill in alteration of the various acts imposing duties on imports.

Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, said, that, as any proceeding here, connected with the tariff, must be highly interesting to his constituents, and as the bill was calculated to render the system still more odious and oppressive, he imagined that no apology would be thought necessary for the few observations he designed to make. As I do not expect [said Mr. B.] to be troublesome to this House, either now or hereafter, by long or frequent speeches, I hope I shall be heard with attention; and, sir, as the restrictive system bears with peculiar severity on the people I have the honor to represent, I presume I may be allowed to speak of the tariff, and its effects generally.

I find, sir, that duties for revenue were laid on at various times, from the commencement of our Government until the year 1812; and although these duties did, in fact, operate as bounties on the home manufacture, we, of the South, neither objected to, nor resisted them, because they were thought necessary to meet the exigencies of Government.

Duties for the avowed protection of manufactures were first laid on in 1816, and have been increased by almost every subsequent Congress, until they have at length, in 1824 and 1828, reached a magnitude well calculated to alarm every true friend to the welfare, peace, and harmony of our republic.

As regards the unconstitutionality of what is called "protecting duties," I shall say but little; it has been so often and so clearly pointed out, not only by the ablest men in this House, but likewise by the remonstrances of South Carolina, and particularly by the one presented by her Senators at the last session of Congress, that I deem it useless to say much on that point.

It is acknowledged, on all sides, that the constitution gives no express authority to Congress to impose a tariff for any other purpose than that of revenue. But the friends of the restrictive system make out, or attempt to make out, the powers by implication, by the most subtle, refined, and far-fetched construction. They pursue a course of sophistical, metaphysical reasoning, until they reason themselves not only out of reason and common sense, but out of the constitution to boot.

Some of the advocates of high protecting duties pretend to derive their authority from that clause of the constitution which speaks of "the common defence and general welfare." The result of their legislation is a miserably bad comment upon their doctrine; their provision for the common defence is likely to terminate, and will eventually terminate, in a great diminution of the public revenue, cripple and deteriorate the resources of our navy; and their fatherly attention to the "general welfare" will end in universal bankruptcy, misery, and distress. This, at least, will be the result as regards one portion of the United States—I mean the South Atlantic portion.

But again, the authority for this iniquitous system, this "rider on the pale horse," (spoken of in the Apocalypse,) that brings all hell after it, is drawn by others from the power to "regulate commerce with foreign nations." Yes, sir, and they have regulated it with a vengeance! They have indeed acted the part of a cold-hearted, unfeeling step-mother towards it; or, like the foolish nurse, have almost killed the child with kindness—and this bill, if adopted, would absolutely strangle it to death.

I will only say further, on this point, if the people, the rightful father of commerce, ever wish it to thrive, they must release it from its nurse, and let it shift for itself.

Sir, I think, if a plain and rational construction of the constitution is to prevail—if, in a word, the constitution is not intended as a mere license for the majority to plunder and enslave the minority, your system of "protecting duties" has no foundation on which to repose.

Let us not be told that the Supreme Court, that creature of a creature, must ultimately decide this great question. This would be a mockery, an absolute mockery. It is well known that the judges of that court, according to their own decisions, either cannot, or will not, look into the motives and intentions of Congress. In the language of the bar, they "cannot travel out of the record"—they regard only the title of the act; and the tariff laws of 1824 and 1828 purport to be revenue laws. You refused to call them by their right names. Any hope, therefore, that that tribunal would redress our grievances, would be utterly vain and idle.

Much stress has been laid on the recent opinions of Mr. Madison, by some of the friends of the present tariff. With all due respect for that distinguished man, I must be allowed to say, that, in his late celebrated letter to Mr. Cabell, he has used language, and presented views, very different from those he set forth in various numbers of the Federalist. I had provided myself with that book, in order to read from it various extracts, with the view of contrasting his former with his recent opinions. But this would be a painful task, and I decline it. I believe every gentleman who hears me will acknowledge that it would be no difficult matter to quote Mr. Madison against himself, in various instances. And, sir, if high names are to form a criterion for determining our constitutional rights, we could array against the Mr. Madison of the present day, the names of Jefferson, Pinckney, King, and many others equally distinguished with himself. But, sir, I protest against pinning our political faith to the sleeve of any great man. Whenever the people of the respective States give up the right of interpreting the constitution for themselves, they will be no longer worthy of it. They will be fit subjects for an Asiatic despotism. Besides, sir, we find that our great political sages are not altogether infallible or consistent on topics of this kind. Mr. Madison is not alone in his inconsistency. Mr. Monroe, a few years ago, turned a complete political somerset on the Cumberland road. Having a high regard for Mr. Monroe's amiable personal character, and the goodness of his heart, and the circumstance to which I allude being universally understood, I forbear to comment upon it. All this, however, goes to show the folly and the impropriety of allowing our greatest and best men to interpret and determine our constitutional rights by construction. We must judge for ourselves; and we must judge from the letter of that noble instrument, and its irresistible inferences.

These, sir, are some of my views of our great federal charter. I may not have stated them with the most formal accuracy, because I am no lawyer—I cannot arm myself with the technicalities of the courts. I cannot intrench myself behind all the enormous pile of books and preparation of the bar. And, perhaps, I have as little inclination as capacity for the task—all I can do, is to feel like a man, and endeavor to speak like a Carolinian—and feeling thus, sir, I must say that South Carolina, and the southern States generally, have never known or felt the Federal Government but by its burdens, while the North has known it only by its blessings. Where are all your great naval establishments, navy yards, and magazines kept? Nearly all to the North. In what direction do the offices and appointments of the Federal Government go? Mostly to the North. And where is all that vast amount of treasure collected in the South expended? And where is the patronage of the Government principally bestowed? All in the North and the West. The South, and especially South Carolina, has "no share in the crop." Sir, she desires none—she only asks you to let her alone. She wants nothing from you; but is willing to give you all that her compact with you fairly entitles you to demand.

The Tariff.

No State in the Union ever exhibited greater patriotism, or showed a more absolute devotion to the federal compact, than South Carolina. In the war of independence, she had more than her proportionate share of suffering. She never failed to contribute her full share, both of blood and treasure, to the support of the good cause. And I am proud to say, she was not deficient in head or in hand—in the council or in the field; but in both those departments her high character was ably sustained by her Rutledges, her Pinckneys, her Moultries, her Marions, and her Sumpters.

Well, what was her conduct in the late war? She not only contributed her full share of the means necessary to your defence, but, when it became necessary for you to defend her against the common enemy, as you were bound to do, you acknowledged you were unable to do so. Your resources were exhausted, or employed elsewhere. At your request and promise of remuneration, she used her own purse; she expended her own money, in doing that which, of right, you ought to have done. But, when she came to apply for your boasted remuneration, it was not refused in direct terms, to be sure; but such unknown, complex, and fretful rules of evidence were established in your departments, that few of her claims could be brought within their requisitions; and South Carolina has not, even yet, been reimbursed her money. But, sir, under similar circumstances, she would do the same thing over again.

Nor was she deficient during the late war, either in talent or in nerve. Witness her Croghan and Laval, her Lowndes, her Cheves, and Calhoun—the latter of whom was justly regarded as one of the master spirits of the storm. It has been said in another place, and perhaps it may be said here, that in him was found one of the first and ablest champions of the system, now so much reprobated by his own State. If this be true, it proceeded, no doubt, from an over-generous feeling, common to the South. Although the South, and especially South Carolina, had suffered long and severely through the embargo, the non-intercourse system, and the war that succeeded; and although during all this time the northern manufacturers were reaping a rich harvest, yet at the close of that war our staple article was seen selling at more than three times its present price. The value of our lands and negroes was proportionably enhanced, and wealth teemed in upon us from every quarter. This could not escape the avidity of the manufacturers. Enlisting our warm sympathies in their behalf, they cried, "give, give;" and the too generous South said, "take, take abundantly." But what they at first received very thankfully as a boon, they soon arrogantly demanded as a right; and South Carolina has borne these impositions until "patience itself is no longer a virtue."

Sir, there are but few other States in the Union that would have submitted to the shears of the manufacturers as South Carolina has done. Had old Massachusetts, (a State that I shall always venerate for her early and ardent patriotism, her morality and intelligence,) had she, sir, been affected by your tariff as South Carolina has been, she would long since have taught you to respect her rights and her interests, or she would have taken care of them herself; and, indeed, as it is, some of her leading men had like to have kicked up a confounded dust about the molasses. Well, sir, shall the South, with all her enthusiasm and warm patriotic feeling, be less alive to insult and imposition than the cold regions of the North? Sir, whenever she is so, I pray to my God she may become another Hayti!!! Think you, sir, I am disposed to praise Carolina? "Pardon me, Cassius, the enemies of Cæsar shall say this—then, in a friend, it is cold modesty."

Do not apprehend, sir, that South Carolina wishes to separate from the Union. No State in the confederacy ever has or ever will cherish a more ardent and desperate devotion to the federal compact, provided you do not continue to make it an instrument for robbing her citizens of their hard earnings, and tyrannizing over her rights. No State has ever been more accommodating to federal interests than South Carolina. She has never been a party in the Supreme Court. In short, she has never been troublesome to you in any way; but she cannot consent to hold the rank of a mere province, and her citizens to be enslaved. They will not become slaves to northern manufacturers, that their negroes may be slaves to them. No, sir, you have no just fears to entertain in relation to South Carolina. She will do every thing, nay, she has done every thing that the federal compact, honor, and patriotism require of her; and after this, if the worst must come, why, in God's name, let it come!!! If those who ought to cherish her as an old revolutionary sister and confederate, regardless of their common sufferings and dangers, their joint achievements and their blended glory, still persevere in ungenerous and unhallowed attempts to beggar and enslave her, she will defy you, sir. What! will she again remonstrate? Yes, sir, she will remonstrate in terms as vivid as the lightning's flash, and in a voice as loud as heaven's thunder. I will not apologize for using strong language. I speak the language of a sovereign State, whose patient endurance is stretched to its last limits. Under your iniquitous system, she struggles for existence. During last winter twelve months, I heard, in her own Legislature, the tale of her enormous wrongs and sufferings. It was familiar to me, and I know it was no fiction; yet it was then portrayed in such glowing, burning words, as harrowed up every feeling of my soul. Yes, sir, I there heard eloquence, and I there saw a temper and a spirit that would have done honor to classic Greece or martial Rome, in their proudest days; and, sir, from what I there saw and heard, I feel warranted in saying that the time is at hand when her rights and her interests, in common with those of the South, must be respected, or she will seek a remedy herself. She was only then restrained from doing so, by a confident belief that the new administration, and the present Congress, would turn a hearing ear to her complaints. She hoped that you would return to correct, constitutional principles—to an honest, economical, impartial policy, and this is all she desires.

Sir, there are two erroneous impressions, against which I wish to guard this House. On the one hand, I entreat you not to imagine that South Carolina, or her representatives, are disposed to menace, or to hold out any thing "in terrorem." We are neither so vain nor so mad as to think that we could gain our object by attempting to operate on your fears. We would only address ourselves to your patriotism—your justice, and, as we hope, a returning regard for the constitution.

But, on the other hand, I conjure you not to believe that she will be restrained from asserting and pursuing her just rights, through any apprehension of her own weakness. I am well aware that the physical as well as the moral energy of the South is very much underrated by a certain set of gentry in this country. But, sir, that very part of our population which some suppose, and, perhaps, hope, would neutralize our strength, would, on the contrary, add to our power. A majority of them would, I am confident, fight by the side of their masters. But, were it otherwise, and were we even weaker than our slanderers represent us; they ought to keep in mind the folly and the danger of driving a high-minded, chivalric people to desperation. Frederick the Great had once gained a decisive battle over the Russians. Couriers were despatched to Berlin with the joyful tidings. But a mere remnant of the Russian army, that Frederick had hemmed in upon the banks of the Oder, and which he would neither take captive nor suffer to retreat, but determined to drive them into the river—this comparative handful of men, I say, under these circumstances, fought with such desperation as soon gave a new aspect to the field of battle. Frederick was totally defeated; and in half an hour after the news of a great victory had been announced at Berlin, a new courier stepped forward on the canvas, bearing a billet with these words: "Let the queen, the royal family, the treasures, and every thing that may be found possible, be instantly removed to Magdeburg. All is lost!"

Sir, a perseverance in your unjust policy will drive the South to equal desperation. It will "sow dragon's teeth amongst us, that will spring up in armed men." And who shall set limits to the exertions of a free people contending for their rights?

But it is hoped there will be no necessity of resorting to extremities.

If South Carolina cannot remain in the confederacy on fair, equitable, and constitutional terms; if, finally, she has no alternative but to adopt such measures as may eventuate in her separation from the great American family, or become a slave, she is disposed to leave you in peace; and she will leave with you—whatever may be her own destiny—she will leave with you her best wishes for your happiness and independence.

But it is something worse than folly to imagine that any part of this republic can be completely independent of the rest. If any part can be so, I think it is the South. The North and the West can manufacture our raw material to a certain extent; but they cannot raise it. The South could both raise and manufacture it in abundance. Her bays and her mountains present inexhaustible sources of salt and of iron. Her fertile soil and congenial climate can furnish a redundancy of provisions; and, sir, there is nothing she really requires that she cannot furnish from her own soil and resources.

We have been tauntingly told to supply our own wants, and to erect manufactories also. Suppose we did; to whom could we sell? To the northern or western people? Surely not—they manufacture for themselves, and have no market but ours, either for their live stock, their provisions, their clothes, their clocks, and other "little notions." Neither of us could compete with Europeans in a foreign market. Before we can do so, we must wait till all the fertile lands of the West are inhabited, our country overstocked with a starving population. We must wait till labor is as cheap here as in Great Britain; our workmen as skilful as hers; and, finally, we must wait till that noble spirit of the free and independent American is exchanged for the servile, slavish character of the poor, dependent British subject. The very fact that you require protection for your manufacturers here, where you have neither freight, insurance duties, or commissions to pay, is conclusive evidence that you cannot possibly compete with Europeans in a foreign market. Your demand for our raw material, with all the legislation that could be given in your favor, would be comparatively trifling. Great Britain and France could consume the whole, in as much as they manufacture for the whole world. But if we cease to buy their goods, they will cease to buy our produce. I take it to be a political axiom, that commerce depends on the reciprocal exchange of one article for another; and that a country which will produce nothing that will sell abroad, can buy nothing abroad.

The North and the West are pretty much in this situation. They must get hold of the rice, cotton, and tobacco of the South, in order to use those articles as so many bills of exchange in a foreign market. They are paid freight and commissions on those articles of produce so taken abroad. In return for which, they bring back goods, wares, and merchandise, on which high duties, freight, and commissions are exacted. But this principally comes out of the pockets of the southern planters, who produce the articles exported, and consume most of those imported. We are, in this manner, subjected to a double imposition, while others bear scarcely any part of the public burdens.

Sir, this state of things, alone, would seem intolerable. But the evil does not stop here. The South not only makes up the principal part of the revenue, and furnishes the North with nearly all the carrying trade, but she is taxed with high duties, to enable northern manufacturers to compete with those of Great Britain.

Sir, I feel this imposition much stronger than I can explain it. Perhaps too strongly to be perfectly intelligible. South Carolina is still willing to pay any duties, however heavy, that are necessary for revenue—any that are really necessary for the exigencies of the Government; although, at the same time, she is sensible that a very undue proportion of that burden will rest on her own people. But how much longer she will go beyond this point, may be a very important inquiry.

Under all circumstances, do you think it probable we will continue to purchase our clothing from the North, and our horses, mules, and provisions from the West, while we are deprived of an advantageous foreign market for our agricultural products? Sir, if we are tame and mean enough to do so, we would not long possess the ability.

Sir, I had intended to say much more on this subject; but I have been very handsomely anticipated by my able and honorable colleague [Mr. McDUFFIE] who preceded me. Much of that which I intended to say, has been said by him; and certainly much better said than it could have been done by me. But there were some plain, unpleasant declarations, in relation to the temper and opinions of the South, which I thought ought to be publicly avowed here, and which seemed to have escaped the attention of my worthy colleague. However harsh and grating the sound of those disagreeable truths may have struck upon the ears of some gentlemen in this House, I thought it due to candor—due to the State which I, in part, represent—due to this House, and to myself, to make this emphatical declaration of them.

I have, sir, another reason for abridging my remarks at the present moment. The session is, or ought to be, nearly at a close. We have several very important measures yet before us, on which we ought to act, and which must necessarily be discussed. I discover, too, that a great many gentlemen are very anxious to speak on this very subject now under consideration; and I, for one, am disposed to indulge them.

Allow me, then, in conclusion, to say, once for all, that the people of South Carolina will consent to wear their own homespun all their lives—they will submit to any privation—nay, they will suffer annihilation—before they will become slaves or dependents.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, spoke in favor of the bill, and in reply to the objections which had been made to it.

Before he had concluded, he gave way for the purpose; and, on motion of Mr. DRAYTON, the bill was passed by.

TUESDAY, MAY 4, 1830.

JUDGE PECK.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the managers appointed on the part of this House to conduct the impeachment against James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, reported:

"That they did, this day, carry to the Senate, then in session as a high court of impeachment, the article of impeachment agreed to by this House on the 1st instant; and that they were informed that they would take proper measures relative to the said impeachment, of which the House would be duly notified."

Tennessee Lands.—The Tariff.

TENNESSEE LANDS.

Mr. GRENNELL moved a reconsideration of the vote of yesterday, on the third reading of the Tennessee land bill, stating that he did so at the request of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CROCKETT] who was willing to accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VINTON] to place the proceeds of the lands in the national treasury, instead of giving them to the State of Tennessee, as proposed by the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS was opposed to the reconsideration, and demanded the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. CROCKETT expressed an earnest hope that the House would reconsider the bill. He was willing to accept the amendment of Mr. VINTON, as he had become convinced that the State had no legal claim to the lands; and his great object was to secure the occupants in their possession, without regarding whether the purchase money went into the coffers of the United States or of the State. He proceeded, at some length, to explain the condition of the occupants, the necessity of granting the relief proposed, and to animadvert on the conduct of North Carolina, and the University of that State, in relation to the land titles in Tennessee.

Mr. BELL submitted, at considerable length, his objections to the reconsideration, and his dissent from some of the views of Mr. CROCKETT.

Mr. CARSON and Mr. BARRINGER successively denied and replied to the statements of Mr. C. touching the conduct of North Carolina, and explained and defended that State against the imputations of Mr. C. In reply to a remark made in the course of the debate, respecting the tardiness of North Carolina in coming into the Union, Mr. BARRINGER took occasion to say, that though that State was the last to come into the Union, she would be the last to go out of it.

Mr. CONNER also replied warmly to the allegations of Mr. CROCKETT, respecting the conduct of North Carolina.

Mr. C. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, zealously supported the reconsideration of, and policy of the bill.

Mr. MCCOY rose to move that the motion be laid on the table, but gave way to

Mr. CROCKETT, who replied to the gentleman who opposed his views, and further advocated the bill.

Mr. MCCOY then, after a few remarks, moved to lay the motion for reconsideration on the table; which motion was carried without a division.

THE TARIFF LAWS.

The House then went again into Committee of the Whole, Mr. POLK in the chair, and resumed the tariff subject.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, spoke an hour and a half in continuation, and conclusion of the remarks which he commenced yesterday, in support of the protecting system, and in reply to Mr. McDUFFIE.

[His remarks were to the following effect:]

Mr. D. said, he should make no apology for entering into a debate which had assumed a most interesting and important character; and should first recall the attention of the committee to the measures immediately before them, as the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McDUFFIE] had, in his speech of three days, omitted to notice it. This is necessary, that we may be able to determine whether the amendment proposed by him, which provides for a general reduction of duties, is the appropriate remedy; or the bill itself, which contains provisions of a very different character.

The bill proposes only to adopt such measures as will carry into effect existing laws, which are now imperfectly executed. Apprehensions being entertained that frauds are perpetrated in the collection of the revenue, the bill has been reported with a view to their suppression; but the gentleman, instead of advancing that object, has thought proper by his amendment to propose an entire revision and alteration of the revenue laws. I do not complain of this, as gentlemen from the southern portion of the United States seem very solicitous to make this a matter of discussion, though I should have preferred acting on the matters in the bill by themselves, disconnected from the exciting considerations contained in the amendment.

I shall then ask the attention of the House to the bill; but, before I resume my seat, I shall also take notice of the leading arguments urged by the gentleman in support of his amendment—for this is due to the source from whence they emanate, as well as the importance of the considerations involved.

The only question deserving notice in the bill is, whether the revenue laws have been evaded, and the Government defrauded to an extent which calls for a remedy. It is my purpose to be very brief on this head, especially as the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MALLARY] went largely into the facts; and the proofs he laid before us seem not only to be unquestioned, but the gentleman from South Carolina admits that frauds do exist.

The first evidence to which I shall invite the attention of the committee, is the President's message, in which we are advised, the frauds are perpetrated to such an extent, that he has felt it a duty he owed to his station to call on the legislative branches of the Government for their interposition to suppress them. It is reasonable to presume that the President would not invite our attention to the subject, unless he was in possession of proof that frauds exist. I believe it is not usual for that officer to transmit to us the evidence on which he makes the statements in his annual message. We consequently do not possess that evidence, but still we ought, in fairness, to presume that he possesses enough to warrant his assertions. But be this as it may, unless I am greatly misinformed, there is proof sufficient in the Treasury Department to satisfy any one who will examine it, that the revenue laws are shamefully violated.

But, sir, the proof does not stop here; for we have on our tables another document, (somewhat apocryphal, if all that critics and reviewers have said of it is true,) emanating from the Committee on Commerce; but as the source from whence it comes is not suspected of partiality towards the industry of our country, I may with safety quote it as an authority to prove the violations of the revenue laws. We are told in this report, which purports to be a review of the condition of commerce and navigation, but which is a philippic against the tariff, that frauds to such an enormous extent exist, that, if we follow the statements of the writer out, they will appear incredibly great.

We have yet another document, which comes here bearing the names, as I am informed, of about twenty thousand citizens of the city of New York, who allege, in substance, that the regular trade of that city is depressed to a ruinous extent by the united energy of sales at auction and frauds upon the revenue; the sales at auction, by their despatch, being a principal means by which all traces of fraud upon the revenue are obliterated. Their joint co-operation, it is said, bears with the most alarming severity upon all fair and regular trade. I have noticed the memorials of these persons, because they are as free from all suspicion of bias towards the tariff as the Committee on Commerce, being avowedly hostile to the protection of American industry. I hold in my hand one of these memorials, signed by an officer of the custom-house, in which it is said, "the revenue is largely and systematically defrauded." "The proofs of this alarming truth are so abundant, that it has long been a settled point among intelligent merchants." And it is added, that "the officers of the customs in this city, whose experience has been on the largest scale, and who have devoted much attention to this subject, concur in the opinions and facts which we have now stated." The officers of the customs! Yes, our own officers, who are under the pay and eat the bread of this Government, strange as it may seem, concur in this opinion, that frauds are perpetrated, the public treasure wasted, and the laws of the country daily trampled under foot.

It cannot be necessary to add to such conclusive evidence; and I will proceed to show in what manner these frauds are perpetrated, that we may understand how to apply a remedy to this crying evil.

Your laws now impose upon most kinds of imported merchandise what is usually called an ad valorem duty; that is, a certain rate per cent. on the value of the goods in the market where they are purchased. Consequently, the more they cost, the more duty they pay, and hence the importer has a motive to bring them into the custom-house at as low a rate as possible, that he may escape the duties. The law also provides that the importer shall, when he enters his goods, deliver to the collector an invoice of them, containing the quantity and value, to which he makes oath, and upon which the duties are assessed. If, therefore, he puts down cloth which costs a dollar a yard at fifty cents, he escapes half the duty, unless the fraud is detected.

This mode of imposing duties has given rise to frauds by false invoices, in two ways: first, by an undervaluation of goods, and, secondly, by short measure. And as I do not desire the committee to repose confidence without evidence, I will proceed to lay before them some of the leading facts in my possession. I derive them not from manufacturers or farmers, who are said to be deeply interested in a rigid execution of the revenue laws, but from a source that will not be discredited, because of its attachment to either of these branches of industry, from a document laid before us by the twenty thousand memorialists from the city of New York, who are on the spot, and eye-witnesses of the evasions of the law practised at the custom-house in that city. This document has been long in print, and, as far as my knowledge extends, stands unrefuted—nay, unquestioned. In the statements, the names of persons are purposely omitted, but they can be furnished to any gentleman desirous of seeing them. I am informed that they are among the most worthy and respectable inhabitants of that city, and shall therefore assume that the witnesses tell the truth, leaving it to others to impeach their statements, if it can be done. They represent, that, by the conjoint operation of a systematic evasion of the revenue laws and sales at auction, they have been pressed and borne down, until many have been forced to the verge of ruin; and they give the following as some of the methods employed by those who disregard all moral considerations, and flinch not at perjury, to shun the provisions of law. A merchant of New York ordered two thousand pieces of goods from a British manufacturer, of a particular description, and after patterns of his own, purchasing them at as low a rate as they could be had in the British market. He shipped them home under an expectation of realizing the fruits of his enterprise; but when his goods arrived, he found, to his astonishment, the same individual of whom he purchased, had shipped by the same vessel five thousand pieces of the same kind of goods, to be sold by his agent, and that these goods were offered lower than he could afford to sell. Not comprehending how this could be done without loss, he investigated the matter, and found that the five thousand pieces had been entered at the custom-house from five to eight shillings sterling lower on the piece than he had paid for the two thousand pieces; and the consequence was, that he lost about two thousand dollars, while the British manufacturer made a handsome profit by the fraud in his invoice.

Another merchant bought a quantity of goods entitled to debenture, and, after exporting them, he applied for the drawback, and found it smaller than he anticipated, which led to inquiry; and he ascertained where the goods had been bought in Europe, and that they had been passed at the custom-house at from twenty-five to thirty per cent. less than the cost in Europe. Another merchant in New York became the purchaser of goods, and, suspecting all was not right, pursued a similar course of inquiry, and ascertained, by the clearest proof, that they had been entered at the custom-house at from twenty to thirty per cent. below cost.

In former periods, when our merchants were distinguished as a class of high-minded, honorable men, conducting their business upon fair and just principles, it was usual to sell at an agreed rate per cent. of advance upon the invoice by which the goods were entered, which was exhibited to the purchaser. That mode of transacting business, which subserved the purposes of honest men, has fallen into disuse, and been superseded by an artful contrivance well adapted to disguise frauds. An invoice is made up to enter the goods at the custom-house, wherein they are greatly undervalued; and when it has performed this office, its work being finished, it is consigned to some dark pigeon hole, there to sleep, and another paper, sometimes called an invoice, and sometimes a statement, is exhibited to purchasers, as containing the actual cost of goods. The first is manufactured to delude the officers of the customs, the last to conceal perjury. Several mistakes have happened, which have exposed this infamous practice to the gaze of the public.

"A foreign importer at New York sold a package of goods at a certain advance on the cost. Shortly after making the sale, he discovered that he had sold at an advance on the fictitious cost, or, in other words, on the invoice by which the goods had been entered at the custom-house; he went to the buyer, and informed him of the mistake, and insisted that he should make up the difference between the actual and the false cost. The buyer was surprised at the novelty of the request, refused to allow any thing, and told him, if he persisted in the request, he would expose him to the collector of the customs. The importer pocketed the affront, and went about his business."

In another instance, a merchant bought a quantity of goods at sixty-five per cent. advance on the sterling cost. Soon after the buyer had left the store of the seller, he was informed by the latter that the goods could not be delivered, because he had made a mistake in selling them by the wrong invoice. The buyer replied that he would take them by the prices at which they had been entered at the custom-house; but the seller declined this, saying his instructions were to sell at an advance upon prices put down in a paper which had the form of an invoice, but was called a statement, in which the prices were charged one hundred per cent. above the invoice upon which the duty had been paid at the custom-house; that is, goods charged in the custom-house invoice at twelve dollars a piece, were put down in the statement at twenty-four dollars a piece.

Other examples of this class of frauds could be cited, but it would be a waste of time, for the same authority says: It is a common custom, and one well understood among merchants, that many foreign importers, resident in this country, are in the constant habit of receiving two invoices of each parcel of goods, one for the custom-house, and the other to sell by. It adds, that, among the importers of woollens, it is a common custom to enter goods on an invoice made out expressly for that purpose, and much below the actual cost, averaging probably not less than thirty-three and a third per cent.

In proof of this, and also that goods are entered by false invoices, the following fact is given: Broadcloth, entered at the custom-house as costing from four to five shillings sterling the yard under the tariff of 1824, was frequently bought in at auction by the importer at two dollars and twenty-five to two dollars and fifty cents the yard, to escape from a sacrifice of the property!—yet, if the invoice was honest, these prices would afford enormous profit. Another instance among many shall be named. A merchant ordered a quantity of woollens of an English manufacturer. In the same vessel which brought them out, came a shipment of goods of the same kind and quality, sent by the manufacturer himself on his own account, which were entered at the custom-house so much below what the merchant gave, that the former made twenty-five per cent. on the sales, while the latter lost ten per cent. I will not weary the patience of the committee by multiplying the proofs, for these facts show the most glaring, palpable, barefaced fraud and imposition, as well as an utter degradation of moral character, for they are necessarily accompanied and sustained by the most deliberate perjury.

I do not know, indeed, that any one questions this violation of truth and law; for it seems to be admitted that English agents and manufacturers are right when they declare our custom-house affords the greatest facilities for evading the revenue.

I stated that invoices were also false in another particular—in failing to give a true account of the quantity. The same authority gives well authenticated instances of goods entered for twelve yards the piece, which were sold in market at from fourteen to fifteen yards the piece; by which fraud, sixteen per cent. of the goods at least escaped all duty.

I will now state a fact, which will show that frauds in the woollen trade are perpetrated to a most alarming extent. It is known that the revenue law of 1828 establishes a gradation of prices, on which the duty is assessed; for example, a square yard of cloth costing thirty-three and a third cents, and under fifty cents, is considered as costing fifty cents; and a yard actually costing thirty-four cents, pays the same duty as one costing fifty cents; so, also, a yard costing fifty-one cents, or any sum between that and one dollar, pays the same duty as a yard costing a dollar; and a yard costing one hundred and one cents, or any sum between that and two dollars and fifty cents, pays the same duty as one costing two dollars and fifty cents, and so on. The lowest duty is forty-five per cent. on these arbitrary sums, and the highest is at least three times that amount. The natural operation of the law would be to bring those classes of goods into the market which pay the lowest duty, and to exclude those which pay the highest; but I am well assured that it has produced no such effect; for goods which pay the highest duty are as abundant in the market as they ever were; and there is no visible disproportion between the price they bear and the price of those which pay the lowest duty. In fact, the trade goes on, apparently, precisely as it did before the passage of the law. If the provisions of the act were executed, this could not be so; and we need no better or stronger proof to show that systematic fraud pervades the woollen trade throughout, as an inequality in the duty would produce a like inequality in the value of the foreign productions in our market.

In confirmation of this view of the matter, as well as of the existence of frauds, there have been exhibited in this House specimens of woollens, which were invoiced for entry at the custom-house at one dollar the yard, and are selling by the piece at five dollars the yard in the largest markets of the country.

Sir, the facts disclosed are remarkable in their character, especially as they show that these gross evasions of law are in a measure legalized by passing the goods through the custom-house. Whether they are carried on so boldly and successfully through the negligence of public officers, or because they are unable to discharge the duties imposed on them, I shall not undertake to determine; but I am in possession of some facts which go to show that, from one cause or the other, there is a very imperfect knowledge among the officers of what passes through their hands, and, of course, an imperfect collection of the revenue.

A merchant in Boston imported two cases of goods, which were entered at New York; and, on opening No. 1, and comparing the goods with No. 1 in the invoice, it was found the goods did not correspond to the invoice; and, as he was about ordering them to be reshipped, it occurred to him there might be a mistake in numbering the cases; he, therefore, opened No. 2, and found the goods answered the description of No. 1 of the invoice. Here was no fraud; but it is manifest that the cases could not have been so closely examined at the custom-house as to learn what they contained, or the error would have been detected. So, too, the chairman of the committee has informed us that a British factor was indicted for frauds in the importation of goods, during the last summer, in New York, and, under a sense of his guilt and infamy, absconded, and has not since been seen in the United States. But we are not indebted to the vigilance of the officers of the custom-house for his detection. No, sir; for aught but appears, he might have carried on his traffic in fraud and perjury to this day, had not a misunderstanding and a quarrel risen between him and one acquainted with his scandalous conduct, which occasioned the disclosure, and a presentment by the grand jury.

I would do no injustice to any one; and, therefore, here take occasion to say that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MALLARY] has declared his belief that the collector of New York exerts himself to discharge his duty faithfully, but has hitherto been frustrated for the want of sufficient power to execute the laws according to their spirit and just interpretation. If this be so, it is time efficient measures were adopted; it is time these abuses were reformed; and this custom-house, which seems to be but a railroad to smugglers, was organized in such a manner as to arrest the bold strides of vice and corruption. If there be not force enough there to discharge the arduous duties required, let us send additional aid, or at once repeal our statutes: for the consequences resulting from the present state of things are too injurious to be tolerated. The American importing merchants (I speak of the woollen trade) have, as the gentleman from Vermont has conclusively shown, been forced from their business, or overwhelmed with bankruptcy; so that but a small remnant of a large body of valuable and high-minded men is left to recount the tales of their embarrassments, while their business has been usurped by a class of unprincipled foreigners, who consider it meritorious to violate their oaths, to cheat the Government out of its revenues, and to trample its laws under foot. The dignity and insulted honor of the nation demand a remedy for this evil; our oppressed citizens, robbed of their just rights by an illicit trade, demand the parental protection of the Government.

But the fatal consequences reach beyond the merchant, and strike at the prosperity of the manufacturing interest. We have seen the establishments of our country fall, one after another, victims to the capital and treachery of foreigners, who have stained our honor and stolen our birth-right. They reach alike all our great interests: for you might as well say that the giant oak of the forest will not crush the shrubbery under it when it falls, as to say the overthrow of the merchants and manufacturers will not also prostrate the farmers and mechanics. We live together as a great family, and, by an exchange of the products of labor, we are fed, clothed, and lodged. The farmer has wants beyond the produce of his land; the manufacturer and mechanic have wants beyond the produce of their labor; each supplies the other out of the fruits of his industry: and thus it is, a whole community is made comfortable and happy by a demand for the produce of the labor of each other. Foreign agents and factors, by this system of frauds, break in upon us, and paralyze the industry of the country. They offer merchandise to our farmers, but will take nothing they produce in return. They offer it to our mechanics, but deny them all benefit of employment. They offer it to our manufacturers, but the policy of their country is so regulated as to keep our products out of her market. While Great Britain pursues this selfish course, of which we have no right to complain, if I can understand the tone of her newspapers and periodicals, they hold it to be not only meritorious, but patriotic, to violate the revenue laws of this country; and if I can understand the state of sentiment in Parliament, it is far from discountenancing smuggling. While this state of things exists in that country; while this determination to force themselves upon us, regardless of our policy and of our laws, continues, we have no alternative left, but to meet it with energy, and protect the rights of those who have reposed confidence in us. As things now are, he who commits the most fraud, reaps the most benefit. Sir, I cannot persuade myself there is an individual in this House, who will advocate the state of things I have described. Your laws ought either to be repealed or executed; and my belief is, that the interests of the country require they should be enforced, and that some such plan as that proposed by the bill is a suitable remedy for the evil.

But the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McDuffie] entertains, as he says, an opinion widely different, and has proposed, as an amendment, the repeal of the laws of 1828 and 1824: in other words, he proposes to reduce the duties. I do not comprehend in what way this is to restrain men from injuring us, who are regardless of oaths, and destitute of all moral sentiment; men who hold it meritorious to cheat, and patriotic to commit perjury. You cannot appeal to the consciences of such men with any hope of success; it is to their fears you must address yourself; you must operate upon their interests, and make it difficult and dangerous for them to pursue their career of wickedness; any thing short of this will be worse than unavailing: money is the idol of such men, and gain, whether great or small, affords sufficient temptation to evil; and they must be made to understand that the chances of loss are greater than the chances of gain.

The gentleman has indeed had the candor to acknowledge that his object is not so much to correct abuses, as to revise and modify the revenue system, by reducing the duties generally; and his long impassioned argument has been addressed to us with the apparent intent to convince us of the propriety of adopting such a measure. I did hope this bill would be suffered to rest on its own merits, and receive the approbation or disapprobation of the House according to its unbiased judgment. I did hope the exciting subject of modifying the tariff of duties generally would not be brought forward to embarrass it; but, as the gentleman has thought the opposite course wise and expedient, I shall meet it, not with a detailed examination of his elaborate speech, but of the leading propositions on which his discursive argument was founded. If the premises can be proved false, the conclusions must be erroneous. I am aware that this subject, though one of deep interest to the country, one on which hangs its prosperity and happiness, is, in its details, dry, and calls for an exercise of patience on the part of the committee; yet I hope to be indulged with their attention, though I may ail to reward it.

The tariff, as it is called, which means nothing more than the revenue system which has existed under various modifications ever since the formation of the constitution, has occupied much of public attention for several years past. The tone of complaint from the South, against the laws, has been loud, vehement, and almost unremitted. The support of, or opposition to, the policy, has almost become the test of parties; and as often as the subject has been agitated here, (and it is up in one form or another every session,) it brings with it great ardor and power of argument in the discussion, from all sides of the House. The advocates of the policy have contended that, since the peace of 1815, we are placed in a new condition, the nations of Europe having resumed that trade which fell into our hands by the chances of war; and driven us back upon our own resources; that a demand for the products of the farmer no longer exists to any considerable extent in Europe; and, if labor cannot be so employed here, as to supply our most pressing wants, we should be poor and miserable: for it matters little whether a man have the surplus products of the earth on his hands or not, if he have no way of disposing of them so as to meet his necessities.

On the other hand, it has been contended that our true policy lies in a different direction; and we have been invited to look at the glowing picture of former days, when our trade and commerce spread over the face of the inhabited earth, and men acquired princely fortunes almost without an effort. We have been told that these channels of commerce are not dried up, but are still open to mines of wealth, if we were not so blind to our interests as to shut our eyes against the truth. Those who have pressed such considerations upon us, have been asked where these avenues to prosperity are? Where can the farmer send his grain, his flour, his beef, his pork, and other products of his labor? Does England take them? No. Does France? No. Does any part of Europe? No, not to such an extent as to afford him any encouragement to pursue his business. Europe feeds her own population—she sells the products of her labor, but does not buy such as she can produce. Those, therefore, who look for a return of prosperity from that source, dream. They have waited, and will wait in vain, without the nations of Europe change their policy. Agriculture is the foundation of all commerce; and he who proves that it is our wisest policy to become all farmers, must first show where we can sell the fruits of our labor—we cannot sell to each other if we all work at that business, because we then supply ourselves.

Again: It has been urged that our revenue would fail, and we should be compelled to resort to direct taxes, to support the Government and pay the national debt. Predictions of this kind were made in the bold tone of absolute confidence; and ardent appeals were made to the public, to repudiate a policy which would take from labor its hard earnings to supply the public treasury. Time has falsified these prophecies, and the complaint now is, that the Government will be ruined by the surplus funds in the treasury, because every portion of the Union is scrambling to obtain, in one form or another, its portion of the money.

Again: It was predicted that, where duties have been imposed, goods would rise to an exorbitant price, and the consumer be heavily burdened; but here again the prediction has failed, for the consumer has found his supplies cheapened.

Gentlemen are much puzzled with these results, but still condemn the tariff with as much zeal and vehemence as if every prophecy had been fulfilled to the letter. They seem to be aware of the embarrassments they must encounter in establishing the old notion that a duty is a tax to the amount of it upon the consumer of foreign productions, for they are met with the fact that an increase of duties has not produced that result.

The gentleman from South Carolina, being aware that these objections are not easily surmounted, seems to have discarded the old theory as false, and has introduced a doctrine new in many of its features and consequences. I, for the first time, saw the substance of it in a document from his State, called "An Exposition and Protest," which emanated from the Legislature, and which I read with too much haste to remember with great accuracy. The theory is strenuously maintained, that duties are taxes, although goods are made cheaper under their operation; and to carry the doctrine out, it is asserted that the old idea that the consumer pays the tax; is founded in mistake, for it is the producer that bears the burden. Exports, says the gentleman, pay the duties on imports; and as merchants and factors are mere agents, the planter is the exporter of cotton, tobacco, and rice. Two-thirds of all the exports, he says, consist of these articles. The imports, he adds, are purchased with the exports, and two-thirds of them are paid for in these articles; and, as the exporter pays the duty, it follows that the planters pay two-thirds of the whole revenue; that is, sixteen millions of dollars out of twenty-four millions, which is about the annual amount of revenue. This burden, he says, falls on less than three millions of population, while the remaining nine millions pay only eight millions of revenue, because they export only to that amount.

If this be true, if sixteen millions of revenue are drawn from the earnings of less than three millions of our population annually, I agree that the burdens are greatly disproportionate—that the South are grievously oppressed, and it is the duty of this Government to afford immediate relief. But, sir, the very statement itself strikes the ear as incredible. Is it true? Can it be true that less than three millions of persons pay sixteen millions of annual tax? If so, the planter has a business yielding such a profit as our people are unacquainted with. I say, no people since the foundation of the earth ever did sustain such a burden for a succession of years; and as the doctrine is at variance with all received notions, it ought to be sustained by strong proofs, before it gains credence. The gentleman says, it is self-evident; but, to my dull apprehension, it is far, very far, from being so; and I regret that the evidence which makes it so clear to him, has not been more fully stated.

I will, if the committee will lend me their patience, endeavor to point out some of the obstacles which must be surmounted to establish this doctrine. To disembarass the question, I shall follow the example of the gentleman, by throwing out of the way the machinery of trade, and considering the planter as the exporter. Suppose, then, he ships a cargo of cotton for the English market, where it is sold. The theory of the gentleman is, that he must receive goods in pay, for he cannot command specie; and if these goods are subject to a duty when they arrive in this country, the amount paid at the custom-house is a tax upon the cotton itself, as a raw material, and the planter actually loses it, as much as if an excise were laid upon it before it was shipped; and I understood him to say, and repeat, that it made no difference with the planter, whether the tax, as he called it, was imposed directly on the cotton in his hands before it was shipped, or on the goods, as it now is, at the custom-house. This doctrine, he says, applies to all imported goods thus purchased, be they consumed by whom they may.

I will now state his reasons given in support of this theory, as I understood them. He said, that if the manufacturer in England could raise the price of his manufactured articles, as duties are imposed, he would then throw the burden on the consumer; but he finds himself unable to do this, and turns round on his heel, and takes the amount out of the grower of the raw material. The manufacturer says, you must receive your pay in goods, of some sort or other, in our markets; we cannot raise the price, and must take the duty out of the cotton; and thus the price of the raw material is reduced, and the earnings of the planter taken from him. Being aware that the assent of the holder of cotton is necessary to a bargain of this sort, the gentleman provided for that difficulty, by asserting, in unqualified terms, that the purchaser is enabled to accomplish this end, because he controls the market, and established the terms on which he will buy.

Now, let us look at this proposition, and see what consequences must follow, if it be well founded. The manufacturer in England controls the market; and assesses on the raw material shipped from this country whatever duties may be collected at our custom-houses on any kind of goods that may be purchased with the avails. Is it true that the purchasers in the market control it? Every man who does business, feels that the market is controlled by another and greater power; he feels that commodities are dear or cheap, according as the supply is great or small, and that it is the supply which fixes the price, and not the will of the buyer. If it depends on the will of the buyer, he might as well purchase at one cent the pound as at twelve.

Again: If the buyer has the power to fix the price, and make such allowances and deductions as he pleases, for duties imposed on English manufactures by our tariff, that power will enable him to deduct any other duties or taxes to which his business may be subject; and he would, of course, deduct a duty of six per cent. upon cotton, which is imposed in England, and paid into the treasury of that kingdom. He can provide for this with much greater facility, than for the duties on the various kinds of goods which are bought with the avails of cotton, and exported to this country. If he has the power to provide for the one, he surely has for the other. If the planter carries rice to the same market, it is subject to the same controlling influence, and the duties which are three dollars and thirty-three cents the hundred, may be deducted from the value, and thrown upon him in the same way. So also of tobacco, which pays a duty of three shillings sterling on the pound, which is much more than the article is worth; and consequently the planter would upon this theory lose his produce, and be brought into debt for the balance of the duty. This singular theory discloses a new principle in finance, which must come into high estimation; for, if the doctrine is well founded, a nation may so regulate its trade, as to draw all its revenues from the foreign States with which it deals.

The next consequence, which obviously results from this doctrine, is, that our tariff bears with the same force upon all foreign countries which bring cotton, rice, and tobacco into the English market, as it does upon the southern States.

The planter of the South meets, as competitors in that market, the planter of Brazil, the planter of Egypt, the planter of the East Indies, and the planter of the West Indies. If the duties are taken out of the raw material, because of our tariff, then there ought to be a discrimination in the price of cotton from different portions of the world; and it should bear a higher or a lower price, according as the duties on manufactured articles are higher or lower in the country from which it is brought. If, for example, the duties in Brazil on British merchandise are fifteen per cent., and here they are fifty per cent., then American cotton ought to sell much lower than Brazilian. So, if there be no duty on British merchandise in her own colonies of the East and West Indies; then the difference ought to be still greater. But no such discrimination exists; for cotton of the same quality bears in the market the same price, from whatever country it may come; and it follows, that, if the tariff causes such a heavy loss on the raw material to the planter of the United States, it depresses the cotton of Brazil and Egypt in the same ratio; nay, it occasions the same disastrous consequences to the colonies of England herself, for it levels all cotton to the same standard. Upon this principle, if Brazil were to run her duties on imports above ours, her laws would at once bear upon this country, and reduce the price still lower. If, then, the planter of the South, as the gentleman says, is borne down and ground into the dust by the tariff; if he is robbed of the fruits of his honest labor, and driven to desperation, it produces the same pernicious effect upon the planters of other countries—for they get the same price, and no more; and that price is measured out and regulated by our tariff. This, I believe, is giving a wider scope to the operation of our laws, and diffusing their power more broadly, than has ever been imagined by the most enthusiastic opposer of the tariff.

[Mr. McDUFFIE rose to explain, because he perceived [he said] that the gentleman, from Massachusetts intended to answer his argument fairly. The gentleman had stated that cotton of the same quality bears the same price, come from where it might—agreed—but the southern planter receives goods on which he pays a duty of two hundred and fifteen per cent., while the planter of Brazil gets goods on which he pays only fifteen per cent; that is the reason why the southern planter is ground down, and the other is not.]

Mr. DAVIS resumed. I shall consider that by and by. I said, if the position of the gentleman is well founded, he proves that our tariff bears on all cotton growing countries with the same weight as on the southern States, because the price of all cotton of the same quality, come from where it may, is the same. Now, if the duties are deducted from the raw material, and paid, as the gentleman asserts, by the grower, because the purchaser controls the market, then it is clear that less would be deducted from Brazilian cotton than from ours, and there would be a discrimination in the price—a difference in the value; but I have shown that there is no difference, and the gentleman admits it. It would seem, therefore, to follow, that our duties on British merchandise do not regulate the price of cotton, and have little to do with it.

[Mr. McDUFFIE again interposed to explain. His argument was not that the Brazilian grower could not raise his price, but that the American grower could not.] I fear I do not fully comprehend the gentleman from South Carolina. I was endeavoring to follow out his argument, and to show some of the difficulties he must surmount to maintain it. I understood him to state, in the outset, that exports pay the duties on imports; and to deduce as an inference from the fact, that the South paid into the treasury two-thirds of the revenue of the United States, because the cotton, rice, and tobacco, raised and sent abroad by that portion of the Union, constitute two-thirds of the exports. I understood him also to declare, in the commencement of his speech, that the old notion, that the consumer of imported merchandise pays the duties, by giving an increased price for what he buys, was founded in mistake and misapprehension. In confirmation of these declarations, I understood him to say, and repeat, that it made no difference whether cotton, rice, and tobacco were taxed to the amount of sixteen millions of dollars in the hands of the growers, before they were shipped, or that sum was collected on imported merchandise, bought in foreign markets with the avails of these articles, for, in either case, the whole loss fell on the planter. From the assumption of these grounds by the gentleman, I thought I was justified in inferring that he meant to declare that the consumer did not pay the duty, but the grower of the raw material did; for I could not persuade myself into the belief that he meant to assert that less than three millions of inhabitants consumed forty millions worth of imported articles, while the remaining nine millions consumed only to the amount of twenty millions. I was led also to this conclusion, because the gentleman said that the manufacturer of England would throw the duty upon the consumer, by raising the price of the articles on which the duty was imposed, if he could, but he could not do it because he could not raise the price. Indeed, the whole course of his reasoning appeared to me to be based on the hypothesis that the price of the raw material is reduced in the market by the tariff, and thus the planter is subjected to great loss. I am not able to comprehend how the argument can be explained upon any other supposition, than that the price of the exports is reduced in the foreign market in the manner I have described; for, if this be not the case, I am at a loss to understand how the gentleman can maintain that the South paid sixteen millions, or two-thirds of the annual revenue; for if the burden be not forced upon them in this manner, then they pay as consumers only: but the gentleman has repudiated this as a false notion. He must be aware, also, that the ratio of consumption and exportation are widely different; for, admitting that less than three millions of our population furnish two-thirds of the exports, yet every body knows that the whole nation are consumers of imports, and probably the nine millions of persons who export none of the cotton, rice, and tobacco, are the greatest consumers of foreign merchandise, as they live in a colder climate, and have more wants. But, allowing that they consume only an equal quantity, the argument of the gentleman fails, for, instead of consuming forty millions out of sixty, the South would then consume only fifteen millions out of that amount. I say, therefore, that the main proposition, that the South pays two-thirds of the revenue, because they grow two-thirds of the exports, falls to the ground, unless it can be shown that they pay it in some other way than as consumers.

But I will, for the present, dismiss this part of the subject, and proceed to point out other obstacles, which must be surmounted in establishing the doctrine which the gentleman appeared to me to contend for, and which is surely set up by the exposition and protest of the Legislature of his State.

If the purchaser of raw cotton, and other exports in the English market, has the power imputed to him of controlling the market in such manner as to reduce the value of our exports forty-five per cent., as is alleged, because we collect forty-five per cent. on imports in this country; if he can thus, at pleasure, cut down the value of our staples, then it follows, that he pockets the enormous profit of forty-five per cent. on all the vast consumption of cotton goods in the British dominions, for on this consumption there is no impost, and there is no apology for reducing the price of the raw material which enters into it, because of our tariff. The reduction is to meet the duties here, and here only; but as it reaches all cotton, it produces this result. If it be true, as has been asserted, that the tariff causes a decline in the value of exports of forty-five per cent.; and if it be true, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] has alleged in his report on commerce, that it gives to the British manufacturer a premium of eleven dollars and sixty cents on every piece of broadcloth worth two dollars per yard, the law of 1823, which seems to be in bad odor in England, ought to be esteemed by the people of that country as more precious and valuable than the acquisition of the mines of South America. Yet, with all their sagacity in trade, they are so stupid as to overlook these vast advantages, and actually complain of our policy as narrow, selfish, and illiberal. They must be either short-sighted, or they view the matter differently from gentlemen here.

Another objection to this kind of reasoning, is, that it is utterly impracticable to take the duties on imported merchandise out of exports, and apply them in the way supposed. The whole scheme is founded on the idea that he who exports the products of this country to foreign markets must receive his pay in merchandise. Without stopping to question the soundness of this position, I will ask the attention of the committee to one or two considerations, which will show that no such process of reduction in price can take place. A cargo of cotton is shipped to England, and there sold to a manufacturer of that material. The trade is not for goods, but money, which is perhaps to be expended in merchandise of fifty different kinds—some subject to no duty, some to a low one, and some to a high one. Now, sir, can any thing be plainer than that the purchaser enters into no negotiation about those duties; that he makes no terms of purchase conforming to them? Can any thing be more obvious than that it is a matter of utter indifference with him how the avails are expended? Can any thing be more apparent than that the manufacturers of woollens or silks, if the avails should be expended in these articles, would in no respect be benefited by this reservation of forty-five per cent. in the pocket of the purchaser of the cotton? Can any thing be more evident than if such a deduction were made and reserved by the purchaser, it would be clear gain to him, without aiding in any manner to pay the duties on such merchandise as the owner of the cotton might see fit to take in return? If the manufacturer of cotton paid in cotton goods, he might afford them cheaper; but he cannot compel others to sell their goods cheaper, because he has reserved to himself forty-five per cent. out of the cargo.

I will not weary patience by pursuing this matter further; for, if I do not greatly mistake, I have shown enough to prove the unsoundness of the doctrine, that exports pay the duty on imports—that the planters of the South pay two-thirds of the revenue, because they export two-thirds of the amount of produce which goes out of the country.

I have felt much solicitude to understand the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McDUFFIE] correctly, for I thought he put forth a new doctrine, such as I have been commenting upon. He has risen twice to explain, and by his explanation has placed the question on ground somewhat different from my understanding of the general tenor of his argument. As I am about passing from this part of the subject to another, I will state how I now understand him, and hope he will correct me if I am wrong. I understand him now to say that the price of cotton is not affected in the foreign market by the tariff, but still the planters are burdened with the payment of two-thirds of the revenue, under the operation of the tariff in some other way. I have already intimated that, if his argument could not be maintained by showing the planter suffered a loss in the sale of his produce, the only disputable ground left was upon the question whether he suffers to the amount alleged as a consumer of foreign merchandise. The gentleman, after laboring at great length to prove that the duties fell on the growers of cotton, rice, and tobacco, said the evil did not stop here; if it did, the country would not bear a system so unjust and ruinous in its operation a moment. But [said he] forty-five per cent. of our labor is arrested at the custom-house, and disbursed as a bounty among the manufacturers of the United States. If the doctrine be true, which was thrown out in the argument of the gentleman, that the manufacturer of England reduces the price of raw cotton, because he cannot raise the price of goods, and thus takes the duty out of the planter, it would destroy this argument respecting bounties; for if the tariff does not raise the price of English merchandise here, but leaves it where it was before the passage of the law, it is difficult to see how it affords a bounty to the manufacturers of this country; indeed, we have the declaration of the gentleman himself, that the manufacturers are right when they say the price of goods has not increased much. I will not, however, press this argument, as it seems now to be admitted that the duties are not taken out of the raw produce, but will dismiss it with one remark; if the duties are paid on the raw produce, they are not paid also by the consumer; it is therefore necessary, either to abandon the ground that the English manufacturer controls the market, and reduces the price, because he cannot raise the price of his goods, or to give up the position that the manufacturers here receive a bounty, as a bounty, as it is called, rests entirely on the supposition that foreign merchandise is made dearer in our market by the duties, and that the consumer pays the difference. One argument proves that the planter, as producer, pays the duties, the other that the consumer pays them—thus they are twice paid, if both arguments are well founded.

Leaving, then, the first branch of the subject, I come to this doctrine of bounties. The gentleman says, in substance, that the good will of a majority of the American people is secured by the disbursement of forty-five per cent. of the whole fruits of the labor of the South among them; and how are these disbursements made? Not in money. No one pretends that any money is distributed, for the money arising from imposts comes into the treasury, and is used to defray the exigencies of the Government. I take it for granted that the gentleman means no more by a disbursement of bounties, than I have already intimated—he means, that the price of goods is raised in the market by the duties on foreign merchandise; and, in consequence of that, our manufacturers realize more for their goods. If this be all that is meant by exports paying the duties on imports, it is nothing but the old doctrine under a new name—it comes to nothing more than what has always been familiar to us in all discussions upon this subject—it is what every opposer of the protection of home industry has contended for, namely, that the consumer is burdened with the duty, unless the gentleman means to assert that there is a loss somewhere, between the sale of raw produce and the sale of goods, to the consumer. If there be such a loss, or any loss which goods, on being sold, do not indemnify, I will show that it does not fall on the planter.

I have thus far thrown aside the machinery of trade, and considered the planter as transacting the business, for the purpose of disencumbering the subject; but it becomes necessary now to look at business as it is. The planter does not usually ship his produce, but sells it to the American merchant, who pays him for it all it is worth in the English market, saving freight and charges, and pays him in money. If, therefore, any loss ensues afterwards, by taking merchandise in exchange for it, this loss falls on the merchant, and not upon the planter. That no such intermediate loss occurs, is rendered sufficiently certain by the fact that merchants always have, and still continue to carry on the trade. It would seem very obvious, therefore, that the merchant gets indemnified for all his costs and charges, whether they arise from duties or merchandise, or any other cause; and it seems to be equally apparent that foreign goods come charged with all expenses into our market, and, if any one is burdened, it is the consumer.

I have been thus particular on this point, that there might be no misapprehension about it, for I am aware that the worthy gentleman from South Carolina has been considered as putting forth a new doctrine, as giving a new explanation of the effect of the revenue system upon the South; but I believe, as the matter now stands, it is but a new name for an old acquaintance.

He, however, persists in the opinion that the South bears the burden of the Government, and pays two-thirds of the revenue. He insists that, out of sixty millions of imports, his three millions of inhabitants consume forty millions. I have anticipated nearly all that need be said in answer to this argument. I shall, however, make a few additional observations. There is no exact data by which this point in controversy can be settled, but I will appeal to the judgment of all persons acquainted with the population of the South to settle the question by their own observation. Slaves constitute a considerable portion of this population, and no one, I think, will contend that they consume much foreign merchandise, nor is there any reason for believing that the white population consume more largely than the population of any other region. The gentleman himself assures us they are too poor, too deeply involved, to spend diffusely. The climate of the northern and middle regions is more severe, and calls for more clothing and greater expenditures to make life comfortable; and, if the truth could be reached on this question, there is little doubt that the inhabitants of the northern and middle regions would prove to be the greatest consumers on an average. The gentleman, however, assigns about three millions of persons to the cotton, rice, and tobacco region, and about nine millions to the residue of the country. He assigns to the three millions forty millions of imported merchandise, and to the nine millions twenty millions of like merchandise. The bare statement of the case I am sure must convince every one that the premises assumed cannot be maintained. But there is another consideration which demonstrates the fallacy of the argument. We have been told by the gentleman and his colleague [Mr. BLAIR] that the West drives a large trade with the South in agricultural products, to the amount of several millions of dollars, and that the North and East also participate in this trade, and yet the whole amount of their labor, being in cotton, tobacco, and rice, is consumed in foreign merchandise, for the gentleman says the market of this country is the most miserable in the world, affording them nothing worth naming. The inference is readily made, where do they, upon this view of the matter, find the means of taking these large supplies, if they consume foreign products equal to the amount of their whole labor? How do they pay for stock and provisions from the West, and for the produce from the North? Can any evidence show more clearly that the avails of labor are applied to this purpose, and that they are not all spent upon foreign merchandise? Can any proof show more satisfactorily that the South does not take dutiable articles in pay for their exported products to the extent represented, and that they do not consume such articles to the extent represented? On the whole, without enlarging upon this topic, it seems to be manifest that the South is no more burdened, as consumers, than all other portions of the country, and has as little occasion to complain as any other region.

Having pointed out what I consider some of the leading errors in the opinions and reasoning of the member from South Carolina, I now come to a very interesting and important portion of the matter in debate. I have hitherto met his arguments, and examined them, as if it were a question on whom the burden of taxation is devolved by the impost laws; and having, as I believe, established the fact, that, so far as duties operate as taxes, the South does not participate beyond its just proportion, I shall now proceed to point out what appears to me to be the operation and effect of the revenue system.

The great cause of complaint has been, that these laws, by imposing duties on imported goods, raise the price, and subject the consumers to a tax, because it is said that a duty is a tax; and, if it has the effect imputed to it, I agree that the assertion is well founded. As complaint has identified itself mostly with cotton and woollen fabrics, I shall confine my remarks principally to them.

We manufacture these articles; and the argument is, that not only foreign fabrics, but our own, are increased in price equal to the amount of duties. But nothing can be more evident than the falsity of this reasoning, in its general application; for cotton cloths are daily sold in the market for from six to eight cents a yard, which, if imported, would be subject to a duty of thirty-five cents the square yard. It would be difficult to persuade a man that he pays a tax of thirty-five cents the yard, when the article costs but six cents. This remark is applicable to a large portion of our manufactures, and shows how inattentive to matters of fact gentlemen are, who declaim against duties as onerous taxes.

If duties are taxes, the fact is capable of clear, demonstrative proof; for if a duty of a dollar a yard be levied on cloth, it will immediately be worth a dollar more, and every one who buys will find himself paying the tax, provided such is the effect of a duty. Yet, easy as it seems to be to adduce such proof, no gentleman has ever hazarded the attempt to do it; but all have contented themselves with asserting, and on all occasions reiterating the assertion, that duties are taxes, grievous, burdensome taxes, grinding down and oppressing the poor, and robbing the rich.

There is good reason for this, as no such proof can be adduced. We have experience in this matter, which will afford much useful instruction, if we but listen to it. I shall go no further back than 1824, when the complaints, which have reached to this day, began. The tariff of duties was then increased, and it was then insisted, with prophetic confidence, that goods would rise, and the law bear upon the public with grievous weight; but time proved that the prophets were not inspired, for goods declined, notwithstanding the duties, until they were sold at prices ruinously low.

Then came the much abused law of 1828, which I do not approve of in all respects, and the same desponding tone was again heard—the same misery and ruin from taxes were again depicted in strong colors; but history again run counter to prophecy, for goods fell, instead of rising, and were never known so low in the market, as during the last year. These are strong and very conclusive facts. If they fail of producing conviction, as I have no doubt they will, it is in vain for me to attempt the hopeless task of doing it, for there will be unbelievers.

Taxes are a popular theme; the very term itself excites jealousy, and often resentment, for great efforts are made to establish a conviction in the public mind, that the people are laboring under heavy burdens where none exist, and they are often called upon to war against their best interests, under the delusive hope of bettering their condition. This may account for much of the complaint we hear, though I entertain no doubt of the sincerity of gentlemen from the South, who oppose the tariff on this floor.

As they charge us with false reasoning, when we assert the competition of our manufacturers with foreign productions reduces the price, instead of burdening the consumer with a tax, I shall proceed to show that such is but the natural operation of the protecting system, and that those who assume that duties are necessarily taxes, are in deep error.

Labor lies at the bottom of most human affairs. All property, no matter by whom possessed, nor to what use applied, is the fruit of labor. The rich are made so by amassing together the earnings of those who toil from day to day. It is now a period of general peace and plenty; provisions and merchandise are abundant and cheap beyond former example, and yet there is much distress and embarrassment; we hear, by every arrival, of the money pressure in Europe, and we have felt it here. Many are perplexed to understand this state of things; but if we go back, and trace the history of events, we shall find there is no mystery in it. From the commencement of the French revolution forward for twenty-five years, Europe was involved in a succession of disastrous wars. She had armies and navies, numerous beyond all former example, fed and sustained at the public expense, while they devastated the country, and destroyed the property of individuals.

The peace of 1815, which restored general repose, disbanded by far the larger portion of these troops, put a stop to demands for new levies, and those who had been fed and sustained by the labor of others began to work for their own support. In this way the laboring population was greatly increased, and the annual products of labor were greatly multiplied. The natural effect upon the markets of the world is precisely what we have witnessed. The increase of production in all branches of industry has overloaded the market with almost every kind of thing to which human labor applies itself, and the value has fallen, and fallen upon a principle familiar to every boy that sells eggs from his basket, or tape from the counter: when an article is abundant, it is cheap; when scarce, it is dear.

Let us now bring these facts home, and see in what manner they have borne upon the affairs of this country. During this long and destructive war, our country was a neutral power, and the unnatural state of Europe threw into our hands a great and profitable trade, which took off our agricultural produce at great prices, and the nation advanced in wealth and power beyond example. Our workshops were then in England, and we paid her laborers for most of the manufactured articles we purchased. We gave her the best market she had for her surplus products, and paid extravagant prices. The gentleman from South Carolina has told us that England sustained herself, in this contest against the world, by disbursing annually a hundred millions of public money, which gave vigor and activity to business; but all the advantages derived from that source must have been far short of the value of her trade with us. She drew from us a large share of the resources by which she subsidized Europe, and maintained herself against the almost undivided front of that continent. Her population labored for us, and took from us the money to pay the heavy taxes imposed upon them. Yes, sir, the United States, by giving employ to the laborers of England, contributed largely, very largely, to build up the power and wealth of that enterprising country, and it may well be doubted whether she could have sustained herself through that arduous conflict without this resource.

The peace of 1815 constitutes a new era in our affairs. The controlling influence in the trade of the world, which the chances of war had thrown upon us, perished when repose was restored. Nations, whose affairs had been deranged under the wasting influence of war, and whose citizens had sought a precarious existence, where it could be had, returned to the cultivation of the earth, and resumed the arts of peace. The ocean expanded its bosom to receive them, and channels of trade, which had been obstructed by British power, were opened, and business renewed. The commerce and traffic which we had enjoyed under an unnatural state of things, was now transferred to its rightful proprietors; and those whom we had fed with the products of our soil now began to feed themselves, and we were driven back upon our own resources, and the trade which grows out of them.

We have become manufacturers. I need not detain the committee to point out all the operating causes which have brought us into that business; but it is well known that the policy of this Government has been such, that our destiny in New England could not be avoided, and we have been forced, I believe I may say against public sentiment, into that employment. The Government, by a series of measures, beginning as far back as 1807, has brought us to the position we occupy; and the policy cannot now be abandoned, without producing a shock that would prostrate the community. If earlier events had not given rise to manufacturing, the peace of 1815 probably would: for, while other nations shut out of their markets the agricultural products of two-thirds of the Union, I am not able to comprehend how the population can exist if they are all farmers, for labor must be divided to supply mutual wants.

We are manufacturers as well as farmers—that is our present condition; and what is the effect produced by our labor upon the price of such articles as we fabricate? Here is the great point in controversy. Those opposed to us say they are dearer, and complain of the burden; we think there is little cause for this complaint, and believe that every one who examines into the subject with candor, having a single determination to reach the truth, will soon be convinced that the doctrine which is maintained, that duties are necessarily taxes, is a radical error. I desire that the matter should be seen as it is. We manufacture woollens, and so do the English. They supplied both their own and our demands until we began to clothe ourselves. The peace has increased their number of laborers in all branches of industry, as is admitted by the gentleman from South Carolina, and of course the amount of goods annually produced is increased. While this process has been making its way in England, we have invested a large capital in the woollen trade also, and now employ probably more than a hundred thousand laborers in the manufacture of woollen cloths. Nothing can be more evident than that the increased labor of England, combined with our own, must greatly augment the amount of goods thrown annually into the market. What is the effect? The markets are filled to repletion, and prices fall. And why do prices fall? Because an increased consumption is required to take off the supply: a man has ten dollars, which he can spare from his earnings to buy this kind of cloth; if it will buy only five yards, he must content himself with that; but if it will buy ten yards, it contributes more largely to his comfort and happiness. This illustrates the ordinary operations of business. As prices decline, consumption increases, because the public have ability to buy more. What I have said of woollens is equally applicable to cottons, leather, hats, glass, and all the other manufactures, which employ a large portion of our population. It is the increased number of laborers, and the increased supply of goods, which forces the value downward; and the same principle has been operating upon agricultural products, until it has brought them down where they are, and the value of land with them. It is plenty, and not want, that oppresses the world; it is the want of markets, and not the want of merchandise.

While English labor is at work with great activity, ours is no less industrious. It matters not with what power our labor bears upon theirs, because they work, as the gentleman from South Carolina says, for bread, and must work on, or starve, if wages run down to a penny a day; and the less pay they get, the harder they must work to support themselves. A pressure upon them, therefore, by severe competition, diminishes the value of capital and labor, but does not tend materially to diminish the quantity of goods annually made. There can be no new division of English labor. They have no wild lands to flee to, as a refuge from starvation; nor can they drop one branch of manufacturing, and enter into another, to any great extent, for the value of labor has as strong a tendency to equalize itself, as water has to come to a level; and the operation of this principle has already filled all employments. They cannot therefore stop manufacturing woollens or cottons, whatever may be the pressure felt from our pursuing the business, so long as the employment will give bread to the laborer; all they can do is to sell goods cheap, by reducing the price of labor, and realizing less profit on capital. Their destiny is fixed, and they must be our competitors. There is no mystery, therefore, in the decline of cotton and woollen goods. The acting principle is the same that reduces the fare in opposing lines of steamboats and stages. It would scarcely have been credited a few years ago, that the fare of a passenger from New York to Albany would be reduced from six to one dollar, and the business be continued; nor would a prophet have gained credence, who, ten years ago, should have foretold that cottons would now be purchased for six cents, as good as were then selling for twenty-five cents.

He who can understand that ten men can perform more service than five, need not be at a loss for reasons to explain the decline in the value of cotton and woollen goods. It is the competition of labor—the increased production of the article—a competition which English labor cannot shun, and which they must be content to meet under every disadvantage, unless they and our adversaries here can succeed in breaking down our manufacturers.

This is, I hope, a plain and intelligible view of the operations of manufacturing in this country; and I leave gentlemen to settle the question for themselves, whether the system of revenue is a system of bounties and taxes, grinding down the poor, and robbing the rich, as has been represented.

I will now ask the attention of the committee to another view of the subject. The doctrine advanced by the gentleman from South Carolina is very broad and comprehensive: It aims at an entire revolution in trade; for he proposes to appropriate the markets of this country to the use of the planter, to enable him to sell such merchandise as he may receive in pay for cotton, rice, and tobacco. It of course, aims at the destruction, not of cotton and woolen establishments alone, but of all manufactures, or his object will not be attained. The purpose seems to be to drive home competition out of the market, to give place to foreign goods, and this cannot be accomplished short of the destruction of manufacturing—for while we continue to make goods, we shall be competitors for the market. Suppose the object of the gentleman should be accomplished, and all the population engaged in the manufacture of cotton, wool, hemp, leather, furniture, salt, nails, cutlery, and the numerous other branches which I need not name, should be turned out of their employments, and forced back upon the soil for subsistence, and all the capital employed in these arts should be sacrificed! What would be the effect upon the trade and prospects of the country? The first effect would be to depopulate the North; for when these occupations cease, the farmer will cease to have any object to cultivate the soil, as he will have no market for the products of his labor. And I can assure the gentleman from South Carolina, that, if the South were to have undisputed possession of our market, under such circumstances, they would have but a miserable prospect of thrift in it, for we should have no means of paying for their imported merchandise.

The next obvious effect would be to diminish the number of persons and the amount of capital engaged in manufacturing; for, while we dismiss all our own population from these pursuits, England cannot increase the number of her laborers. All who work for a living are obliged to labor now, and to the utmost extent of their power, because labor is cheap, and hands that work for bread cannot be idle. There would therefore be a clear diminution of laborers, equal to the number of persons engaged in such employment in this country. It follows, that a less quantity of goods would be produced, and prices would rise, while our ability to buy would be diminished, because our labor would cease to be productive. If the gentleman from South Carolina imagines the South would reap such profits from this state of things as has been represented, he is mistaken, for another reason. If his policy makes labor and capital of no value in one part of the Union, while it may be employed to great advantage in another, the population he oppresses will, in self-defence, and from necessity, become competitors for the profits of a good business. The labor and capital of the North and East will be carried into the business of the South, until cotton, rice, and tobacco are brought as low, by over-production, as other agricultural products; for labor in one branch of business can never maintain an ascendancy in profit over others for any length of time.

Again: If the revenue system is to be overturned, the effect will probably be as deeply felt by the sugar planter as any citizen of the United States—for no one feels a stronger dependence on a protecting duty. Suppose that interest should fall a victim to the policy, would it bring with it no injurious consequences to the South? Is it not well known that the production of sugar gives an increased value to slaves, because it opens the best and almost the only valuable market for that kind of property? Gentlemen can judge better than I can, how much their property will suffer; but, if I am rightly informed, the overthrow of the sugar planters would be more deeply felt than any operations of the tariff.

I have already expressed a belief that the state of things which seems to be so earnestly coveted would probably raise the price of goods—because the number of laborers would be diminished, and the quantity produced be lessened. How would it be with cotton? The causes which would diminish goods, would tend to increase the quantity of cotton annually produced. Under the change of policy, the labor of the South would not be diminished, while that of other portions of the United States, being thrown out of business, would seek employ where it could realize most profit. If sugar should not be cultivated, then that district of country must grow cotton; all the cotton now consumed in our manufactures would, in addition, be sent into the markets of Europe. These causes combined would greatly increase the amount of that article exported annually; and, if the aggregate of cotton is increased, while the aggregate of goods is diminished, the inference is obvious: the price of goods would rise, while the price of cotton would sink.

Suppose, then, I repeat, that the deadly blow which this policy aims, should fall upon us, our factories should stop, and the business of manufacturing, in all its various kinds, and with its thousand ramifications, should be brought to a perpetual stand, and the vast population which live by it, and give life and joy to the whole community, should be driven, as they must be if you take away the power of earning food, back into the wilderness, upon savage life, to sustain a precarious existence—what benefit, I ask, can result even to the South by this process of desolation? The inquiry is not put with the hope of convincing any one of the folly of pursuing such a policy; but there is much in it worthy of attentive consideration, as it touches very nearly the interests of gentlemen who seek to drive competition from our markets, by placing them under the control of foreign industry. I beg of them to examine the matter with candor, and decide for themselves whether they do not mistake their own interests.

Cannot gentlemen find other causes for the depression of business besides the tariff? If the value of lands, or the value of produce, or of any other property, declines, it is immediately ascribed to the revenue system. Every thing evil, and nothing good, is imputed to the laws. The gentleman from South Carolina has gone so far as to assert that the fall of property is a tax springing from this source. But I cannot learn that property in the South has declined more in value than elsewhere. It has experienced a great depression in all trading countries, and the cause is obviously over-production from the great activity of labor. If goods and produce fall, land and other property must follow.

I can find an easy and satisfactory solution of the depressed value of cotton, without charging it upon the tariff. In 1818, we exported ninety-two millions of pounds to foreign countries, and the amount has gone on increasing, until, in 1827, we exported two hundred and ninety-two millions of pounds. I have no account of the two last years, and therefore cannot speak of them. While in this period of nine years the exports have more than tripled, we have greatly increased our own consumption, by multiplying our factories. In addition to this, the quantity produced in Brazil, Egypt, and other foreign countries, has been much augmented, so that in truth the market is glutted with the article; and it is rather matter of surprise that it maintains itself where it is, than that it has declined. The raw cotton has, for the last three years, varied very little in value, while cloths have fallen from ten to five cents the yard. Can the planter see nothing in all this but the withering influence of the tariff? Can he not comprehend that if the supply outruns the demand, the article must sink in value, and that the fall is not the work of the tariff, but his own work?

I may as well here notice another statement of the gentleman, which I thought rather extravagant. He said that Mississippi paid a tax into the treasury of the United States, under the revenue system, of twelve hundred thousand dollars annually; and, in another part of his argument, he informed us that she exported to the amount of three millions of dollars, and that slave labor was actually worth but twelve and a half cents per day. If he allows one-half of the whole population of Mississippi to be in the field, it would just about pay the tax, and no more. I make no comment on the statement.

Sir, what is the revenue system, and what are its objects? It is well known, to every statesman at least, that it is the leading policy of the great trading States of Europe, to impose heavy duties on all the products of industry matured by their own citizens. The object is to secure to the working population the means of subsistence. England, for example, imposes duties on foreign bread stuffs, which exclude them from her markets under ordinary circumstances, that her own farmers may have the benefit of feeding the nation. She also imposes a heavy duty on silk, that her laborers may make it; and in this manner she watches over the laborer, to provide, as far as she can, for his necessities. Such, also, is the policy of all the great States. How are we to meet it? How can we buy goods, if they will take none of the products of our labor in return? How can the farmer of the north, the west, or the middle States, buy, if he cannot sell? What is to become of him if the home market be destroyed, and he be put to depend on these foreign countries for the sale of his produce? He cannot live under such disadvantages, and is obliged to look to a beneficent and parental Government for protection. He asks for no bounties for any one—no corn from the public crib, as the gentleman intimated, but merely that this Government may so far interest itself in the fate of the people, as to countervail the policy of other nations, which in its operation is designed to bear favorably upon their own labor, but injuriously on ours. He asks that the wasting influence of the laws of other States may not reduce the laborers here to beggary. He asks of a Government distinguished above all others, because it is free, and emanates from the people, that regard for popular interests which no despotism dares refuse its humblest subject. This is the revenue system—the tariff system—the protecting system.

What is the free trade system? as it is called, by misnomer, for it has been more appropriately denominated "the fetch and carry system." Its aims are high, and its scope is broad, if I have rightly understood the gentleman from South Carolina. He does not complain that the South are not left at liberty to raise as much cotton, rice, and tobacco as they please; nor does he complain that they are not at liberty to send it where they please, and to sell it to whom, and when they please. No, sir, the laws of the country leave them as free and untrammelled as the air, on all these points—but this is not enough; and they complain of wrong and injury, nay, threaten us with resentment, because they have not the entire market of the United States to sell the goods in, which are received in pay for these commodities. They complain of the competition of American industry, because it supplies a portion of our wants with manufactured articles, and takes up a part of the demand. They would have the whole to themselves. The planters would apply to their own benefit the entire resources of the country, by compelling us to buy the goods they would furnish to us, instead of working for ourselves. They give a preference to English labor, and would have us work with axes and spades from English shops. They aim to build up the cotton, tobacco, and rice interests, at the expense of the rest of the nation, to make nine millions of people bow down to three millions, to constrain us to give up the market to them, and ruin ourselves, that they may try an idle experiment to see if they cannot obtain a larger price for cotton. God has given them a monopoly of these articles, so far, at least, as respects us; but with this they are not content, and insist on a monopoly of the market throughout the United States; and because we resist this grasping disposition, we have been called by the gentleman from South Carolina despots, avaricious, grinding monopolists, as merciless and unrelenting as the cannibal, who turns a deaf ear to the cries of infancy for mercy. Yes, sir, the gentleman has loaded us with these hard, unkind epithets, and has reiterated them in many forms in the course of his remarks.

Sir, I declare, in the sincerity of my heart, that I feel deep pain and anguish when I hear such language on this floor, because its tendency is to excite deep feelings of resentment in the injured party, and to promote sectional hostility. It pains me no less to be obliged to notice it; but, sir, if I could pass by such language in silence—if I could sit here without repelling it, I should be unworthy of representing the people who sent me here, and unworthy of the State to which I belong. If gentlemen will provoke us by attack, for one I shall not refuse to meet it; if they will assail us with calumnious epithets and comparisons, let them not flinch when the mirror is held to themselves. In what I say, however, I have no personal allusion, for I number many southern gentlemen on this floor among my most esteemed acquaintances. Nine millions of despots and monopolists, more cruel than any tyrant that ever disgraced a throne, because less merciless than cannibals! Who is it that bandies such language? Who is it that calls the honest tiller of his own land, and the laborious manufacturer, relentless despots, guilty monopolists? He who holds dominion over his thousands of acres and his thousands of slaves. He who, not content with a part, arrogates to himself the whole resources of the country, and stuns us with the cry of oppression, because we will not consent to be ruined by an overpowering monopoly, under the delusive guise of free trade. It is, as the gentleman was pleased to say of the manufacturer, the "lordly" planter. It is he that maintains, as I learn from high authority, (speeches of MESSRS. ROWAN and HAYNE,) that slavery is favorable to liberty, because labor degrades the human mind, and so assimilates men to a state of bondage, that none but those who bask in the sunshine of luxury and ease can appreciate liberty.

The "lordly" English merchant and factor, the trumpeters of free trade, with their insolent parade of wealth, and their feet, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENGE] says, upon the necks of their own people, come here to join in the cry of aristocracy, monopoly, and despotism! They come here to lift their voices, with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENGE] against the honest laborer, and to tell him, in scorn, that his principles are in his pocket, and his conscience in his purse. Sir, if you would excite loathing and disgust in the minds of the men who went from the plough, the anvil, and the bench, to meet oppression at the very threshold, and who achieved the independence of the nation, tell them they know not how to appreciate liberty, because labor degrades their understandings. If you would teach their posterity to hate and despise you, compare them with your slaves; tell them their condition approximates to bondage; rouse their indignation with calumnious taunts and unjust reproaches, and you will accomplish your purpose; for they are men, and have the feelings of men. I will not follow examples often set here, by calling them generous, chivalrous, and magnanimous; for they want no soft words from me—they know their rights, and how to maintain them, and this is the highest commendation language can bestow. This people have been kind and generous to me, and I will not, cannot, requite it with ingratitude. I lament that any thing should have occurred to call for these remarks; but I should fail of the duty I owe to my constituents, as well as to my State, to sit here in silence, and hear them calumniated—to hear them called monopolists, because they insist on the right of this Government to protect its citizens—to hear them stigmatized as tyrants, because they refuse to return to colonial bondage. The gentleman from South Carolina labors under great misapprehension, and, when he comes to be better informed, will abandon the unjust sentiments he has uttered on this and another point, which I will also notice.

He has said that a few manufacturers send members here, and that the great body of the people are mere instruments in their hands. Can the gentleman be serious? Does he believe the people of New England, whom he thus stigmatizes, are reckless of their political rights and privileges? Sir, I have never seen a people who could more justly treat with scorn this contumely; they are as free and independent as the air that sweeps over their native hills. Show me a capitalist who attempts to influence an election by the power of wealth, and I will show you a proud spirited people, that will brand him as a wretch, and hiss him from the community. We are unlike some other portions of the country—we have no captains of tens, twenties, or fifties, who lead men to the polls, and direct them how to vote; the people scorn such degrading influence, and pay no such price to be in the employ of any one. He has said the people are ignorant, acting under delusion, because they read little, and only on one side of the question. Does he not know we have been forced into our present attitude, against our prejudices and prepossessions? Does he not know that many of the most approved productions against the tariff have been written, and published, and read, among us? He nods assent. Does he not know that we are the most reading people in the United States, and that all questions are canvassed and examined with the greatest freedom? If he believes we do not read both sides, and do not understand what belongs to this policy, he is greatly in error. It has always been a topic of earnest and careful consideration, and is supported from a settled conviction that the country would fall into decay, if it should be subjected to such a policy as the gentleman aims at.

The gentleman has told us that there is one small factory in his district, and he verily believes, if there were another, it would turn him out of his seat. Sir, when he spoke of the influence of capital in the North, I fear, to use a homely adage, he measured the corn of others in his own bushel. If two factories will revolutionize his district, I will not do his people the injustice to say it is the influence of capital, but leave the world to decide whether it will be that, or a practical argument, dispelling prejudice, and converting men from error, by the power of truth.

Sir, much has been said by the gentleman from South Carolina and his colleague [Mr. BLAIR] on other topics, which have not the remotest connexion with the measure before the House. I heard, and regretted to hear, arguments, which appeared to me to touch, rather roughly, the integrity of the Union; but it is not a question before us whether we shall maintain or dissolve the Union. The constitutional power of this Government to pass laws to protect our industry, has been denied. On a former occasion I delivered my sentiments on this topic; and, being satisfied that the power is not only clearly given to the Government, but that it was one of the principal objects, in adopting the constitution, to lodge this power in the Government, I shall not go into the question, for an argument would necessarily be a repetition of what is now before the public. I shall, therefore, forbear any comment upon such arguments, and conclude by thanking the committee, with great sincerity, for the very kind attention they have bestowed through the whole of my remarks.

Mr. CRAWFORD, of Pennsylvania, followed on the same side, and spoke about an hour, when he suspended his remarks.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 5, 1830.

NAVIGATION AND IMPOSTS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill reported by Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee on Commerce, on Friday last, concerning navigation and imposts.

Mr. WAYNE resumed his remarks on the subject, and addressed the House during the remainder of the hour allotted to the discussion of reports, without concluding.

THE TARIFF.

On motion of Mr. MALLARY, the House then again went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. POLK in the chair, on the state of the Union, and took up the bill in alteration of the several tariff laws.

Mr. CRAWFORD, of Pennsylvania, addressed the committee near an hour in conclusion of the remarks which he commenced yesterday. He remarked, in the commencement of his speech, that it had been often and truly said, that no human enjoyment was without an admixture of something which lessened the gratification it would otherwise yield. To nothing is this remark more applicable [said Mr. C.] than to our political condition. Living under a Government of our own choice—an essential feature of which is equal representation, and a voice by each free-man (with such local qualifications as have been prescribed) in the making of those rules by which all must be governed, discontent has, nevertheless, at every period of our history, since the adoption of the constitution, existed in some section of the country. Its earliest ebullition was in my native State, where a scene was exhibited, that I hope and trust may never again be found within her limits. On more than one occasion the northern and eastern portions of the United States have murmured their dissatisfaction audibly, nay, spoken it out plainly; and at still later stages of our existence, our southern brethren have held the language of complaint boldly and fearlessly; have asserted what they believed to be their rights with characteristic ardor and frankness, which I am so far from quarrelling with, that they strongly recommend to me the other high qualities with which they are found in association. A generous devotion to the interest of his own constituents, and a zealous adherence to State, so far as compatible with United States duties, will always commend a legislator to me. I want neither for my friend, nor the administrator of my country's affairs, either in an executive or legislative capacity, a man who has no community of feeling or of interest with those among whom he has grown from childhood, or in the midst of whom he has lived since his entrance upon life. From him who never looks beyond his own door, or who is content if the sky be serene for him, although it lowers upon others; who can look on calmly while the storm howls, and prostrates those near him, when an extended arm might shroud, or, if the attempt failed, it would at least console them, I desire to be far removed. While, therefore, I admire the warmth with which southern gentlemen maintain the positions they assume, I conscientiously believe they are mistaken in the views they take of the subject, and have glanced at one or two passages of our history, to show that they are not singular as relates either to the source whence they suppose their difficulties to spring, or (I say it with the highest respect for all my opponents on this question) the error under which they labor in making the allegation.

And here permit me to remark that I have heard it repeatedly asked in this Hall, by some of those who differ from me in opinion, "What! do we not understand our own interest?" And although it was not said, the idea was evidently intended to be conveyed, that we, of the middle and northern States, were not so well qualified to judge of southern interests. Perhaps it is true: so far as concerns myself, I admit it. But, sir, have I any choice? Am not I, in my proper place, in my representative capacity, bound to decide upon such questions as shall be, or have been raised? Further, sir, am I not compelled, as one of those charged with inflicting flagrant injustice, to stand by my conduct, and show that it is arraigned without reason? Having, therefore, a serious, and, perhaps it might even be called, in reference to the opinions of others, of whom I have made a high estimate, a solemn duty to perform, I may not, and, unless prevented by stronger than human powers, I will not, neglect it, but must proceed to state the grounds of my preference for the original bill, modified as may be deemed best hereafter, but preserving its principle and purpose, and my objections to the amendment of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. McDUFFIE.]

It has been, and it must be conceded, that, if the law stands as it now does, it should be rigidly enforced. No honorable gentleman on this floor will countenance its infraction: whatever our statutory provisions may be, they should be executed. It is disrespectful to the sovereign power; unjust to the revenue; faithless to the manufacturer; an encouragement of fraud; and a dereliction of duty, not to compel an observance of such regulations as the competent authority may from time to time enact. True of all laws, the remark is especially so of those which pertain to commerce, particularly that portion of it which belongs to importation, because they are most easily evaded. Facilities for eluding vigilance grow out of the extended nature of the business to be operated on; out of the facts, that it is transacted partly upon the ocean, and partly upon the land—in different countries, and requires numerous agents. Do frauds exist? If the interrogatory is answered in the affirmative, this branch of the question is settled.

It may be useful to ask here, by whom is the importing business of the United States now conducted? Not exclusively, but chiefly by foreigners. In New York, which may be called, without impropriety, the port of the country, there are but five importing merchants. By whom, then, are goods introduced? They are imported for account of foreign houses, and received by foreign agents. A young man arrives in America, fixes his abode in a boarding-house in New York; without any interest in our affairs; without making any contribution to our expenses; without any feeling in common with us; and with no desire but to get rid of as much of our import duty as possible. In a short time, a cargo of goods is landed, and taken possession of by him as consignee; which are disposed of at auction, the money received for them, and carried off, without the payment of the duties, which he has been unable to evade; for these rest in bond, until a second and sometimes a third cargo has been introduced; thus enabling the foreigner, who has defrauded the revenue, to trade upon your own capital; furnishing him the very means of injuring you, and agreeing to receive a deadly wound from an instrument that you place in the hands of your enemies. Sir, I believe the credit system, in respect of duties, should be abolished, or, at least, so modified, that the amount due to Government shall not be carried out of the country, to purchase other goods for the further depression and final destruction of home interests. But of that, more at a proper time.

The honorable chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, [Mr. MALLARY] and the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS] have shown, conclusively I think, that the laws for the collection of our duties require revision. The very temptations held out by the existing system, lead men of weak principle to fall into the pit. By it, one package in twenty (act of March, 1823) is to be examined and appraised: what becomes of the residue? They are warehoused, carried off to Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other towns, or distributed through various shops in New York, and cannot be traced. Has a collector any authority to enter a warehouse or store, in search of these articles? None. He may enforce the penalty of the law; but that is his only remedy. The very fact that has been stated, of merchants or consignees refusing to receive twenty-five, thirty, and, in one instance, sixty per centum advance on the invoice prices, proves that frauds have been practised. Do we not hear from these very men themselves, of more than one invoice of the same goods, and of cloths sold in Boston for five dollars per yard, which were imported as not worth one dollar? All the officers of the Government complain of the constant infractions of the law. The frauds perpetrated upon the revenue are enormous, depriving it of many millions per annum; and consignees and others are frequently made the ignorant and innocent instruments of these practices, by means of double invoices and papers. Does not every man see that the evil must necessarily exist, according to the present legal provisions? The imports of New York amount, nominally, to twenty-five millions of dollars; but really to forty or forty-five millions. Two appraisers are appointed to inspect these goods; can they do it? It is impossible they can examine the one-hundredth part of what they are enjoined to look at. I am supposing the best possible intentions and qualifications on the part of the appraisers, for I know nothing to justify the expression of a different opinion; but it is morally impossible they can go through what is required of them. These importations come like spring and autumn floods, sweeping all of duty and principle before them, and drowning in their course honest industry; as the prospects of the farmer and the artisan are often overwhelmed by the streams which rise above their banks, and desolate all within their range. At these seasons of influx, critical examination is out of the question by two men. You might as well attempt to stay the current of the North river, as to prevent the fraudulent introduction of goods, with your present barriers against dishonesty. They are so feeble, as to invite almost the efforts of avarice and cunning to a competition with the diligence and vigilance of your custom-house officers. Does not every day's observation prove that an inefficient agency, or an imbecile and ill executed system, is exactly what is most desired by those who disapprove of it? That, to them, it is better than a partial abolition or modification of the system? By seeming to yield to what is not, and cannot be enforced, they violate it with impunity, and make such inroads upon its wholesome but unfulfilled provisions, as to render it, in a great degree, useless.

Smuggling has been mentioned, and it is said our northern border neighbors understand this species of roguery. It is probable there is ground for the complaint; nay, I do not doubt that, to some extent, the evil exists; but those who are best qualified to judge, say it is not known or felt in business, and they are those whose wits are sharpened by their interests, and who, in the opinion of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. McDUFFIE] habitually, zealously, and devotedly worship in the temple of mammon—the manufacturers themselves do not attribute their greatest degree of injury to this cause, but to the evasions that the bill on your table proposes to prevent. To what extent soever smuggling exists, let it be arrested; I will join heartily in any measure calculated to abolish the traffic, and prevent its recurrence; but the crying evil, the one that those intended to be benefited arraign the most solemnly, is the one that the great mart of the country seems to cherish and nourish; an evil that demoralizes, while it does not enrich—that disgraces while it wounds.

One of the great interests of the country is differently injured—injured by what I cannot but deem a most erroneous construction of the laws by the officers of the Government. And here I mean no reflection upon any officer, and, least of all of them, could I intend any upon him who was lately, or on the gentleman who now is,* charged with the execution of the laws under consideration. They have, severally, I doubt not, discharged their public duties faithfully and conscientiously. All I design to say is, that either they have been, or I am in error; and it is no disparagement of either of us, to suppose a mistake. Iron, sir, is manufactured to a great amount in various parts of the United States, but in no part of the country is it now made to the same extent (an extent destined, in future times, to be almost without limit) as in Pennsylvania. It is there, and I do not doubt elsewhere, but there I know it is, smelted by men of as exalted characters and principles, as any other class bearing the name of American—whose reputations and deserts I would willingly compare with those of an equal number of gentlemen who hear me, for integrity, for patriotism, for intellectual endowment, for all the qualities that adorn and elevate our nature, and await the result of the comparison cheerfully and fearlessly, for they have no superiors. These respectable but aspersed manufacturers struggled long, and tottered under the embarrassments and difficulties of their business—many of them were obliged to stop—the few that lived out the darkness and gloom that preceded it, were encouraged by the light that shone upon their path in 1824—it revived the drooping, and raised the despondent—old establishments were resuscitated, new ones commenced—but it was not till the brightness of 1828 covered the land, that they moved cheerily on, and what was hope became reality, in the successful prosecution of a most valuable branch of domestic production, until a blight seized upon the crop when it was ready for the sickle, and the labors of the husbandman were about to be suitably rewarded, by a return for all his toils and anxieties. By the first section of the act of May 19, 1828, it is enacted that a duty shall be imposed “on bar and bolt iron, made wholly or in part by rolling,” of thirty-seven dollars per ton: provided that all iron in slabs, blooms, loops, or other forms, less finished than iron in bars or bolts, excepting pig or cast iron, shall be rated as rolled iron in bars or bolts, and pay a duty accordingly.” Of this law, one would have supposed that there could have been but one construction; the cupidity of foreigners, however, discovered that, by the first section of the law of the 22d May, 1824, manufactures of iron and steel, not specifically enumerated, are subject to a duty of twenty-five per centum ad valorem. But how, it will be naturally asked, could the law of 1828 be avoided, by a pretended compliance with the act of 1824? I could scarcely have believed it, sir, but it is stated upon authority that cannot be questioned, that bar iron, through which a few holes were perforated, as is done in the case of wagon tire, or the plates used on railroads, costing nothing, and having no just claim to be considered as a manufacture, has, nevertheless, been so imported and entered, and been so recognised by the proper department. What is the effect of this? Instead of paying a duty of thirty-seven dollars per ton, under the law of 1828, the iron is introduced as a manufacture, under the provision of 1824, and, costing less abroad than twenty-eight dollars per ton, pays a duty of twenty-five per centum ad valorem, or something short of seven dollars per ton. Is not this virtually repealing the act of 1828? What is a manufacture? It is something made by art; an article fashioned, as the word imports, by the hand of man, and to which the chief value is given by the labor bestowed upon it. Will any gentleman who hears me, contend that striking a few holes through a crude bar of iron makes it a manufacture, within the meaning and intention of the law of 1828? Sir, it is a perforation of the law itself, so to construe it—amounting to a setting aside of legal enactments, in my judgment, instead of an enforcing of them. Although, perhaps, not strictly regular, at this stage of the bill, I could not say less on this particular subject than I have done. In due season an amendment will be offered, that, I trust, will correct the evil.

* I have been informed that Mr. Rush put the construction from which I dissent, on the laws; and that Mr. Ingham, not feeling at liberty to depart from, has acted upon it.

Believing that all will coincide in the wish to execute existing laws, and that enough has been shown to call for the proposed legislative interference, I will endeavor to lay before the committee some of my reasons for thinking that the amendment submitted should not be adopted.

I regard the simple question at issue to be, whether we shall employ and sustain our own countrymen, or look to foreigners for a supply of our wants. Whether we shall cherish those of our own blood and lineage, or foster others, who are alien from our family, careless of our happiness, and averse to our interests, and who will, probably, serpent-like, when warmed in our bosom, pour the deadly poison into our veins.

One of the most useful maxims that any statesman can lay down for his government, is that one which admonishes him not lightly to disturb any settled course of policy, but to turn aside legislation from its accustomed channels, without some overruling necessity; and, when great interests have been engrafted on the measures of the Government, to adhere steadily to them, until time and experience shall bring their results to prove what true wisdom requires of us. This maxim, acted out, will negative the amendment; and acted out I solemnly believe it can be, with the fullest and most sincere regard to the interests of those opposed to the protection system, for I do not despair of satisfying even some of them that the injuries they charge us with inflicting on them are not wrongs, but misfortunes growing out of causes beyond their and our control. For a series of years, but particularly since 1816, the policy of the country has been regarded as fixed; act after act has proclaimed to the world, and to those immediately under our Government, and subject to its regulations and restrictions, that we would encourage the growth of what our various climates would yield, and the making of what the industry and skill, the ingenuity and enterprise, of our fellow-citizens could furnish. To them a cheering voice has been extended, that gently whispered the persuasive language of our early measures, which has been gradually increasing its volume since, until, in our late, and, as I think, happier day, we have spoken in a tone so loud and strong, as to reach every settlement and hamlet, and to invite all whose means, whose habits, whose pursuits and interests might be thereby bettered, to embark upon the voyage, which it was calculated would return the adventure risked, many fold increased. They have listened to the invitation, and have not been deceived; all that was predicted of the golden harvest, has been realized. Millions of money, and millions of human beings, hang upon the hitherto unbroken faith of the Government, pledged by the various laws alluded to. The entire country, north and east, and a portion of that west of this spot, depend, for all of competence and comfort that belong to them, on the preservation of the present system. And here let me request honorable gentlemen to disabuse their minds of the idea that manufacturers are the lords of the land, the aristocrats of the country, who, rioting in prosperity, refuse to relieve the poverty and distress they create but do not feel—whose thirst for wealth even the sufferings of their fellow-citizens cannot allay, and who, it would have accorded well with the opinions of some gentlemen to have said, feasted like vultures upon their prey, with a voracity of appetite that refused to be satiated—who live upon groans and misery, and smile while the writhings of agony, and the distortion of despair, are turned imploringly to them. They are (excepting a few men of wealth, not so numerous, I presume, as those in the same circumstances among their more fortunate brethren, of the South) gentlemen of small moneyed capital, but possessing an abundant one of skill and industry, and enterprise and character, who, so far from having found the mines of Potosi in their manufactories, require to be upheld by the fostering hand of Government, without which they must sink. They, I say it with great respect, and without disparagement, are equal in all regards to their southern friends who pursue different occupations. They acknowledge no superiors, nor do they arrogate to themselves the right of dictating to their fellow-citizens. They do not send gentlemen to this Hall, as the honorable member from South Carolina [Mr. McDUFFEE] alleged, who, instead of representing the intelligence, and integrity, and patriotism of their districts, stand forward as the champions of capitalists and their interests. The gentleman is wide of the fact. I thank God that moneyed interests have no such influence in our elections as he seems to suppose. Two cotton factories, if I understood the gentleman right, would, in his opinion, control the elections of his district, in despite of himself and every man in it. I cannot dispute with him about what he is necessarily well acquainted with. It must be so. I cannot but conclude his remark is just of South Carolina; I know it is not of Pennsylvania—I do not believe it is of any State north or east of it. In my own district there are about ten manufactories for the production of iron, as many of woollen and cotton articles of various kinds, a number of which yield to the public use and convenience every kind of iron implements, extensive distilleries, &c., and yet I have never heard, nor do I believe, nor do I think one man in the district believes, that these establishments enable their proprietors to exercise any undue influence in elections; certain it is, they have never controlled them, for, with few exceptions, they have always been in the minority. No, sir, without intending the slightest disrespect to any one, I must be permitted to say, that, however inferior we may be in capacity to serve the country, we will yield to none in purity of intention, and directness of purpose. We mean to advance the interest of this people, and will try to effect it. I will here further remark (for this part of the debate is disagreeable, and I should find no pleasure in recurring to it, but am desirous of disposing of it as quick as possible) that it is said no man could be elected President of the United States who was believed to be opposed to the protecting policy: without answering the proposition after the New England mode, as I might very justly do, by asking if a gentleman friendly to the policy mentioned would receive the votes of the anti-tariff States, I will say that I know of no method of determining the choice of this high functionary, so proper as that which shall base it upon his principles and opinions in reference to leading questions; it is the only foundation upon which any statesman can act with safety; but I would not confine myself exclusively to this ground of preference. The man must be joined to the principle—principles and men are the true ground. Give me a man of the principles and opinions I approve, and I will sustain him, provided he be such a one as I can rely upon to carry them into action. Upon what else shall we rest, to assure us that our selection is judicious and wise? Upon personal preference alone? Never. When you meet with sentiments and principles, and for their sake love the individual in whose character they are embodied, confide in him—elevate him—exalt him to the point whence they shall be drawn into exercise, like so many radii from the centre to the periphery of the circle, giving strength, and vigor, and health, and life to the entire community—sustaining all through whom they pass, even to the uttermost point of the circumference.

What, I ask gentlemen, and I request them to reflect seriously upon it, what would be thought of any Government that would lead its citizens to embark in any project—that would induce them to engage in a particular course of business by its persuasions, by its acts, by its words, and then coldly abandon them to a fate which it had made inevitable, by withdrawing the pillar that upheld them? Might not they, or one of them, hold the following language to a Government thus fitful and giddy: “I was engaged in a pursuit that would not sustain me: I was about to abandon it, and give my attention to some one more profitable, but you interfered, and lured me to my ruin. You not only counselled me to persevere, but, by your promises of assistance, induced me to enlarge my expenses; nay, more, you assisted me for a season, and when I had every reason to suppose that your aid would be at least continued, if not increased, you withdrew your friendly hand, and suffered me to sink to a depth infinitely lower than that at which you found me.”

The duty on cotton cloths has varied but little. In 1816, it was fixed at twenty-five per centum ad valorem for three years; and twenty per centum afterwards, while those fabrics composed of cotton, or of which it was the chief component part, (with the exception of nankeens,) that did not exceed, with the addition of twenty per centum if imported from or beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and of ten per centum if from any other place, twenty-five cents per square yard, were to be taken as worth twenty-five cents, and charged accordingly. The law of 1824 varied this no further than to extend the fixed or legal price to thirty cents, nor was any other alteration made by the act of 1828, than to place this statutory value at thirty-five cents. Throughout all this period, the sum at which cotton twist, yarn, or thread was rated, has remained exactly the same. This branch of the system surely cannot be justly complained of, the increase has been too trifling to be felt, and the price of cotton was high and satisfactory, I believe, after at least two of these laws were passed, as I shall presently show.

The iron business is next in order, and is as important as any occupation in our country, diffusing itself rapidly; and, if the present system is adhered to, calculated to be as extensively useful as any pursuit that can engage the attention of our fellow-citizens. Something was absolutely necessary to be done in maintenance of this interest; the law of 1816 was of no benefit; the act of 1824, of some, comparatively, but still inadequate; that of 1828, if enforced according to its spirit and meaning, will probably answer the end designed. That this species of manufacture was a losing concern before 1828, is certain; now it affords a moderate remuneration only for the capital employed, and labor bestowed; and, while it does so, no man is injured, for the price of iron remains as low as formerly, I mean American iron. How is this? The foreign article is in a great measure excluded, our own citizens have the market, and by their competition keep down the price, which will be still further reduced by the new and rising factories. Our own product, which is better suited to most purposes, is now lower than it has been at some periods heretofore, because, in addition to the competition, the price of labor, of provisions, of every thing that enters into the manufacture, is reduced. Admit the foreign iron on equal, or nearly equal footing, and the grinding oppression of European Governments, which wrings from the brow of industry the sweat of a bare subsistence, which expresses from the heart of shivering poverty almost its last drop of blood, will not be confined to their own miserable subjects, but be made to extend in its operation, to reach indirectly to our firesides, and to bear upon my friends and countrymen. To this I will never assent.

The duty upon wool and woollen goods is next brought under review. This, too, is a great interest, affecting in its ramifications almost every class of the community. The wool, which the farmer grows, sunk, between 1825 and 1828, from forty to fifty per cent. The depreciation was owing to the low price of cloths. This circumstance also puts it out of the power of the manufacturer to give more than a certain sum for the raw material. To give any value to the imposition of a duty, it became obviously necessary to furnish the farmer a market for his wool, which could only be done by taxing the importation of foreign cloth. They must go together, or neither is useful. If you say to the foreigner, you shall not sell your articles in our country, unless you pay for the privilege, you enable your own manufacturing citizens to become the purchasers of what your farmers can produce; and thus each branch of industry flourishes by the aid it receives from, and affords to, the other; nor are the rights of any infringed. An unnatural effort was made in 1826, 1827, by those whose rivals we are, at the sacrifice of vast sums, to prostrate our infant manufactories: in other instances, the sacrifices were made to save themselves from impending ruin; for a season, it might, therefore, appear that our home prices were enhanced; but I firmly believe, if you could annihilate every manufactory in the country, you would pay more for your consumption than you now do. The importer would be without competition, and fix his own price.

Sir, the manufacturing districts furnish the best market the grain-growing States have. The flour of Pennsylvania and Maryland, New York and Ohio, is sold in greater quantity there than anywhere else. The corn of Maryland and Virginia finds its way there; and I am informed, as a proof of it, that five hundred thousand bushels of it were purchased in the little town of Providence alone, in one, I believe, the last year. And in connexion with this, let me say, if you allow foreign spirits, or, what is the same thing, spirits made of foreign materials, to come into competition with our domestic distillation, you prostrate all the midland farmers, who can now scarcely live.

Sir, these, the stamina of your country, are pining and struggling, but they are a patient and enduring class of men, who hope for better and brighter times, which will never shine upon them if the amendment shall prevail.

I beg the attention of the committee to the sentiments and views of one of the many vigorous minds that gave shape and form to our institutions. I refer to the reasoning of the first Secretary of the Treasury, who, in a prophetic spirit, and with a power of intellect that gives almost irresistible force to his opinions, in the year 1791, met and refuted, if not every one, almost all of the arguments now urged. I read from the report on manufactures of the late General Hamilton, of the 5th December, 1791:

"The remaining objections to a particular encouragement of manufactures in the United States, now require to be examined.

"One of these turns on the proposition, that industry, if left to itself, will naturally find its way to the most useful and profitable employment. Whence it is inferred that manufactures, without the aid of Government, will grow up as soon and as fast as the natural state of things, and the interest of the community, may require.

"Against the solidity of this hypothesis, in the full latitude of the terms, very cogent reasons may be offered. These have relation to the strong influence of habit, and the spirit of imitation, the fear of want of success in untried enterprises, the intrinsic difficulties incident to the first essays towards competition with those who have previously attained to perfection in the business to be attempted, the bounties, premiums, and other artificial encouragements, with which foreign nations second the exertions of their own citizens in the branches in which they are to be rivalled.

"Experience teaches that men are often so much governed by what they are accustomed to see and practise, that the simplest and most obvious improvements, in the most ordinary occupations, are adopted with hesitation, reluctance, and by slow gradations. The spontaneous transition to new pursuits, in a community long habituated to different ones, may be expected to be attended with proportionably greater difficulty. When former occupations ceased to yield a profit adequate to the subsistence of their followers, or when there was an absolute deficiency of employment in them, owing to the superabundance of hands, changes would ensue, but these changes would be likely to be more tardy than might consist with the interest either of individuals or of the society. In many cases, they would not happen while a bare support could be ensured, by an adherence to ancient courses, though a resort to more profitable employment might be practicable. To produce the desirable changes as early as may be expedient, may, therefore, require the incitement and patronage of Government.

"The apprehension of failing in new attempts is, perhaps, a more serious impediment. There are dispositions apt to be attracted by the mere novelty of an undertaking; but these are not always those best calculated to give it success. To this it is of importance that the confidence of cautious, sagacious capitalists, both citizens and foreigners, should be excited. And to inspire this description of persons with confidence, it is essential that they should be made to see, in any project which is new, and for that reason alone, if for no other, precarious, the prospect of such a degree of countenance and support from Government, as may be capable of overcoming the obstacles inseparable from the first experiments.

"The superiority antecedently enjoyed by nations who have pre-occupied and perfected a branch of industry, constitutes a more formidable obstacle than either of those which have been mentioned, to the introduction of the same branch into a country in which it did not before exist. To maintain between the recent establishments of our country, and the long matured establishment of another country, a competition upon equal terms, both as to quality and price, is, in most cases, impracticable. The disparity in the one, or in the other, or in both, must necessarily be so considerable, as to forbid a successful rivalry, without the extraordinary aid and protection of Government.

"But the greatest obstacle of all, to the successful prosecution of a new branch of industry in a country in which it was before unknown, consists, as far as the instances apply, in the bounties, premiums, and other aids, which are granted in a variety of cases by the nations in which the establishments to be imitated are previously introduced. It is well known (and particular examples, in the course of this report, will be cited) that certain nations grant bounties on the exportation of particular commodities, to enable their own workmen to undersell and supplant all competitors, in the countries to which those commodities are sent. Hence the undertakers of a new manufacture have to contend, not only with the natural disadvantages of a new undertaking, but with the gratuities and remunerations which other Governments bestow. To be enabled to contend with success, it is evident that the interference and aid of their own Governments are indispensable.

"Combinations by those engaged in a particular branch of business, in one country, to frustrate the first efforts to introduce it into another, by temporary sacrifices, recompensed, perhaps, by extraordinary indemnifications of the Government of such country, are believed to have existed, and are not to be regarded as destitute of probability. The existence or assurance of aid from the Government of the country in which the business is to be introduced, may be essential to fortify adventurers against the dread of such combinations, to defeat their effects, if formed, and to prevent their being formed, by demonstrating that they must, in the end, prove fruitless.

"Whatever room there may be for an expectation that the industry of a people, under the direction of private interest, will, upon equal terms, find out the most beneficial employment for itself, there is none for a reliance that it will struggle against the force of unequal terms, or will, of itself, surmount all the adventitious barriers to a successful competition, which may have been erected, either by the advantages naturally acquired from practice, previous possession of the ground, or by those which may have sprung from position, regulations, and an artificial policy. This general reflection might alone suffice as an answer to the objection under examination, exclusively of the weighty considerations which have been particularly urged."

Again: "There remains to be noticed an objection to the encouragement of manufactures, of a nature different from those which question the probability of success. This is derived from its supposed tendency to give a monopoly of advantages to particular classes, at the expense of the rest of the community, who, it is affirmed, would be able to procure the requisite supplies of manufactured articles on better terms from foreigners than from our own citizens; and who, it is alleged, are reduced to the necessity of paying an enhanced price for whatever they want, by every measure which obstructs the free competition of foreign commodities.

"It is not an unreasonable supposition, that measures which serve to abridge the free competition of foreign articles, have a tendency to occasion an enhancement of prices; and it is not to be denied that such is the effect in a number of cases; but the fact does not uniformly correspond with the theory. A reduction of prices has, in several instances, immediately succeeded the establishment of a domestic manufacture. Whether it be that foreign manufacturers endeavor to supplant, by underselling our own, or whatever else be the cause, the effect has been such as is stated, and the reverse of what might have been expected.

"But though it were true that the immediate and certain effect of regulations controlling, the competition of foreign with domestic fabrics, was an increase of price, it is universally true that the contrary is the ultimate effect of every successful manufacture. When a domestic manufacture has attained to perfection, and has engaged in the prosecution of it a competent number of persons, it invariably becomes cheaper. Being free from the heavy charges which attend the importation of foreign commodities, it can be afforded, and accordingly seldom or never fails to be sold, cheaper, in process of time, than was the foreign article for which it is a substitute. The internal competition which takes place, soon drives every thing like monopoly, and, by degrees, reduces the price of the article to the minimum of a reasonable profit on the capital employed. This accords with the reason of the thing, and with experience.

"Whence it follows that it is the interest of a community, with a view to eventual and permanent economy, to encourage the growth of manufactures. In a national view, a temporary enhancement of price must always be well compensated by a permanent reduction of it.

"It is a reflection which may, with propriety, be indulged here, that this eventual diminution of the prices of manufactured articles, which is the result of internal manufacturing establishments, has a direct and very important tendency to benefit agriculture. It enables the farmer to procure, with a smaller quantity of his labor, the manufactured produce of which he stands in need, and, consequently, increases the value of his income and property."

These are the opinions of forty years ago—uttered by an individual, who, without the aid of experience, looked, nevertheless, deeply into futurity; and, by anticipation, met and repudiated the favorite doctrines of the present day. Among the many evidences of the reach of the surpassing talents of Alexander Hamilton, I know of no testimony more decided and conclusive, than the report, a part of which I have brought to my assistance.

Let us inquire into the reasons urged for the adoption of the amendment submitted. On this part of the controversy I enter upon very unequal terms; he, whose address I listened to with the greatest pleasure, as I always do to every thing that proceeds from him, [Mr. McDUFFIE] is well known to the nation as talented and patriotic; the force of argument is accorded by many to his assertions; while I, an humble individual, unknown out of this House, and to many within it, can scarcely hope that due weight will be given to what I may feebly urge: but I go onward with perfect confidence, not in myself, but in the strength and justice of the cause I advocate. Entertaining, as I do, the most exalted respect for the distinguished gentleman referred to, I request that, if a single word has inadvertently escaped me, which can be supposed to cast the faintest shadow of disparagement upon him, or those associated with him in opinion, I may be credited for sincerity, when I say no such intention was conceived by me.

Sir, the basis of the honorable gentleman's argument is the assumption that the consumer does not pay the duty, but that the producer of the article for which the importations are exchanged, is the person upon whom the tax falls. If this idea is delusive, and can be justified by no sound reason—if the substratum has not firmness enough to sustain the superstructure, the whole edifice must totter and tumble "from turret to foundation stone." It is said two-thirds of the States produce little, comparatively, for exportation, and that almost all the materials for our trade with foreign countries grow upon the remaining third. For the sake of argument, admit it. If the producing section imports all, as, according to the reasoning, it is assumed it does, are not the other sections dependent upon it? If the crop fails, or if it is desirable not to sell it, but to keep it for a more favorable price, how are our wants to be supplied? For it seems we cannot furnish our own luxuries or comforts, or necessities, because, exporting almost nothing, we can import only in the same proportion. If this be so, does it not furnish a good reason, if no other existed, for our course of policy? The southern citizens say, your system is death to us: this we do not believe; but, if we did, might say its abolition would be our destruction; and shall we not, being two-thirds, take such measures as we are assured our safety requires? Would it not be suicidal in us to place ourselves in this situation—this state of dependence has been removed, and shall we not continue independent? I do not mean absolutely, for we are all dependent upon each other to some extent, and will find our true interest in exchanging our productions and commodities: but shall we not be permitted to supply our own wants—to take care of ourselves? Shall eight millions of people yield themselves to the government of four, and place themselves in dependence upon them? The exports, it is argued, pay the imports. Admit it, for a moment, in its broadest sense, and suppose the tariff to be abolished, and manufactories to be annihilated, what would be the operation of this state of things on Pennsylvania? It will be admitted that the consumption in the several States is in the proportion of their population; that of Pennsylvania is about one million and a half. Goods are now imported to an amount between sixty and seventy millions of dollars; her proportion of which would be about eight millions, which she must pay for; but she has few exports to pay with—what is to be done? Cash must be given for them. Could she exist ten years in this condition? But, sir, it would be greatly worse: repeal the tariff—the manufactories go down, and foreign articles will be imported to twice the extent they now are. Pennsylvania would have to pay sixteen millions in money for her goods: how long could this be borne? This argument I consider fair, sir, for the whole reasoning spread before us on the other side is founded on the misery of the South, alleged to be produced by the present system. How much worse, then, would be our condition, if the wishes of the planting States could be gratified? Now, the American manufactories furnish us with a great deal of what we want, and, in return, we give them our productions which we cannot export. Labor is the element of wealth. Ingenuity, skill, professional ability, &c. may occasion its transfer, but labor in the field, in the mechanic arts, in manufactures, is the source of it, and lies at the bottom of all our prosper-

erty; it is a common stock, and does not belong to the North or the South, the East or the West, but to all. It creates an ability to consume, and this ability it is which is taxed, and not the labor producing it. The ability, which is invariably followed by the disposition to consume, pays the duty; and as that ability is small or great, so will be the purchases of those articles in common use where a man lives. And here lies the fallacy of the argument. If the producer was his own merchant, who sold his own crop in Liverpool, and thence imported articles which he himself consumed, or which he and his neighbors exclusively used, the argument would be difficult to resist; no, it would not, for then, indeed, he would be the consumer, and in that capacity pay the duty. But, what, sir, is the course of trade? He sells his crop to his merchant in Augusta, in Charleston, in Savannah, in Nashville, in Orleans, in Natchez, in Huntsville, who pays for it, either in an account for merchandise furnished the planter, or in money, or in both, and carries it to New York or Philadelphia, to pay for articles he has obtained there; or he exports it to Liverpool himself. Either way the contract is at an end as soon as the cotton is disposed of, and the duty enters not into the contract. The merchant in Liverpool buys it without reference to our internal regulations, for the Liverpool market is not expanded or restricted by American impositions, but by the trade of England with the world. She gets cotton from Egypt, Brazil, the East and West Indies, and exports her cotton fabrics to various countries—in very diminished quantities to us, for we not only supply ourselves with many articles we want, but enter into competition with her in several markets. A different merchant makes the purchases for importation; or if he be, as he sometimes is, the same individual, the contract is made on an entirely new footing; the goods are brought into the United States, the duties paid or bonded; they are added to the price of the goods, and a per centum put on the whole, which he who eats, or drinks, or wears, must pay. This, sir, when Americans do their own business, as they ought always to, but very seldom do; but when foreigners import for us, as we have seen they generally do, the course is totally different. The cotton is shipped, and sold at Liverpool, the money for it unpaid—a supercargo soon after arrives at New York with a ship-load of goods, which are sold at auction; and how are they paid for? Not in money, but in bills of exchange drawn upon London or Liverpool, and a per centum is put upon the auction purchase, without reference to the duties, which, of course, the consumer pays; unless, indeed, where the foreign agents are the package or piece merchants, when all they cannot manage the Government out of, forms a part of the price.

What has the producer to do with all this? Nothing, if we except his factor, in the first instance. But, sir, what I regard as conclusive on this subject, is the fact that cotton is as high, nay, higher, than it was in 1827, and that it was higher in 1825 than in 1824.

What just ground of complaint is here? None. The southern planter gets his price, a reduced one from that which preceded it, and was received prior to 1818, 1819, I agree, but as much as he has latterly been accustomed to, and pays a duty on what it is his pleasure to consume, which costs him less than the same indulgence did before the duties were imposed.

We have been asked repeatedly, what does Pennsylvania pay, what do other manufacturing States pay? It has been said they pay nothing. Pennsylvania pays more than the honorable gentleman's [Mr. McDuffrie] own State; her consumption, which cannot be easily ascertained, fixes her contributions to the treasury in this particular: as she chooses to use, so she is bound to pay; so does she pay. It is, in my judgment, as impossible to maintain that the producer pays the duty, as to shut out the light of heaven from the earth.

But the inequality of distribution is made an objection to the collection of duties. If it be an evil, it does not lessen the propriety or value of the system that raises them. This ground of complaint is easily removed. I will as cheerfully join to appropriate money to proper objects south as north of Norfolk; but, I think, with great respect I say it, that this exception comes with rather a bad grace from the quarter that furnishes it. Do not all the objections to internal improvements, and to appropriations generally, proceed from the gentlemen with whom I am now contending? Where is the mass of negative votes on such questions to be found? Every one who hears me, knows. As to this complaint, I would say, gentlemen, the remedy is with yourselves.

Fault is found with a statement made by the then Secretary of the Treasury, two years ago, in which he was made to say that domestic production and commerce had increased more in the four preceding years, than they had done in the same number preceding 1824. Was it not so? It is, I believe, admitted, but the honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McDuffrie] states that the whole increase was in cotton: I think this is a mistake. Every thing that the industry and labor of man can produce, has increased immensely. Cotton is now, I believe, double in quantity what it was at any time within the last eight years, and it was for the last two years less than in 1827. Besides, the field for its cultivation is prodigiously enlarged: Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Tennessee, and North Carolina now produce it. I speak in reference to the quantity from the exports, having no means of ascertaining our domestic consumption, which, for my present purpose, I suppose to remain about the same; if it has increased, then an additional argument is furnished for encouraging home industry.

For every million of British goods excluded, you destroy, it is said, a market for two or three millions of domestic fabrics. How is this operation brought about? That it is a correct position, I cannot admit; and it can be only partially so on the assumption that domestic articles will not be bought and consumed by those who dislike the system. They have a right to abstain from the use of them; and, if it be their pleasure to do so, let no man complain.

But the same strong hand has placed before us the constitutional difficulty, that we have no authority to impose the existing duties. The power to lay taxes and imposts is conceded; but it is alleged that this is an effort at destroying commerce, under the pretence of exercising the constitutional power of regulating it. Sir, it is not destroyed. By the annihilation of commerce, I understand a sweeping of it from the ocean, an inhibition of your merchants to trade, or your ships to make their traceless way. The embargo, it is rightly said, was constitutional and legal, because its object was the ultimate preservation of that commerce, which, for a season, is restrained—but does the operation of existing laws restrain it? By how many fewer are your ships, how much less is your tonnage than it was before 1824? The American vessels employed in foreign trade were more numerous in 1826, than they had been since 1806-1807, and more numerous than they ever were, except in those two years; those engaged in the coasting trade have been gradually increasing, and are greater than they have ever been, and the two combined furnish more tonnage than has been owned at any previous period. For the last three years (including 1829) our tonnage has been on the increase. How that can be supposed to be destroyed which is growing, I do not know. But southern commerce, we are informed, is diminished. If it be so, it must be in a confined sense, that is, it must be meant that the business of Charleston, and other maritime places, is lessened. Taking it for granted, sir, it is no more than has befallen Philadelphia, and Baltimore, and Boston; New York has become the centre of capital and commercial activity, and swallowed up, from her superior natural advantages, all the business of her neighboring and rival towns. But, sir, if, as has been alleged in a report of a standing committee of this House, of which the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELEN] is chairman, the British shipping in our trade has increased latterly, it is to be accounted for, in a great measure, by the abolition of the discriminating duty that formerly existed between our vessels and those of Britain. But I do not admit the fact, the examination I have been able to give this subject having led me to a different result. I have endeavored to show, from documents,* that our commerce on the ocean has not diminished but increased. I am, however, unwilling to take this limited view of our interests. Commerce, in its more extended sense, embracing internal as well as external trade, is, of all others, the topic I would have selected to prove that our present prosperity is unequalled. On the Ohio and the Mississippi, business has, since 1822-'23, increased two hundred per centum. A statement from Mr. Henry, the engineer at Louisville, Kentucky, dated January, 1830, and sent here in respect of the Louisville canal, shows that seventy thousand tons of property descended the rivers named, eight years ago, from the country above the falls: now the property which they float to New Orleans, from the same districts, counts two hundred and twelve thousand tons, more than two hundred per centum of an increase in seven years. Was any thing equal to this ever before heard of? The tonnage on these rivers amounts to fifty or sixty thousand tons. Look at the North river trade, greater perhaps, than that of the West—the Erie canal—the Chesapeake and Delaware canal, and the property they carry, and believe not your country is languishing, or that your policy is unpropitious to its best interests. Besides all this, every man knows that the land carriage, in the middle States particularly, has more than doubled within a few years. That local depression does exist occasionally everywhere, is certain; there may be temporary disease in a member of the body politic, as in the natural body, but the general action of the system is healthful and vigorous.

But the honorable gentleman [Mr. McDUFFIE] asks, triumphantly, if any State would bestow a bounty on manufactures within its limits; and informs us that he has put this question before, and that a most discreet silence was uniformly observed. It was not answered, I am sure; but I am equally certain that discretion could not have forbidden a reply. Does not the sagacious gentleman perceive that such a measure would be worse than useless? that the bounty given would be a bounty for the benefit of the citizens in the neighboring States, whose manufactures would be undersold by those receiving the bounty, and that the advantage could not be confined to the citizens of one State? Such a course would bring you back to the old confederacy. Where such bounties could be useful, they have been given. I will instance, in my own State, the case of agricultural societies in counties, in whose hands funds were placed, to be distributed in premiums to those who should produce the greatest quantity of wheat or corn on an acre of ground—raise the best horse—the most valuable ox, &c.

I must be permitted to say, sir, that the gentleman is mistaken when he supposes ten men are injured for one that is benefited; all feel and know they are benefited. A furnace or a forge is the market for six or eight miles around it; a few establishments in a town or village give life and animation to all in its vicinity. This system of manufactures has raised us from the dust: as yet our condition is low, but we hope to recover from it. The gentleman's country is not more reduced in means, or more embarrassed, than mine has been. Its distress is owing to the same causes. Universal peace succeeded to widespread war; the multitudes that had been abstracted from ordinary occupations to military life, were restored to civil pursuits; and the change of condition, positive and relative, that took place all over the world, enabled each nation to put into action all its force for meeting the demand upon it for supplies; the price of labor, of provisions, of every thing, was cheapened in proportion as they were increased; and this depreciation, resulting from these circumstances, is the true cause of the suffering that has pervaded the whole country. Here, in South Carolina, as in Pennsylvania, must be sought the reason of embarrassment and difficulty; and if the gentleman will substitute southern products, while I trace the history of my State, that of his own may be read. Sir, before and during the war, and up to 1818 and 1819, we were prosperous beyond the wildest anticipations of the imagination, in her deepest and most luxurious twilight revels. The most sensible among us were inconsiderate. Ten, twelve, fourteen dollars per barrel for flour, and one hundred dollars per acre for land, induced expenses not disproportioned, certainly, to existing incomes; and if the money only had been expended, it would have been of comparatively little consequence; but we dissipated economical habits, we acquired new modes of thought and action, made large debts, and, worse than all, children had grown up with educations unfitting them to bear becomingly the sad reverse that awaited them and theirs, and overtook them between 1813 and 1825. Sir, after the former year, our products would not yield a third; our flour was as low as three dollars and fifty cents, and never higher than six to seven dollars, averaging, during all the time that has followed, about four dollars and twenty-five cents to four dollars and fifty cents; and land that would have brought one hundred dollars, not selling for more than twenty to thirty dollars. It is within my own personal knowledge, that real estate has been frequently so sacrificed. Can any distress exceed this? Property has changed hands, and without the satisfaction of paying a man's debts. Sir, I knew a case of this kind—a farmer of great respectability and worth inherited from his ancestor, or received by his will, a large plantation: in the rage for speculation, about 1815, 1816, he purchased a farm near him; the depreciation of property and produce compelled him to borrow a great part of the money to meet his contract; interest increased his debt, until, finally, his purchase and his inheritance were both sold, and were insufficient to discharge the debt incurred. Can any case be more deplorable than that one? It is hard, sir, grievously hard, to suffer the deprivations of poverty. It is a bitter draught to accommodate yourself and family to the altered condition of things: it makes the heart bleed, to deprive a wife and children of their accustomed enjoyments, and many a pang heaves, unseen, the bosom of a feeling, unfortunate man; but misery belongs to our race, and his manliness is not the less commendable for bearing without a murmur, and unknown, tortures which he communicates to those around him only so far as may be necessary to produce conformity to the new state of his affairs. All this has been seen and felt in my own district. We are only emerging from its horrors. Many of my constituents cultivate with their own hands, and those of their families, farms off from one to two hundred acres of land; incurring no expense that can be avoided, they are obliged to practise rigid economy to sustain themselves. By this course, they will surmount all difficulties, and, by a similar one, South Carolina will reach the same goal. By patience, industry, and economy, any adverse current of pecuniary affairs can be stayed; and, by an adaptation of habits to circumstances, happiness and enjoyment may be found as readily and frequently in moderate competence, as in abounding and overflowing wealth.

The argument most pressed by the honorable mover of the amendment [Mr. McDUFFIE] is, that the measures now in force are tyrannical, and adopted without right. Sir, no man, or set of men, can lawfully play a tyrannous part, or, without warrant, coerce the observance of particular rules. Tyranny is odious, and not to be patiently endured in any shape; nor is it very material whether the oppression be inflicted by one or many. Nay, further, I will agree that the definition of despotism given is an apt one. "It is a Government in which the will of those on whom the laws operate is not consulted." Who ever before heard of a despotism—of the destroying oppression of a minority by a majority, in a Government of which the very essence is that the majority shall rule? Was it ever before asserted that the very life-giving principle itself—the ingredient which gives all its value to our connexion, and without which, it would be a mass of inert matter, that could be put in motion only by some corrupting and corroding principle, that would degrade and debase us into a fit condition for such rule, is, in its operation, in its fair and legitimate exercise, made productive of tyranny? Shall it be admitted for an instant that a minority are to rule? Never. The majority must govern; and is any conviction wrought, that, in so doing, they are the tyrants they have been depicted? I think not. Sir, keeping within the pale of the constitution, they have the exclusive right to prescribe what shall, or shall not, be done; if you pass that boundary, you are without all rules. One would, indeed, think that the honorable gentleman's constituents had no share in the legislation of the country; so far from it, they are as ably, perhaps more ably, represented than any portion of these United States. He takes a useful, an instructive part in many of the measures determined here; but shall not the majority, differing from him, exercise and act upon their own judgments? He will at once, with his high and liberal mind, answer in the affirmative. I say, further, they are the judges of what is lawful or not. I speak not now of judicial tribunals, but refer only to the powers of a majority in connexion with the rights of a minority. It is conceded the majority may do as they will with what is their own, but not so with what belongs to the minority. Sir, there is no separate and distinct meum et tuum here; we enter this room as representatives of the whole; whatever we do, reaches over all; laws stop not at rivers or mountains; but, for the purposes of legislation, the territory and property of the country are common stock. In the prescription of rules and regulations which affect them, each member must be heard, may persuade and convince if he can, but, failing, is bound by the decision. Nor does the gentleman's definition of despotism, although intrinsically correct, help his argument; for it is only applicable where the subject of the laws has no lot or part in enacting them. Has he none? Are not his constituents, through him, consulted? He and they are portions of the body politic, as well entitled, but not better entitled, than others, to his and their share in legislation.

I adjure gentlemen, in a spirit of kindness and good feeling, to look around: to ask themselves what earthly motive the majority can have for doing them wrong. For myself, I know I have no desire but, according to the humble measure of my judgment, to advance my country's interest. I believe no honorable gentleman on either side has any other purpose. Let us, then, like brethren, bear and forbear much—enduring the evils that arise out of our nature and the condition of things—hoping for other days and better times, and not add at this, almost the hour of parting, the distress of wounded feelings, and the deep-seated pain of poignant regrets, to the sorrow that every patriotic bosom already acknowledges, at our difference of sentiment on the great national question before the committee.

Mr. BARNWELL said, he should offer no apology for the remarks which he should address to the committee. I am aware [said Mr. B.] that, upon this subject, the ruling majority desire to hear neither argument nor complaint. They have indicated their pleasure by acts too palpable to allow me even to affect ignorance.

If this new burden could have been imposed upon us in silence; if this bill of pains and penalties could have been passed into a law, and every expression of indignation and remonstrance from those whose ruin it must have consummated, could have been suppressed, it would have been done.

Power has become so absolute, that the language of free remonstrance grates harshly upon its ear: the tone in which those who have not quite relinquished the hope of freedom, assert their wrongs, and demand their rights, is called menace, and denounced as rebellious. We must be pardoned, sir; we come of a race which fought for liberty, which, by deeds, proved its devotion to the cause. The forms in which they transmitted it to us, have not yet lost their charms; the rough smack of the language of freemen still lingers upon our tongue. For myself, sir, representing the people which I do, feeling that their all is at stake, I were recreant, did I not speak boldly before I gave it up.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Davis] has asked why it is that my colleague, [Mr. McDUFFIE] deserting the old ground of argument, has endeavored to make manifest the unequal and oppressive operation of the tariff system upon distinct sections of the country. As the course of my own argument will be similar to the one pursued by my colleague, I feel myself called upon to answer this inquiry. Upon this floor, I bear the character of a legislator for the Union, as well as a representative of South Carolina; I acknowledge the obligation which this double relation to the American people imposes upon me. I am not permitted to exert the influence which my station may confer, to excite discontent, or to stir up dangerous dissensions. Why, then, shall I confine my observations chiefly to the oppression of the South? This is my answer. From 1820, when first the dangerous tendency of the restrictive system became apparent, the southern statesmen, assisted by many of distinguished ability from other sections of the country, have not ceased to contend against it. We believe that they have demonstrated the illegality and oppressiveness of this scheme of policy, which, while it bestowed partial and delusive favors on a few monopolists, imposes a grievous tax upon the laboring portion of the community. But, sir, the monopolists have triumphed. A majority of the representatives in Congress have declared their determination to adhere to this system of taxation, as beneficial to those whom they represent. Our appeal to the interest of the nation has been made in vain: taxation is declared to be a benefit, and new modes of expenditure are devised to perpetuate it. We now assume a bolder tone; we strike a higher chord: we place before you one broad and fertile section of your country, withering beneath the blighting effects of your policy. We show you a people struggling against the ruin which your legislation brings upon them, and struggling in vain—a people, united by common suffering and common interest, here, at home, in their legislative assemblies, at their public meetings, uttering one common voice of deep-settled indignation at the injustice of your taxation. And who are the people upon whose forbearance you press thus heavily? upon whose submissiveness you calculate thus securely? Sir, the very memory of the past must be destroyed, ere this people shall permanently and quietly endure illegal taxation. They annually commemorate the wisdom and the fortitude of those who struggled successfully against the overwhelming power of the mother country: can they forget the cause? They have been bred in a school which teaches them that there are but three gradations which bring a freeman to the station of a slave—to feel that he is oppressed, to believe that oppression to be illegal, and to submit to it. They have the reality of injury, and they cannot doubt. They are deeply convinced that you have no authority to inflict the injury; they now behold the dawn of that day of submission, that day which takes from manhood half its virtue. It may be that an eye which has intensely gazed upon the heroic lineaments of the ancestors, has transferred a delusive resemblance to the features of their descendants; yet I will not permit myself to believe, nor will I suffer you so far to deceive yourselves, as to imagine, that this people will submit. All the offices of patriotism they have, and will perform. If evil result from the assertion of their rights, and the protection of their property, let those answer for it who would break them down to unconditional subjection. The true issue now is, will you relieve the southern people from this unequal oppression, or will you compel them to relieve themselves?

I have said, sir, that this system is unequal, and that it fixed upon the southern and southwestern States an intolerable burden of taxation.

I will now adduce the arguments by which I hope to maintain my position. The revenue of this country, about twenty-four millions of dollars, is derived from a tax upon the exchanges of foreign commerce. Of the products which constitute the American portion of this exchange, about three millions of people, inhabiting the south and southwestern sections of the country, are the producers of nearly thirty-seven millions of dollars. The remaining seventeen millions of dollars is the produce of the labor of three-fourths of the people of this Union, inhabiting the northern and eastern sections of this country. Whatever portion of the tax is thrown upon the producer, must necessarily press most unequally upon the different sections of the Union. I am aware that political economists have laid it down as an axiom that the consumer pays the tax; and although I do not entirely assent to this proposition, yet I shall not, at present, attempt to disprove its general applicability. It will suffice that I demonstrate that the financial system of this country reverses the order of nature, and throws the burden upon the producer. First, by heavy taxation and unequal distribution, production is made to press upon consumption, and the producer is unable to throw the tax upon the consumer. It cannot be expected that I should, by extended argument, prove that whenever the production of any article exceeds the demand, all burdens laid upon the sale of this article must fall upon the producer; the very statement of the proposition carries with it the proof of its correctness: the producer pays the tax, or reduces the quantity produced; in either event, he sustains the loss. The gentleman from Massachusetts, whilst he denies that the producer pays any portion of the duty, attributes our suffering to the fact that our production exceeds the demand; and this he attributes to a general glut in the market of the world, occasioned by excess of production. I rest my argument partly upon the gentleman's conclusion, but I cannot accede to the justice of his premises. I cannot believe that the unimpeded exertions of man's industry, the unperturbed suggestions of man's sagacity, drive him onward to a state of dismal stagnation, in which the accomplishment of his toil and foresight is to perish from want in the midst of overwhelming abundance. This is not the order of nature.

But when man has usurped undue authority over his equals, and, finding in human reason no justification for the sacrifice of the will and property of others for his own profit or pleasure, seeks, by a mysterious derivation of his power; to conceal the weakness of his title, calling that divine right which the well being of human society will not sanction, he must maintain his pretensions to this high origin of his power, by exalting the superior wisdom with which he boasts that he has been gifted for its exercise. Divine inspiration must sanctify divine right. Then commences a system of exorbitant taxation, unequal distribution, and forced direction of industry, which inevitably result in robbing labor of its hard earnings, and bringing to beggary and starvation a majority of those for whose protection Governments have been instituted. And this Government, also, in name a republic, having set at naught the compact by which its power was restrained—no longer deriving its authority from the instructions of the instrument to execute which it was organized, but arrogating despotic authority under the divine right of a majority, a right as false in theory and far more oppressive in practice than the divine right of kings, has not failed to claim, also, the inspiration which appertains to the mysterious source of its power. The representative, with his official garb, assumes official wisdom; the scales fall from his eyes, and he, who but yesterday was unable to direct his own industry, is now gifted with unerring sagacity and profound wisdom, in guiding and controlling the interest and industry of the nation. The evil which such legislation brings upon mankind, cannot be attributed to nature. It is to the disturbing operations of Government that the distress resulting from production pressing upon consumption is justly attributable. I will endeavor to illustrate this position. Let us suppose a community of one hundred men, whose annual income amounts to a hundred dollars each; if no taxes or regulations disturbed the exchanges of this community, no sufficient cause can be assigned why great inequality should arise in their condition, or why the supply should exceed the demand. But let a Government be established, which levies a tax of fifty per cent. upon the incomes of each member of the community, and distributes the amount thus levied among ten members, what then is the result? Ninety members have their means of consumption diminished one-half; and although ten members have had their income increased to five times their former amount, yet the increased consumption of the five will never supply the diminished consumption of the ninety. But whilst the consumption is thus diminished, the power of production is not only the same, but is stimulated to still greater efforts. When we add to this almost necessary cause of inequality, the unjust interference of a Government, shackling industry in one pursuit to sustain it in another, we have perhaps assigned the true reason why labor is depressed and capital exalted, and why a large portion of the community are starving in the midst of plenty.

If we refer to England, that country which the restrictionists visit with such unmeasured abuse, while they worship with a slavish adoration the very errors from which her increasing intelligence is daily liberating her, we shall there behold a powerful illustration of the correctness of my position. It is true that she has amassed great wealth, and her resources and her luxury are the astonishment of the world. But what is her internal condition? The small landowner, the owner of a little hut and a petty craft, has no longer a home; his land has passed from him, to swell the domain of his aristocratic neighbor; he has become a day laborer; the day laborer is a pauper. The gentleman from Massachusetts has said truly that the British operative worked for bread; yes, sir, no hope of future relaxation ever cheers his toil; hunger, ever present, ever pressing, stimulates his overwrought frame to new exertions. He hopes to eat, he fears to starve. What has reduced him to this miserable condition? Heavy taxation, unequal and extravagant disbursements, unjust monopolies, exhausting the means of millions to swell the coffers of a few.

And the laborers of our country must work as cheaply as this miserable, slaving population! What is the operation of this Government upon the South? Sir, of the imports received chiefly in return for their exports, the Government takes almost one-half; and where expends it? Elsewhere. It is certain that not two millions of dollars of the twenty-four ever revisit the section which bears the chief burden of taxation. Nor is this all. To make the inequality still more glaring, bounties, also, are to be levied upon our industry, to pamper other sections of the country. Our means of consumption are thus diminished; and, to sustain ourselves under this unnatural pressure, we have been compelled to press our productions beyond the means of consumption.

I will now, sir, take another view of the subject, illustrative of the position, that the tax laid upon the amount of imports purchased by our exports is chiefly borne by the southern producer. That we may understand the principle clearly, let us remove the intermediate machinery. The cotton, tobacco, and rice, and other southern exports, are the produce of our labor; they are worth about thirty-seven millions of dollars; we take them to the manufacturer, and, as the Government requires fifty per cent. upon the goods which we shall bring with us, we sell one-half of our produce for money, the other half we exchange for goods. Upon our return, we pay the duty at the custom-house, and we seek to reimburse ourselves, by adding the duty to the goods which we have imported. This enables the northern manufacturer to sell his goods at a profitable advance; and thus the section of country in which he resides receives a bounty. But it is alleged that the consumers of the North pay the duty upon the goods which they consume. This is true; but by whose means? Why, the very fifty per cent. which the southern producer has paid at the custom-house, is transferred to the North in the shape of disbursements, and they are thus enabled to reimburse themselves for the advance which they made as consumers. In what proportions these advantages are distributed among the people of the North, I do not inquire. I believe that the distribution is most unequal, and that monopoly there also holds labor in thralldom, and oppresses whilst it deludes the poor. But it is argued that the producer, as producer, pays nothing—that the consumer alone pays the tax, and that we do consume the amount of our exports. We will meet them upon this ground, also; we believe that the cotton, tobacco, and rice, and other articles of southern export, which we raise by the labor of our slaves, amounting, in value, to the sum of thirty-seven millions of dollars annually, is our property; we believe that, after deducting such portion of this amount as a just Government should require, the remainder we have the undoubted right to apply to our proper use. It is true that we have long known that we have not been permitted to use our own property; we have felt that others were enjoying the products of our labor. But that this should be openly avowed, that we should be told, when we complain of oppression, that we do not consume our own property, and therefore should moderate our tone and be submissive, sir, can this be tolerated? Do we not consume the amount of our exports? Who does? I demand. Is it not ours? Who does consume it? It is that which our labor has earned—let those who have taken it from us show a higher title. Let us examine it, sir. The exports and imports of any country are equal in a series of years. Whatever, therefore, a country exports, it will import, unless some portion be intercepted by foreign or domestic interference. The exports of the southern country are thirty-seven millions of dollars; if we had no connexion with the North, a duty of forty-five per cent. on imports would give sixteen millions of dollars, a most oppressive tax, yet one from the weight of which we are not relieved by our connexion with the North, whilst we are altogether deprived of the advantage of its disbursement, and have our foreign market endangered by a fruitless and bitter competition. As we export for consumption, that portion which is not taken from us by taxes, we do consume; and upon this we pay the duty, either in taxes to the Government, or bounties to the manufacturer. With the exception of our trade with the West, of four or five millions of dollars, (and our exportation of cotton to the North will amply compensate for the exception,) almost the whole of our consumption consists of articles imported or protected, and an average of between forty-five and fifty per cent. will not exceed the actual amount of taxation to which we are subjected. We are the ultimate consumers, possessing no power of throwing our burdens upon others; upon us the tax falls. But, sir, what need is there of this contest of words? Men's professions may deceive you—let their actions answer; these speak most intelligibly. Who bear the burdens? Who pay the taxes? The gentleman from Massachusetts said truly that labor was the basis of property. The Government derives, annually, twenty-four millions of dollars of taxes from the labor of the country; from labor it must come, ex nihilo nihil fit. And although I have heard that a duty was no tax, I cannot reply to such an assertion. I cannot strike a shadow; I cannot argue against a palpable absurdity. Upon the labor of this country there lies a burden of twenty-four millions of dollars. Who bear this burden? Who pay these taxes? Do the North pay? Sir, they pray for an increase; they beseech you, as you value their existence as a nation, never to remove them. Are taxes, then, a blessing to be prayed for? Is industry there so elastic, that burdens must be applied to regulate its buoyancy? Must every extravagant scheme be fostered, to induce a necessity for taxation? And do you feel it as an evil?

We do not claim for ourselves greater wisdom, and certainly not greater prudence, than the representatives of the North; yet how has it happened that taxation and prodigal expenditure find favor and support in the North, and are opposed by the South? Is it that the people whom they represent are less sensitive to taxation, less jealous of the application of their money, than ours? No, sir: two winters since, the Legislature of Massachusetts refused to lay a tax for the payment of a debt due by that commonwealth. Her funds were exhausted, her contracts were not performed; yet the representatives refused to tax the people. The last winter a railroad scheme was proposed to that Legislature, and a subscription was refused. The application, I think, has been transferred here. New York is now living upon her capital, refusing to tax her people. Pennsylvania continues to borrow money to pay the interest of her debt, refusing to tax her people. How is this, sir? Here we find the representatives of these very States anxious to keep up the taxes, and willing to engage in wasteful schemes of expenditures. Whence this economy at home, and profusion here? Sir, the facts are too glaring to be denied—the inferences too clear to be disguised. The system is a blessing to them, and the burdens of Government fall upon us.

The gentleman from Massachusetts denies that we can consume the thirty-seven millions of dollars which we export. Sir, the gentleman has not well examined his assertion. The population, to purchase whose supplies these exports are made, is three millions; the average consumption would scarcely exceed thirteen dollars a head. Is this a consumption of foreign articles by three millions so enormous as to exceed belief? The Island of Cuba, with a population of eight hundred thousand, imports fourteen millions of dollars annually, giving an average consumption of foreign articles of more than seventeen dollars.

[H. of R.]

But it is said that we could not have sustained this weight of taxation. Sir, we have not sustained it: we have sunk under it. Whilst the value of our property has been greatly diminished, the profits of our labor have been almost destroyed; not by that active competition which, whilst it lessens individual gain, enhances the sum of national prosperity, and adds to the strength and population of our country, but by a production borne down by taxation, compelling it to maintain a precarious and unequal struggle with foreign industry by sacrifices and toil. And it is against a country thus oppressed, that new edicts are yearly promulgated, trammelling, limiting, exterminating that commerce upon which it depends for existence.

A belt of country, extending from thirty-seven degrees north to thirty-seven degrees south latitude, is capable of producing the articles which we export to a foreign market. In many portions of this section of the world, the soil is more fertile, the climate more genial, and labor cheaper, than in the southern part of this country: with the inhabitants of this extensive region we must compete. A small island, not possessing any peculiar natural advantages, with its labor subjected to an enormous pressure of taxation, is the dreaded competitor of the northern manufacturer. I demand, sir, by what principle which you yourselves can term equal, do you dare to throw in the weight of your legislation, for the purpose of encumbering one section of the country to strengthen the other. Sir, your Government appeals to the example of England to justify her in this course of legislation; let her follow out the example, if she has determined to make the system of restrictions, which is daily yielding to science and experience there, the model of her policy. If no more elevated path to glory and prosperity can be discovered for a free republic, than that dark and crooked road from which knowledge is even now expelling the monarchies and aristocracies of Europe, let her at least take the good with the evil. Let her design be justice. England has most unwisely and unjustly assumed the control of the whole labor of her people; but she desired that they should experience equal favor. It is true that most pernicious inequalities have been the result; but this is the inherent, vicious tendency of the system. The object which she designed to accomplish, was the equal protection of every class in the community. When she gave to her manufactures the home market, she gave bounties to the exports of her agriculture; and now that her agriculture is permitted to enjoy without competition the domestic market, she assists by bounties the exportations of her manufactures; nor is there a burden to be borne, or an advantage to be enjoyed, which she intentionally distributes unequally on the labor of those who claim her protection.

Sir, how is it you boast you are a free State? Will the name of freedom compensate for the want of justice? And can you pretend, upon the common principles of natural equity, to justify yourselves for the gross partiality which your legislation manifests? You not only foster one portion of the community, and one section of the country, whilst you leave the other without the pale of your protection, but you trammel and render fruitless the unassisted exertions of the one, that the other may enjoy in security increased prosperity.

There are some arguments urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, of a general character, of which, although I cannot myself feel their force, yet, as they have been frequently repeated, I shall briefly notice them. The gentleman urges that the competition of this country diminishes the price of goods. The admission of that gentleman in another part of the argument furnishes a sufficient answer to this argument. He told us that the British laborer worked for his daily bread; that starvation reduced the price of his labor to the least sum sufficient for the support of life. Here, sir, is a very sufficient reason to account for the depressed price of English goods, and renders entirely unnecessary any resort to the mysterious connexion which is said to exist between high taxes and cheap goods.

But, sir, the whole argument has always appeared to me to be based upon a most unfounded assumption that the manufacturers of England would or could combine to sell their goods in America at a price above that which renders them a fair profit. Sir, gentlemen greatly underrate the effect of competition in England, and greatly overrate the importance of the American market to the English manufacturer, when they suffer themselves to be deluded by so idle a supposition. Great Britain exports near three hundred millions of manufactures. A combination among the producers of this amount of fabrics, is an apprehension too extravagant to affect a reasonable mind. And it seems scarcely less surprising that any one could gravely urge that a market for twenty or thirty millions could regulate the price of manufactures to the amount of many hundreds of millions; and upon this supposition only can the argument be sustained. It is also evident that no permanent and important difference of price can be maintained in the American market, whilst our commerce is free with France and other European countries.

But it is said that the restrictive system has rendered goods cheaper in this country. Sir, the true question is, are they cheaper than we could procure them from abroad? and not whether they are cheaper now than at a former period. You dare not answer in the affirmative. Let our revenue, chiefly derived from a payment of a tax imposed upon the very goods, of the superior cheapness of which, in this country, these men boast, answer. Let this infamous bill of pains and penalties, which the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures has from very shame abandoned, answer. [Mr. MALLARY said that he was not ashamed of the bill.] If your goods are cheaper than the foreign articles, the manufacturers cannot require such harsh and unjust laws for their protection. But, sir, are goods, as we receive them in this country, either foreign or domestic, really cheaper than they were formerly? It is true, sir, that they cost less money; but have not all articles, the unprotected as well as the protected, depreciated in equal proportion? Can you obtain more of the necessities or comforts of life for a pound of cotton or tobacco, than you could formerly? It is the exchangeable value which determines the cheapness. I apprehend, sir, that, under our present system, and in this mode of estimating the value, goods are not cheaper.

It is triumphantly urged that the revenue of the country has not been seriously affected by the tariff, and that the prophecies of those who have formerly opposed this policy have not been accomplished. Sir, when we estimate the vast yearly addition which is made to the population of this country, the enormous increase of duties upon imports which have been levied, and advert to the fact that the revenue has remained almost stationary, we cannot perceive that the advocates of high taxes have great cause for triumph or congratulation. Yet it is true that the diminution of the revenue has not been so rapid or so great as was anticipated previously to the act of 1828.

Those who witnessed the oppressive operation of this Government upon that section of the country, from the produce of the labor of which the revenue was chiefly derived, were well warranted in the belief which they entertained and expressed, that additional burdens would drive them from their employment; and that, with the decrease of exports, the revenue derived from imports would be greatly curtailed. What has been the effect? Sir, it is true that the planter still clings to the soil and the employment to which the strong ties of local affection and custom bind him; but the value of his property is merely nominal. Those who were pressed by debts have been ruined, and those who were ever distinguished for generous hospitality, are now struggling, and vainly struggling, by privation and ceaseless labor, to keep their foot upon their natal soil. The blow has fallen upon our lands; and it has fallen heavily. Lower they cannot go; we must desert them. To us, at least, it affords no consolation to know that the revenue has not decreased; for we feel that it has been sustained by remorseless oppression, wringing from us the hard earnings of our industry.

But, sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts says that we arrogate to ourselves the markets of this country. Ah, sir, this is the true statement of the case: this is a bold avowal of these principles which we charge upon you: we arrogate to ourselves the market of this country, and against this arrogance the tariff laws are directed. How arrogant? Do we claim special privileges? Do we clamor for laws to aid our industry? No, sir; we ask only the free exercise of our industry; and you answer, that this would enable us to possess the market of our common country, and, therefore, you will not permit it. Sir, we have long felt that we were aliens: your legislation has deeply convinced us that you so regarded us; but it is for the first time openly avowed here, that we have been denied, and will be denied, the right of a citizen to contend for the market of his own country. Yes, sir, if restriction were removed, the planter would enjoy the domestic market; laws must be passed for his exclusion, and those who pass these laws call him countryman and fellow-citizen! The whole scheme is now laid bare; it is to prevent the profits of one section of the country from exceeding the profits of the other: and the American system stands, stripped of disguise, the old agrarian law, vamped up with a new title. Fanny Wright and her doctrines have their advocates upon this floor; and a distribution of goods is the consummation of this splendid project! It is well, sir, that we now understand each other.

The gentleman has introduced slavery into his speech. This is not the occasion upon which I will enter into a discussion upon that subject; the time will, I doubt not, soon come, when I shall claim to be heard.

If the gentleman desires to reconcile a majority of the people of this country to an unjust oppression of the minority, by exciting fanatical prejudices against them, and succeeds in his object, this Government is at an end. That you oppress us because you love yourselves too well, is not tolerable; but that you oppress, because you hate or despise us!—Sir, I will not speak of it.

But, sir, the gentleman will not succeed; the same game has been played before. "The slaves of French slaves, themselves the drivers of slaves," has been once the watchword, but it met with a signal failure then, and will signally fail now.

Sir, had we delivered ourselves into your power, as mere dependents upon your will; had we entrusted to your control the entire disposal of our destinies, perseverance in a system of such manifest injustice and such destructive oppression must have forced us to discard a pretended Government, which "covers to devour us."

But we have not left ourselves thus defenceless; we rest upon that sacred and only bond of union—the constitution. We are animated by a high consciousness that we contend not in a selfish cause, involving merely pecuniary interests, but in the common cause of our common country. Knowing that the preservation of liberty, identified as it is in the preservation of the constitution, depends upon our exertions, we cannot suffer false fears or false hopes to endanger the issue.

And we shall triumph! It is the good old cause: and wherever there is intelligence to estimate its value, and boldness to defend it at all hazards, it cannot go down. The sympathies of the enlightened, the generous, the bold, and the free, are with us. History, in every page, which warms the heart of those who love liberty, is with us: we cannot fail.

Let those who love and honor the constitution not despair of the republic. The encroachments of power have been rapid and alarming; its strongholds are deeply fixed, and fiercely defended. The struggle may be arduous, but it ends in victory.

Had history preserved in her records no memorial of that Roman Senate whose firmness subdued the world, but this simple sentence, "They returned thanks to their vanquished general, because he did not despair of the republic," their fame were immortal.

We will not then despair of the republic. The gallant vessel rocks until her bulwarks are in the brine; throw not the ballast overboard, she will right again.

But, sir, it is not here that I hope to find a remedy; whilst I speak, your decision is already pronounced. I appeal, in the name of the people whom I represent, from your tribunal. Not to your federal judiciary, created by your power, dependent upon your will; but to the State of which we are members, in her capacity of sovereign, we take our appeal. That true allegiance, which, as citizens, we owe to her, has been maintained inviolate. To her laws we have yielded a faithful obedience, and we now demand from her the exercise of the great relative duty of protection.

Mr. GORHAM, of Massachusetts, succeeded, and occupied the committee a short time in a practical examination of the provisions of the bill, and in support of regulations for enforcing the tariff laws; which, although he was opposed to their passage, and to the system which they introduced, he would employ all proper means to enforce while they continued the law of the land. He then spoke at large on the history and effects of the tariff laws, and against the repeal as proposed by the amendment of Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. G. concluded at four o'clock, when Mr. YOUNG moved that the committee rise; which motion prevailed.

THURSDAY, MAY 6, 1830.

COMMERCE AND IMPOSTS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill concerning the navigation and imposts, reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WAYNE continued his remarks in favor of the bill, and embracing general views against the protecting system. He had not concluded, when the expiration of the hour arrested the debate.

DISTRICT AFFAIRS.

The House took up the bill providing for the punishment of crimes within the District of Columbia. The question being on its third reading,

Mr. ALEXANDER moved that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR demanded the yeas and nays on this question; but the House refused to order them; and

The question to lay the bill on the table prevailed—70 to 57.

FRIDAY, MAY 7, 1830.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to amend the laws concerning navigation and imposts.

Mr. WAYNE concluded his remarks in support of the bill.

Mr. STRONG expressed his intention of submitting his views on the subject; but, as the hour had nearly expired, he would, by permission of the House, defer until tomorrow what he had to say.

THE TARIFF LAWS.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. POLK in the chair, and took up the bill to amend an act in addition to the several acts imposing duties on imports.

Mr. YOUNG said he had hitherto left the exposition of his sentiments—here, to the simple expression of aye or no. Respect for the wisdom of the committee collectively, and the weight of character and full experience of many of its members, still inclined him to that course. But, [said Mr. V.] believing that the policy now struggling between this bill and its amendment seriously concerns an interest which has become important to the State I have the honor in part to represent, and of which interest, from my local situation with regard to no inconsiderable proportion of it, it might not be expected I should be unmindful here; and believing, as I do, that a healthy, active, and vigorous state of society in general—the permanent growth, prosperity, and general welfare of our entire country depend intimately, and to a very great extent, on that system of measures now so directly and indirectly, and furiously attacked, I trust the expression of my sentiments, at this time, somewhat more at large, will not be considered as exceeding the duties of my place, or inconsistent with the deference I owe here.

I am not, sir, insensible of the time in which I enter this debate, both in regard to the late hour in the session, and the progress of the discussion—that the prominent views and strong points in this subject have already been traced by master hands—that an extraordinary struggle of eloquence and energy of intellect have formed a kind of crisis of interest and feeling, from which the mind, with the most sincere devotion to the cause, must be waning, and more “idly bent” on what may follow.

I shall, therefore, as far as may be, avoid the track of those who have gone before me, and, not affecting to fill out a complete system for myself, attempt to re-establish, from primary considerations, those general principles of action and operations which have been so fully and so forcibly presented; but endeavor to illustrate them from other facts, and exhibit them from other points of observation, that we may the more distinctly perceive their existence and actual operation upon us.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Davis] who first addressed the committee in opposition to the present amendment, exhibited to us the necessary effect of the accumulation of labor and capital on manufactures, and of the consequent abundance of production, in bearing down, with extending and general pressure, the price of the manufactured articles of all nations and countries, as far as exchange and mutual intercourse exist—presenting, also, our own manufactures as contributing their share in this operation. My object will be to show a further effect, and the particular operation of our manufactures within our own country, and amongst ourselves. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Crawford] who next addressed the committee on the same side, exhibited more particularly the favorable bearing of manufactures on our agricultural pursuits and productions; and the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Gorham] who immediately preceded me, illustrated his views on the subject more particularly, from facts appearing in our foreign intercourse and mercantile transactions. My object will be to examine the more direct effects, proceeding more immediately from manufacturing operations themselves. And all who have preceded me, on either side of the question, have, for the most part, drawn their conclusions from general views. My object will be to select some few specific, palpable facts and results, exemplifying the governing principles, that we may view them simply, singly, and distinctly—not relying on their tendency merely, but the degree and extent of the effect, that we may, if we please, without any intricate or aggregate calculations, count, weigh, and measure them for ourselves. And are there, sir, no such facts to be found? Has experience yet left no criterion amidst all the commended and deprecated operations of this all-embracing tariff system? Is it not strange, sir, that, on this subject, there should so long be found to remain so much doubt—so much confusion of sentiment, so wide, so extreme a difference of opinion? A subject, as all agree, so intimately connected with the value of all we possess, affecting alike the city and the country, the producer, vender, and consumer, entering into the composition of whatever we eat, and drink, and wear, and even that of our dwellings, and bearing, in its effects, on all our great, continual, and instant interests, and as extended, minute, and diversified as the whole restless struggle and bustle for money, riches, and power.

Will it not be strange, sir, if, amidst all this, we can find no one fact, no data, no fair view of cause and effect, by which we may satisfy ourselves, or demonstrate to others, where the plain truth lies in this all-important question? In the varied and complicated operations of nature around us, which we can but partially approach or control, we have long since learned to seek out the cause from the effect, and, by observing and noting the naked facts, have thence deduced the governing principle; and whatever confusion, variety, or extent, the view may put on, we can trace the moving cause. When all the elements of the air are in commotion and at war in the storm, it is but the operation of a mute and simple principle, and all is calm again. We have learned to dissipate the thunder, and even to divert and ward off its bolts.

But amidst this mental excitement, amidst this storm of complaint and thunder of eloquence, we have yet found no sufficient philosopher, no one admitted fact, no defined result, no acknowledged principle, to which we will refer, to solve the doubts and difficulties which surround us. But, instead of looking at the naked facts, a new era of argument, and theory, and representation, seems to have ensued; and amidst all the blessings which distinguish our country, our constitution and laws are represented as despotism itself, the government of majorities as a refinement to tyranny, and all our fostering and protecting policy as spreading ruin, disaster, and desolation over the fairest fields of our country and our kindred, more doleful and sombre than has settled on the ill-fated plains of Nineveh or Babylon.

And are we, sir, in this country, at this day, to legislate on these premises? Is our favorite system indeed a warlock-spell, to haunt the land? Or has “God, for some strong purpose, steeled the hearts of men” on this strange subject? When wildness, from any cause, seizes the imagination, or one has lost his way, and all objects around seem to have changed their appearance and position, if he can but spy some hill, or tree, or stump, which he can recognise, all, at once, comes right again; and this small object, in calculating for home, or certainty, or safety, is worth all the world beside. I will not here decide which side is right, or which is wrong; but that there somewhere exists, on one side or the other, a sad mistake—an unaccountable state of opinion and feeling on the subject, both in principle and extent, none who have witnessed this debate can doubt.

In this state of mind, we may theorize forever, calculate back the duties on imports to the exporter, the producer, or his fathers; we may talk at large of revenue, and resources, and balance of trade; look abroad on agriculture, and commerce, and manufactures, as we feel, but we must come down to the simple and primitive operations of the plough and the hammer, the spindle and the oar, to rest and start our sure calculation upon. Resting upon, and supported by these primarily, sir, and not on the millions borrowed, as suggested by the honorable gentleman, [Mr. McDuffie] was England enabled to sustain herself through the mightiest struggle of modern days, and not sustain herself merely, but rise above the storm, and say, with the complacency of Juno to the gods, “incedo,” I march with majesty amidst the nations of the earth. And what now makes her look so thoughtful, so hungry, and so surly towards us?

Nothing so much, sir, as the spindle and loom of America, the little spinner and weaver of America, alluded to in a former debate. Give her the control of these, sir, but a few years—give her your market—pass but this bill, with its amendment, and you will soon see John Bull full fed, and something hale again; and, as he passes by, will, with increased complacency, and affected solicitude for our welfare, inquire, in his turn, what makes brother Jonathan so rugged and so sober, so as if he had lost a friend.

I agree, sir, with the gentleman, that money, circulating medium, is an immense power in all these affairs; but without the action of these little springs to keep it in motion, it is a poor, dead, inert mass. What is money to Spain or Portugal? Like the food that nourisheth not. What would it be if they had but the little spindles, and looms, and hammers of America? Sir, they would be other nations, at once, in the world, and we, without them, should be poor and sluggish; and far behind our native selves, as they are now.

And, sir, but adopt this amendment, (or its cousin-german, that figures in the morning hour,) and we shall have a Methuen treaty, and all the degrading consequences that followed on Portugal will flow upon us.

But permit me here, sir, before I proceed to the particulars as suggested, to mention the great principles which I consider as governing the protecting system in all its parts, and in all countries. It is, that the encouragement and augmentation of manufactures necessarily tend to withdraw and withhold labor and capital from agricultural pursuits, and to accumulate and retain labor and capital in manufacturing pursuits; thereby producing the double effect, on the one hand, of raising the price of agricultural products, by diminishing the number of producers, and enlarging the number of consumers; and, on the other hand, of reducing the price of manufactured articles, by increasing the competition and increasing the production; each effect being in favor of the agriculturist and consumer; and must, therefore, be the true policy of all nations where the danger of a scarcity or extravagance of price of provisions, or other agricultural productions, does not make it necessary to establish directly the opposite policy. This cannot be necessary in this country, above all others.

Yet, sir, the objection brought against this system here, is directly the opposite to this position, viz. that the operation of the protecting system increases the price of manufactures, and diminishes that of agriculture. The protecting system may be supported on the supposition of an increased price of the manufactured article, and a corresponding increased price of the agricultural article given in exchange. In this case the whole operation of the system would be for the benefit of the manufacturer, unless the farmer obtained a more uniform and permanent market thereby; but if a more extensive market for the farmer, and an increase of price above that range, ensue, the benefit accrues to both parties. But when competition, perfection, and abundance shall reduce the price of manufactures, it produces a double benefit to the consumer, and leaves but a sustaining profit for the manufacturer. This will ever be the tendency of the system until it reaches that point, and will not react on the agricultural interest, until manufacturing has fallen below all other business, from the fact that permanent manufacturing capital cannot be converted or abandoned without an almost total loss of it. I will now proceed to illustrate these ideas by facts, showing the direct effects of manufactures on our own country, and on the present course of business amongst us. The general effects produced by manufactures of all kinds are much the same on the country at large. But I have selected an article from cotton manufacture, for the purpose of illustrating its bearing on the cotton-growing States, and as exhibiting more fully than most others the effects already produced by protection.

And I have selected a given quantity, that we may avoid aggregate estimates; and, by calculating accurately the effect of a definite part, see, distinctly, by the relation, the effect of the whole. And I will suppose it manufactured in New England, as she draws the supplies for her laborers mostly from abroad, and the operation on those States which supply themselves is less distinctly seen.

I take, for instance, one square yard of common cotton cloth, at the price it bears, viz. from eight to nine cents; say nine cents, for the convenience of propositions. Four cents of this, or four-ninths of the whole price, is made up of stock, or the cotton in its raw state. The cotton-growing States cannot complain of this part of the price, as it is their own produce at the market price, not diminished by rivalry of a growing market, now nearly for one-quarter of their whole produce. Nor can other parts of the country complain, as they receive it, including less freight than they could from any other country that can manufacture for us. Four cents more of the price, or four-fifths of the remaining part, is made up of labor; which is the same as to say that this part is made up of the necessities of life: for even on this subject both sides agree, as a general rule, that the labor in production is a fair measure of the consumption that enters into it. And how, sir, is this part made up? Of the produce of every part of the Union. The rice, corn, and tobacco of the South, and the sugar and molasses from farther south; the flour pork, lard, and grain from the middle and western States; the fur and skins from farther west; drawn, in short, with mixed and varied proportions, from every part of our country, and every class of producers, leaving but a minor part to be supplied by the local markets. Can any part of the Union complain of this portion of the price? It is their own produce, at their own price. Is it the interest of the country to subtract any thing from this part of the price, or compose it of other materials, or the products of other countries? Can we, so far as we have yet proceeded, destroy any part of that manufacture, without, at the same time, and to the same extent, destroying the market and the consumption of our agricultural products? Or can any part of the price be reduced, but by reducing the price of the agricultural products which compose it? Eight-ninths, therefore, is not the manufacturer's price, but the agriculturist's price: it is his production converted into it; and, when consumed or exported, it is virtually the consumption and exportation of his products. One cent of it, or one-ninth, remains to go against the capital and care of the owner. And how is it with this? The capital is brought into operation by labor, in erecting his buildings, his dams, his flumes, his machinery, and tools; and all this is done and paid for by the same kind of provisions and necessities, drawn from every part of the country, including here the iron and coal of Pennsylvania, the lumber of Maine, and the oil of our South Sea whale men, and some few materials from all other parts of the world, which we have not yet, but may soon supply ourselves with from our own native resources. And as to that share which goes for the care of the owner, which is not an envious portion at this time, not exceeding or equalling what belongs to every other business in the country, even the raising of cotton, rice, and tobacco. And what is the condition of this small item, as the manufacturer is situated? If he supplies his own family with necessities, if he extend his manufactory, he calls in and uses the same round of materials and provisions: if he build a house, or if he even is enabled to improve his adjoining lands, the labor is principally paid for in the same way. Thus the whole price is made up of, produced from, and sustained by, agriculture, and all one continual round of operation upon the other labor and capital of the country. No part of the capital expended in establishing or operating manufactures in this country can be brought into operation, till it has first been an agricultural operation to the same amount. If some few foreign articles in some stage are used, the demand for them is created by the manufacturer, and they are in general paid for by some article that we can export; and in this way a market is created for that article also. And thus our whole manufacturing system is but one vast national machine, not manufacturing the staple, or raw material only of which the article is composed, but converting into it all and every production of the earth which the producer chooses to bring into market. Those, therefore, who supply the stock and provisions for manufacturing labor, are alike connected with, and interested in, manufactures, with those who supply the labor and capital. The southern, western, and middle States, as far as each may supply, have a joint stock interest, and to all beneficial purposes are copartners in the whole manufacturing business of the eastern States; one supplying the labor and capital for the agricultural product, the other supplying an equal quantity of labor and capital in consuming it.

Yet it is objected that the markets created by the eastern manufactories are local. They will, of course, be local, so far as means and convenience make them so. The expense of transportation will, of course, come into the account.

But the present facilities for transportation, and the richer soils of other sections of the country, overcome it. The town of Providence only, calculating from years past, and the progress of things observable, will, no doubt, draw from the southern, middle, and western States, during the present year, more than one hundred, probably more than one hundred and twenty-five thousand barrels of flour, more than half a million of bushels of corn, and pork and grain, and other necessities of life, in equal or greater proportions, principally for the supply of the surrounding manufacturers, and other businesses connected with them. Yes, sir, this one town is a greater market for the grain-growing States than Great Britain—buys double the quantity of their flour, and, including corn, pork, and beef, receives three times the amount of their agricultural produce, notwithstanding the millions of her manufactures we annually import from her.

The demand for consumption this year, created by our eastern manufactories, and drawn from other parts of the Union, will probably exceed one million barrels of flour, two million five hundred thousand bushels of corn, with nearly an equal proportion of pork and beef; something more, probably, than we export of them to all the world beside. Sir, all the grain and provisions that England will take of us, will hardly pay for the hose and gloves she manufactures for us.

I have spoken of things in general terms; but statistical accounts will bear me out with sufficient accuracy for this general view. It has been triumphantly asked, [by Mr. McDuffie] what interest has the West in manufactures? Is the market I have mentioned for more than half their surplus produce, nothing? Is it not one source of their present activity and prosperity; and that which renders their country and their cities, their canal boats and their steamboats, one continued scene of life, and bustle, and business?

Let our friends there look back to their situation eight or ten years ago. It is not the introduction of steamboats, but the business for them, that makes this change. Sir, the whole course of the business of the East and West and South contradicts the idea that our markets are local. The facilities which nature has furnished us; the efforts of genius and enterprise, aided by internal improvement, the handmaid of prosperity and union, are bringing all parts of our country together into familiar intercourse, into one entire market, one connected business. The rise or fall in the price of provisions in Hartford or Boston is felt in New Orleans or Cincinnati, as soon as the mail can reach there. What is passing on the Ohio canals to-day, may be in our New England packets to-morrow.

The word local, as to our markets, will soon be almost without meaning. It is not to me "too lofty a magnanimity, too expensive a patriotism," even "for practical use," to consider the Louisville canal, or the improvements at the Muscle shoals, improvements for the inhabitants of Connecticut or of Maine.*

They may cheapen the price of a barrel of flour, in the New York or Hartford market, to the amount of convenience yielded to the seller there. They may facilitate the transportation of a bale of domestic manufactures, going to market there, as much as the like improvements at the manufactory, or anywhere else where it may pass. When the American system shall fully prevail, internal improvements and manufactories together, and we shall be bound together by their mutual interest, assistance, and dependence, we may with assurance and significance say, with our motto, "We are one."

The present is a new era in the world in all manufacturing business. Some nations are pressing on each other, not merely from national policy, or individual gain, but with the violence and frenzy of starvation and desperation; and some withdrawing, as far as may be, within their own native resources.

It might be otherwise in other times; but, in the present state of the world, our laws are our protection. The necessity we have seen for the present bill, the immense sacrifices of foreign goods in our markets, the distress of our rival, the precautionary protecting policy adopted by most other nations, all show a desperate state of things, that will press in upon us like a flood where the least barrier is removed. But, suppose the friends of the anti-tariff policy shall prevail; the barriers to the introduction of foreign goods be removed; the business of New England be prostrated; the manufactures of the middle States; with the agriculture dependent on them, be paralyzed; the markets of the western States, to half their amount, be destroyed; and we begin to import from abroad for the purpose of sustaining the market of rice, cotton, and tobacco, in England, according to the demands which have been pressed upon us; half the ability of the nation to import and consume, by the process, has been taken away. Nay, more, for consumption cannot long exceed exports; and we have been told in the protest, and we know by the stubborn fact itself, that two-thirds of the Union supply but one-third of its exports. The very efforts, therefore, which the South are making, will, by destroying the ability of the other two-thirds of the Union to consume what might be taken in exchange for their staples, prove their own ruin, to the same extent they may succeed.

But, suppose, again, that the free trade system shall prevail, and the whole world become one family, we must cast about over the whole to see how we may then stand with it. We have all seen the time when, with an immense drain of specie, our whole supply of coarse cottons came from the Indies; and we have seen this market, by the invention and introduction of labor-saving machinery, wholly broken up. This machinery is now lately introduced there; and the myriads who feed on pulse, and work for life merely, may again be brought into competition with England and ourselves, in our own market. With this machinery, they now have the same comparative advantage in labor and machinery, which raised and sustained that trade. And, chimerical as it may seem, in less time than we have seen it wholly swept away, and with a change far less extraordinary or uncalculated, we may again see the same thing return upon us. It is now much easier to transport machinery there, or build it, than it was to invent, improve, and build up this whole system, and with an opportunity its progress could hardly be counted—less chance and prospect have changed the face of many nations.

Again, sir, if the protecting system is to be abandoned, it will be no more than fair that the duty on cotton should be repealed, and our manufacturers have an opportunity in our markets for the staples of Pernambuco and Surinam, or the finer and cheaper growth of some of the interior provinces, which enterprise and internal improvement may some time bring into the markets of the world. Great changes may produce great changes which we may not think of. Many of the great revolutions in trade and commerce which we have witnessed have been wholly uncalculated and unexpected. And, sir, there is, in this state of the world, danger of changes for the South as well as the North to consider. One depends on his manufactures, and the other on his staples; and these, if we could but see it so, are mutually dependent on each other. The western and middle States have a middle and mixed interest, can manufacture and supply the material mostly within themselves, and are in these affairs more independent. If there is any one cardinal imperative policy, never to be lost sight of by those States which either depend on supplying the agricultural products for the raw material, or support of labor, it is to create, retain, and establish, somewhere, a dense population of consumers, giving competition and stability to their market, balancing foreign fluctuation and control, secure in peace and war, joining convenience of intercourse and mutual exchange. Sir, this contest between the South and the North is most unfortunate, most unnatural; not suicidal merely, but, like two fond lovers, sacrificing each other for fancied blisses they know not where or what.

I come now to my last position. The time has now arrived when we may in a great measure lay aside theory on the subject; what has been but foretold by the friends of domestic industry, has become reality.

It may now be laid down, as a proposition established by our own experience, and demonstrated by existing palpable facts, and liable to fewer exceptions than most others in political economy, that those articles of domestic manufacture which are fairly protected, and have had time for experiment and maturity, now are, and can be, supplied by our own manufacturers at a lower price than those of any nation of Europe do, or can, or will supply them for us; leaving the great advantage of mutual exchange of products to be superadded.

I am sensible it will be said that woollen manufactures, which have so long been struggling with the many and various embarrassments which have haunted them, do not come wholly within this rule. Yet it is known that many parts of most articles in this manufacture, and many entire articles, are manufactured cheaper in this country than in England or Germany, where, in some respects, as well as in France, there is now a superiority in this business, even over England.

But it will be recollected that these embarrassments were the principal cause of introducing the bill now before the committee, and the principal object of the bill is to remove them; and that the principal effect of the amendment will be to increase them, and prevent this most important manufacture from gaining that stand which those more fortunate have already attained. The great struggle between England and America, at this time, is for the command of our market—not so much for present gain. England will not thank us for a market under the full operation of our own competition. Her present principal object is to worry out our manufacturers, and thus avoid our competition, and thus command our market, and thus control the price. Were it not for this state of things, which their immense capital enables them, and their state of starvation urges them, to press at all points upon us, as long as there is life or hope, the necessity for protecting duties on those articles might cease. The better to illustrate the general positions I would establish, that the effect of the establishment of manufactures generally is to reduce the price of manufactured productions, compared with agricultural productions, and the effect of domestic manufactures to reduce the price in their own markets, compared with those of other nations, it may be necessary to inquire more particularly whether the price of manufactures generally has, during this general depression under which we all labor, fallen more than that of agricultural products; and whether our domestic manufactures have fallen in price below the common level of the manufactures of other nations.

As to the first proposition, a bare inspection of the prices each species of product has sustained, from year to year, for some time past, and their present prices, must be sufficient. And though the proposition, particularly with respect to the extraordinary fall of coarse cotton goods, (which I have chosen for my illustration,) is generally admitted, its force is attempted to be evaded, by alleging that the effect in this case has arisen from peculiar causes, not generally applicable, viz. the great improvements, of late, in cotton machinery. There is, sir, so far as I understand it, a great mistake in this suggestion.

Since the tariff of 1823 or 1824, sir, and for some time before that, while cotton goods of some kinds have fallen from forty to fifty per cent., the improvements in machinery in England have not amounted to one per cent. on the manufacture, nor has their skill in operation improved much in that time. The manufacturers used machines constructed on the same principles, the same draughts and proportions of the parts, and the same comparative speed between the several motions, and, for the most part, the same general movement, except some increase of speed in coarse work, and that not general. Weaving was perfected in the introduction of the power-loom, and perfect roving, which was for a long time a desideratum in the manufacture, was supplied in the cone-spedder, conceived and attempted by Sir Richard Arkwright, and long since perfected by others.

An improved machine for cleansing and batting cotton has more lately been introduced, but used but little, except for the finer and nicer fabrics, and of no account in the present calculation. Some evident improvements, particularly applicable to coarse work, have been introduced in this country, but have been seldom and doubtfully admitted into English manufactories. And though occasional attempts have been made there at improvements, during the general depression, they have generally been abandoned for the operations and calculations used six or eight years ago. The great reduction in price, therefore, is not attributable but in a small degree to the late improvements. Competition is the wand that has brought it low.

I will next inquire whether the American manufacturer can supply the same articles at as low or at a lower price than the English manufacturer. An idea is very prevalent, that the comparative price of labor in this country and in England must be conclusive against my position. The difference is conceived to be much greater than it really is. We know there is some difference in price between their and our sailors, soldiers, fishermen or farmers, or ordinary mechanics; but it is also known that their foremen, overseers, and scientific mechanics, who constitute a large portion of the expense in manufacturing, command much better wages in England than in this country; and it is well known, too, that a much greater proportion of women's and children's labor is introduced into our manufactories; so that, on the whole, there is probably no great advantage on either side, in this respect.

Another objection commonly urged is, that our manufactories and machinery are inferior to those of the English. On this subject, I believe a great mistake prevails. I mean to confine myself to such manufactures as have had time to be perfected. It is well known, sir, by those who are conversant with the business, that the manufactories and machinery of this country, for beauty, convenience, practical calculation, and perfection, are fully equal, if not superior, to any in the world. Many English manufacturers acknowledge it; and, as satisfactory proof on this point, I may allude to the fact, that the agents of the Prussian Government, after travelling over Europe and the United States to obtain the most perfect models and machinery for the establishment of cotton and woolen manufactories in their country, selected mostly American models and machinery of American workmanship. Again, it is said the British manufacturer has more skill, and can perform more in a given time and opportunity. Sir, on this point, the American manufacturer claims an advantage in vigor, activity, versatility, and perseverance. The moral and mental stay drawn from our institutions; the liberality of thought and action; the free choice of expedients; the unrestrained exertions of genius; the spirit of enterprise and ambition, which a land of freedom and independence inspires—all unite to render his exertions more effective and successful, than the dependent, monotonous, hireling labor of any despotic Government on earth.

The Tariff.

In all things, in this country, aside from manufacturing, by sea and by land, in peace and in war, a general complacent consciousness of superiority seems to prevail. In the region now embracing our southwestern States, where, under the dominion of kings and despots, population and cultivation for centuries almost were confined to contracted, isolated settlements, with little intercourse, increase, or extension. But when the banner of our constitution was spread over it, and the spirit of freedom breathed upon it, population, cultivation, activity, and improvements, and all the blessings of civilization, spread around it like enchantment. The spirit of liberty, sir, is as visible and prevalent in our youthful manufactories as in our youthful settlements. Add to these considerations, that the price of provisions, especially, and many other of the necessities of life, is at about one-half the price in this country that it is in England; that the Englishman, for the expenses of the Government, in tithes, taxes, imposts, excise, and exactions, pays about seven dollars to the American's one—amounting, for a family of common size, to about seven dollars per month. To this add freight and ground rent, and all their other great expenses and embarrassments, and we may, I think, readily conceive that we can manufacture cheaper than England or any other nation of Europe. My next object will be to show this from existing facts.

I proceed, therefore, to give to the committee, in proof, the palpable facts I alluded to in the fore part of my observations.

We know that coarse cotton cloths, below about No. 25, have been fairly and fully protected; from that to about No. 45 or 50, partially protected; above that, very slightly, including what are termed in our tariff, cambrics, muslins, &c. And what has been the result? Why, sir, while the fine cottons, which include a greater proportion of labor, and should have fallen lower, have only fallen from fifteen to twenty-five per cent. (not so much as your agricultural produce in the same time,) coarse cotton goods have fallen from fifty to seventy-five per cent. This case I have put for the double purpose of exemplifying the effects of our protection and competition in those articles we manufacture, and to show the use the foreigner makes of our market, as far as he supplies and controls it. I will give another instance, exemplifying the same effects, more palpable and decisive probably. I mean common crockery ware, and common glass ware; both imported and sold by the same class of merchants generally.

Glass and glass wares, we know, have received such protection as to excite powerful competition.

While the manufacture of common, enamelled, and printed wares has as yet scarcely been attempted in this country, some brown wares and imitation Delphian wares have been common, and some new manufactories of porcelain are now lately promising success. But the common Liverpool ware, as it is often called, has at all times occupied, commanded, and controlled our market, and regulated its prices. And what has been the result? Much the same as in the other instance, except as this article has had no rival in this country, the effect is more perceptible.

While one has hardly fallen fifteen per cent., the other has, in many branches of it, fallen seventy-five per cent. And the opposers of this system, who complained so much of its injustice and oppression, are now actually saving twenty-five per cent., or more, on their glass wares, in consequence of this protection, and losing the same amount on their earthen wares, for the want of such protection.

I will illustrate the effect of protection on ourselves, and the consequence of the command of the market by others, in another way. It has been considered a paradox in trade, that the American manufacturer should be able to compete in foreign markets, in South America and the Indies, with the British manufacturer, and yet need protection against him at home. That we have done it, is evident from the fact that our trade in domestics in those countries at one time was prosecuted extensively, and the effect of it is evident from the fact that, immediately on the knowledge of this, a duty of twenty-five per cent. was laid on our domestics, to exclude them from these markets, and even this has not wholly effected the object. In the South American markets, too, the same dread of our competition is manifested in the unceasing exertions and intrigue there, by English agents and English capitalists, to procure discriminating duties and embarrassing regulations against our trade; in which it is known they have too well succeeded, and we are, in a great measure, outmanaged by them in this business, in most of the American markets except our own; and if this amendment succeeds, they will have accomplished their object here. Sir, the per centum and ad valorem worth of the passage and rejection of this bill has been already calculated from your gallery, certified and countersigned in New York; and stuck up in significant handbills in every magnanimous stall in Liverpool, where they vend political economy and manufactured patriotism (as well as flimsy wares) for importation and consumption here. But, sir, the great mystery of our competition, in foreign markets, is that the English manufacturer cannot, and, if he could, he will not, (where he can avoid it,) sell his goods at our present reduced prices, where he can command the market.

The American manufacturer asks no better business than to sell his goods at the English market price, where the English manufacturer and merchant has the trade. One more instance, and I have done.

The English manufacturer, it is well known, has, for a long time, enjoyed a great and important trade in cotton yarn with the nations in the North of Europe. This is there manufactured into cloth. Any stuffing, imperfection, or deception, which might go off well enough in cloths sold here or there, must be avoided to retain this market. It is, therefore, policy for the manufacturer to make this an honest, fair article, and of course it is a fair article to compare prices upon; a fair criterion, and probably the only exact one in the whole range of our rival cotton and woollen manufactures. The English manufacturer, it is well known, is in the habit of putting the American stamp and mark on his own fabrics, from a consciousness of the difference in the value in goods of the same appearance.

How then stands the comparison? I have known for some time the general fact, that we were underselling the English manufacturer in this article. I have now a statement of the market prices of cotton goods generally in Manchester and Philadelphia, and the price of yarns, collated and compared, from No. 12 to 30 inclusive, which any gentleman may examine if he please, and have evidence of its accuracy, and he will find that the difference is nearer six than five per cent. in our favor. One thing more will appear from the examination, viz. that you can purchase one pound of good cotton cloth, of American manufacture, at about the same price that you can a pound of yarn in the English market. Sir, strange as it may seem, the American manufacturer, if he were permitted, could make a good business in sending cotton yarn and cotton goods to a British market, to Manchester itself.

In the other examples I have given, a general idea of the comparative difference of prices was intended only. This permits of accuracy, and may serve as a sample of the general and comparative state of the whole business, so far as our policy has extended.

Need any thing more, sir, be said to prove or demonstrate what I have proposed or asserted on this subject, viz. that the protection of domestic manufactures has had the effect to reduce the price of them in our own markets below the average of the prices of the same manufactures of other nations, and that American manufacturers do, and can furnish their fellow-citizens with all those articles, where the manufacturer is fairly protected, at lower prices than any other nation does, or can, or will furnish them for us.

If these things are so, it must settle this whole question, both in principle and practice; for, however extensive or confined our reasoning, theory, or speculation on this subject may be, if the country obtains its manufactures at a reduced price, in consequence of their protection, injustice, violence, and oppression, so much talked of, have ceased.

I had, sir, intended to have taken another and more general view of the relative claims and present attitude of the opposite parties in this question; but having already, as I find, extended my remarks to a greater length than I had proposed, at this late stage of the debate and the session, I shall close here, satisfied that if the intimate and friendly connexion between our manufactures and the agriculture of the South, Middle, and West, is, by some, yet unappreciated—if the assistance of our manufactures in producing the present extraordinary reduction in their prices throughout the whole country, beyond all former precedent and calculation, is, by some here, treated with indifference, the system is, by its own effects, fast establishing a character for itself.

Mr. CAMBRELENG followed, in a speech of the same length, in an examination of the bill, to show that it was inadequate to the object proposed; also, in reply to some of the views expressed by Mr. McDUFFIE on the one hand, and Mr. DAVIS on the other.

Mr. BATES, of Massachusetts, spoke a short time in reply to some of the remarks of Mr. CAMBRELENG.

Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, next rose, and addressed the committee more than an hour, in reply to Mr. McDUFFIE and Mr. CAMBRELENG, and in a general argument on the subject of debate. At four o'clock he gave way for a motion for the committee to rise, which prevailed.

SATURDAY, MAY 8, 1830.

NAVIGATION AND IMPOSTS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill reported by Mr. CAMBRELENG, respecting navigation and imposts.

Mr. STRONG rose, and addressed the House against the bill, until the expiration of the hour, without having finished his remarks.

THE TARIFF.

The House again resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. POLK in the chair, on the bill to amend the act in alteration of the several acts imposing duties on imports.

Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, resumed, and addressed the committee two hours in continuation and conclusion of the speech which he commenced yesterday.

Mr. E. said, that, being compelled to give a vote on the question now before the committee, he felt it his duty to submit the reasons which would govern him in giving that vote. And, in the first place, [said Mr. E.] I shall make one or two remarks in reply to the observations of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG] who has just taken his seat. I cannot but acknowledge that there is a better foundation in truth, than I could wish, for a portion of his remarks, and most assuredly to the extent in which they are so founded in truth, they show that the amendment ought not to prevail. The gentleman from New York admits that the manufacturers of New England (and of course among others, of my constituents) are in a depressed state. I thank the gentleman for the admission. In general, they are thus depressed; too many of them to the point of annihilation. What then becomes of the pictures which have been so freely drawn of our manufacturers in this debate, representing them as hungry monopolists, fattening on the distresses of the country, as purse-proud aristocrats, who have filled their pockets with money wrung by iniquitous laws from the hard earnings of the people? The manufacturers are many of them extremely depressed. Much of this capital has ceased to be productive. Some establishments, conducted with seeming prudence and care, have been broken down. Prodigious losses have been encountered, and large fortunes shaken. I beg the committee to give full faith, to this extent, to the description of the gentleman from New York, and contrast it with the view taken of our manufacturing interests by almost every other gentleman who has spoken in this debate on the same side of the question.

Another reflection forces itself on my mind, in consequence of the statement which the gentleman from New York has given of the condition of our manufacturers. Is this period of great and acknowledged depression a well chosen time for throwing down the whole system of legislation, on the faith of which these investments of capital have been made? If the manufacturers are so depressed, that they can scarce hold their heads above water, is it a moment, either kindly or wisely chosen, to strike in upon them, with a sweeping repeal, not only of the law of 1828, but of that of 1824, and, in addition to the pressure of the times, to withdraw from them the legislative protection under which, as you yourselves say, they have been forced into being? Surely not. By whatever arguments a gradual reduction of duties could be defended, the sweeping ruin of what is left of this branch of the national industry, by an act of legislation unheard of for comprehensive violence, would be wholly indefensible.

The gentleman from New York said that the laws of 1824 and 1828, imposing duties on imports, were the result of political speculation, the contrivance of ambitious men, and intended to effect the election of a New England President. If this is the case, it must be admitted that the New England delegation pursued a singular course. A large majority of its members voted against the laws.

[Mr. CAMBRELENG explained, that he did not apply that remark to the law of 1824, but to that of 1828; that, after the passage of the law of 1824, the manufacturers of wool complained that they suffered by the duty on the raw material, and that this duty was increased by the law of 1828, which therefore must have been supported from political calculation.]

Sir, [continued Mr. EVERETT] it needs no political calculation to lead men to take measures to preserve themselves from ruin. The manufacturers of wool found themselves in a state of great depression, after the passage of the law of 1824. What they had foreseen before its passage, had come to pass. The benefit they might have derived from the increase of the duty on cloth had been, in various ways, rendered unavailing; and, among others, by the enhanced duty on wool. It was not their fault that it was laid on. They sought a revision of the tariff, in which this evil would be remedied. The law which was passed in 1828, was not such a one as they desired. A majority of those most interested in the woollen manufacture, (a very large majority of the Massachusetts delegation,) voted against the law. Some of the representatives who voted for it, voted for it not as a good law, but as the best law they could hope for. They knew that the interest of the farmers must be consulted, and that no law could be passed which did not reconcile that interest with that of the manufacturer.

If the law of 1828 was passed from political calculations, let those who effected its passage from such motives be responsible. Those calculations are unknown to me, as forming any part of the motives of myself or those with whom I acted. On its passage through the House I voted against it. In the Senate it received some important modifications. On each of these, when the bill with its amendments came back to the House, I voted according to my opinion of its separate merits. How I should have voted had there been a question on the passage of the whole bill as amended, I will not undertake to say.

The gentleman speaks of consistency; of taking up a principle one day, and laying it down the next, and this from motives of political calculation. I ask no other principle to justify me, in every vote I have given on this subject, than that which is laid down in the report lately made by the gentleman himself, as chairman of the Committee on Commerce. "In adjusting," says the gentleman in that report, "a maximum and permanent rate of duty on foreign merchandise, to suit the political plan of a confederacy, and to regulate our intercourse with foreign nations, the committee are sensible of the necessity of having a just regard to the prosperity of our manufactures. The question is not now, whether we will or not establish protecting duties; that must of necessity be waived; the duties and the manufactures already exist."

That is the principle on which I act. It is a sound one. It is not for us, who, proceeding on this principle, support laws necessary to save the manufactures from ruin, to defend our consistency. That must be done by gentlemen who, holding the principle, are for repealing the laws. The abstract question of free trade is not before us. The system of commercial intercourse most advantageous to be pursued by all nations, if all would agree, in good faith, to unite in it, is not under consideration. The arguments which may be adduced on the expediency of embarking, for the first time, in the protecting policy, are not pertinent to the occasion. The duties have been laid; the manufactures have been brought into being. Capital has been, in many parts of the country, forced into this channel, against the known current of public sentiment. And now the question is, shall we consent to a sweeping repeal of these laws, and especially at a period which may be looked upon as a crisis in the fate of the manufacturers? Shall we break down the feeble barrier left against foreign competition, and the fluctuation of foreign markets? Such is not the view which I take of my duty to the interests committed to my charge.

It is the duty of every member of this House, who sees the lawful industry of his constituents in peril, especially if that industry has received its direction immediately from the legislation of the country, to take care that, under an adverse influence of the same legislation, it be not crushed. I know we are to pass laws for the whole people; and authorities of high note are quoted to us, from Great Britain, to show that we are to legislate for general and not for sectional interests. The case, however, of the British Parliament is widely different from that of the American Congress. Parliament is constituted with very little regard to geographical representation, the principle which lies at the basis of this House. If each member of this House does his duty, with intelligence and firmness, to the people who send him, I believe the interests of the country are much more likely to be consulted, than by striving after projects which shall at once comprehend the whole.

But I would not, from these remarks, have it thought that I feel it my duty to have an exclusive eye to the manufacturing interest, on the principle of representing my constituents. The district which I represent, extends to the seaboard. Many of its inhabitants are directly concerned in commerce, and the industry of still more is closely dependent on the prosperity of the neighboring commercial capital. Shipbuilding is a very important branch of the industry of those I represent; and some of the first vessels in our commercial marine are constructed by them. With all this, however, the mass of the people who send me here are farmers—the yeomanry of the country, who get their living from the soil, by the labor of their own hands. I ought to be led, and I hope I am led, in this way, to take a large view of all the great branches of national industry, and of their connexion with each other. It is true that some of the largest and most important manufacturing establishments in the United States are also in my district; but, important as they are, I should not feel justified in sacrificing all other interests to them. I will endeavor to pursue a course consistent with their common prosperity.

But I do not find such a course in the proposition which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McDUFFIE] has brought forward, by way of amendment to the bill before the committee. His proposed measure I regard as threatening immediate and entire ruin to the manufacturers, and consequential disaster to every other branch of the industry of the country. I consider it my duty, therefore, to go, at some length, into the examination of it. In doing this, however, much that I might have attempted to say has been anticipated. The argument against the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, and the examination of his course of reasoning, have been so ably pursued by my colleagues, [Messrs. DAVIS and GORHAM] that it will require no little caution, on my part, not to tread again over ground which has been so ably pre-occupied.

Did I agree with the gentleman from South Carolina, either as to the principles on which he proceeded, or the facts which he assumed, I should, in conscience, be obliged to go with him, and lend my aid to break down, as rapidly as possible, the protecting system of the country.

The gentleman stated, that a "reference to the treasury statements of the commerce of the United States will show that the whole amount of the domestic productions of the United States, annually exported to foreign countries, taking an average of years, is something less than fifty-eight millions of dollars. It may be estimated that those portions of the southern and southwestern States, which are engaged in the production of the great agricultural staples of cotton, tobacco, and rice, (constituting less than one-third part of the Union,) export to the amount of thirty-seven millions of dollars, and those portions of the States just mentioned, which are engaged in the production of cotton and rice, (constituting less than one-fifth of the Union,) export to the amount of thirty millions of dollars;" and the gentleman went on to argue that the amount of imports in these parts of the Union must be equal to this amount of exports, and consequently that a proportionate amount of the duties on imports (equal to two-thirds of the whole amount paid into the treasury from the duties on imports) is levied on the States growing rice, cotton, or tobacco.

I have looked at the treasury statements for the last eleven years, being as far back as I have the means at hand of pushing the inquiry, and I find that the average annual export of the three staples of cotton, rice, and tobacco, has been, not thirty-seven millions, at which the gentleman estimates it, but thirty-two millions, (or, in exact figures, thirty-two million sixteen thousand four hundred and sixty-five dollars,) and the average annual export of the single staple of cotton alone is not thirty millions, but less than twenty-five millions of dollars.

The average amount of imports for consumption, for the same period, I have not had the means of estimating. For the last five years, however, I have done it, in the following manner: I have taken the entire import, and deducted from it the amount of foreign merchandise re-exported. The remainder may be considered as giving, in a series of years, the average amount of foreign merchandise imported for consumption. This annual average I find to be, for the last five years, just sixty-one millions ($61,002,658) of dollars.

The first remark, then, that I shall make, in reply to the statement of the gentleman from South Carolina, is, that, even on his own principles, he has greatly overstated the amount of duty paid by the staple-growing States. The average export of the staples is thirty-two millions, not thirty-seven; and of the chief of them, cotton, twenty-five millions, not thirty. The average amount of imports, consumed in the country, is sixty-one millions. Of these, the staples, in the gentleman's own view of the subject, pay but thirty-two millions, very little more than a half. On the other, twenty-nine millions, if it be only granted to me that they are not given to the consumer, that they are somehow or other bought and paid for, the planter of the staples does not pay the duties. These twenty-nine millions, out of sixty-one, whatever they consist of, tea, coffee, silk, wine, cutlery, woollens, linens—whatever the articles are, must be paid for by the consumer; and paid for by some articles produced by him, or the fruits of his labor, in one form or other. In a word, on the gentleman's own view of the subject, (which, however, I shall strive to show is unfounded in principle,) the States that grow cotton, rice, and tobacco, pay but one-half instead of two-thirds of the duties. With respect to the remaining half, the rest of the Union may, with equal propriety, adopt the language which the gentleman puts into the mouth of the southern planter. We pay the duties on them, for they are paid for by our produce, or the fruits of our industry.

It is true we have no great staples. The gentleman from South Carolina said, we exported nothing but a few hundred thousand dollars worth of potash.

[Mr. McDUFFIE said he spoke of exports to Europe.] But if we send nothing but a few potashes to Europe, I should like to know what Europe gets for all her products, which we consume. There may be but one link, or ten, in the chain of communication; but, eventually, the great amount of European produce, which the northern and middle States consume, must be paid for by the exportation of the fruits of the labor of those States, and for this reason the duties on that merchandise must, on the gentleman's principles, be paid for by those States. But the truth is, our exports are not quite so insignificant, as to be passed over without enumeration. The rice, which he thinks alone worthy, with two other southern staples, to be specified, was, last year, but about one-quarter part of the vegetable food exported. The fisheries, in their various branches, yielded over one million eight hundred thousand dollars for exportation. The productions of the forest fell but a little short of four millions; and various articles of manufactures exported, amounted to nearly six millions. In addition to this, was the great item of tonnage, the value of which, in its total amount my colleague [Mr. GORHAM] has estimated at eleven millions per annum. These are the products, by which we pay for our imported merchandise. It matters not in what form the payment is made. It may be rice, cotton, and tobacco. It may be fish, timber, or freight. The result is, that sixty-one millions are annually imported for consumption, and pay duties; and that, as the staple-growing States export but thirty-two millions, the other States must export twenty-nine millions at least, and pay taxes on that amount of the imports, on the principle of the gentleman himself, and those who hold this new theory in common with him.

It is true, our products do not strike the imagination like those of the genial South. They are frequently named, only to be derided. Another gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BLAIR] speaks of our clocks and notions; and I ought, perhaps, to thank him for not adding wooden nutmegs to the list. But the products which we exchange for our foreign merchandise represent the skill, the industry, the freedom of our laborious free citizens. Do the exports of other States represent any thing better?

We are told of the rich fruits which a Divine Providence has bestowed exclusively on the southern portion of the country, and are left to infer a somewhat painful contrast with its less favored regions. Sir, I will be led into no such contrast. I admire, as much as any gentleman on this floor, the display of the bountiful provision which has been made for our southern brethren; and I wish them cordially the full enjoyment of it. I have witnessed it, under circumstances to give it all its force, upon the senses and the imagination, having, in the space of three weeks, in the course of the last year, passed from a region covered with ice and snow, to one where the orange tree and the pomegranate were in flower, and the sugar cane and cotton plant covered the soil. I feel and appreciate the richness of these natural bounties; I rejoice in them as the gifts of a kind Providence to my native land. Haud equidem invidio miror magis. Our lot is cast in a region less favored in this respect, but not therefore to be disparaged. No, not in the amount of its products, which equals that of those rich staples.

Then, too, is to be considered, and this alone is an answer to much of the gentleman's argument, that these southern staples represent no small amount of the fruits of the labor of the other States. But for this, it would be absolutely unaccountable and incredible that three millions of the population should export to even one-half of the amount of the foreign merchandise consumed. Let any man consider the distribution which the cotton planter would make of the avails of his crop, if he brought it himself to Charleston or New Orleans, and exchanged it in the way of barter for his supplies, and he will find that a good portion represents the labor of the West and North. This explains what would otherwise be inexplicable, that in a country so large as this, and indulging in so large a consumption of imported merchandise, three millions of the population, confined to one part of the Union, should export even one-half of the returns, and the great and rich consuming States of Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, and all New England not the other half.

The solution is, that what, in its last form, is a southern staple, is, in reality, in part, the produce of the other portions of the country. Of the European articles received in return, the planting States pay tax on that portion which they consume, and no more. No more, on the gentleman's own principles: for every consumer is a producer. He pays for what he consumes by what he produces, and can pay in no other manner. And what he consumes he takes with all its burdens.

But it is replied to this, although the southern States do not directly consume the whole of what is brought from Europe in exchange for the staple products exported by them, yet that the various articles of supply which they obtain from the manufacturing States (the indirect exchange of their staples) come charged higher, by all the amount of the duty. In reference to my present purpose, which is to refute the new doctrine, (that the exporter, and not the consumer of the article imported, pays the tax) it is a sufficient rejoinder to this, that, in this case, the planter pays the tax as a consumer, not as a producer. To this point, in fact, we return at the end of every illustration, and we see in it the entire fallacy of the novel propositions advanced on this subject.

MAY 8, 1830.]

The Tariff.

Another consideration will put this in a still clearer light. The gentleman from South Carolina maintains that the planter pays the tax on the imported articles received in exchange for his exported staples; and this tax he puts at an average of forty-five per cent. Now, then, it is clear, that, if this tax were removed, if the planter had formerly paid it, he would now save this forty-five per cent.; he would put it in his pocket. South Carolina, for instance, supposing her now to be making no profit whatever from her agricultural staples, would, if the tariff were repealed, make forty-five per cent. on the yearly amount of the crop; and each planter would receive that clear income. Out of every one hundred bales which he sent to market, forty-five would be clear profit, supposing him now to be making absolutely nothing. This, I say, is the consequence of the new doctrine, that the planter pays the tax. But can any man seriously believe it, that such a state of things would last a day, or any longer than would be necessary for the adjustment to take place, which is inseparable from every change in the condition of a branch of industry. The planter would not, probably, pocket one farthing of this forty-five per cent.; and why not? Because those who were disposed to hold up their cotton at the old price, and make a profit of forty-five per cent., would find neighbors content with forty, and who would sell at forty, and this would bring the market price down to forty per cent. profit. But thirty-five per cent. would content others, and thirty per cent. would content others, till, in the end, those whose necessities obliged them to sell, would be ready to sell at the old rate, that is, forty-five per cent. cheaper than they sold while they paid the tax, now taken off. This would bring down the price of the whole article in the market, and the planter would find that the only effect of producing his staple forty-five per cent. cheaper, would be that he would have to sell it forty-five per cent. cheaper; and how would this mend his condition?

I shall be told, perhaps, that if the price of the article were thus reduced, the demand for it would be proportionably increased, and so much the more would be raised and exported from the southern States. But this would not remedy the evil now complained of, that of low prices. It would only increase the production at the present prices. Cotton lands now uncultivated would be brought into cultivation. If the state of the cotton planters be such as is described to us, this is an event rather to be deprecated than wished for. No advantage, therefore, would accrue to the planters from the repeal of the tax, beyond that which he shares proportionably with every other member of the community, in the alleviation of the public burdens.

The gentleman from South Carolina admitted, as a general rule, that the consumer paid the tax; but he said the case of the southern planters was an exception to this rule; they were a class of producers, who could not throw the burden of the tax on the consumer, but must pay it themselves. My worthy colleague [Mr. GORHAM] admitted two cases where the producer did pay the tax levied on the articles imported in exchange for his produce: one where the producer consumes all the return; the other where the taxed article comes in competition with an untaxed article of the same kind. But the first case is, of course, only a nominal exception. The planter is taxed on his consumption, as every other consumer is. If he choose to consume the entire fruit of his industry unproductively, he pays, of course, the consumption tax on all he produces; but he pays it as consumer, not as producer. This, then, does not bear out the new theory in principle.

The other case, in which the consumer, it is admitted, would throw the tax on the producer, is that where the taxed article comes in competition with the untaxed article. But this case can never exist longer than is required for the market to rectify itself, from an unnatural temporary state. No act and no power can keep two articles permanently in the market, which are produced at different cost; and sell at the same price. Let the experiment be tried with coins of gold and silver, whose nominal value is the same, and whose intrinsic value is different. It is imagined, I believe, that foreign imports, competing in our market with our own manufactured articles, the former paying duties and the latter not, do precisely form a case of a taxed article coming in competition with an untaxed one, in which the producer pays the tax. But not at all. By an untaxed article, in this case, is meant one unburdened in any way; one produced as cheap as the taxed article, with the exception of the tax. In this case, of course, it is plain that the producer, if he will bring his taxed article to the market, must pay the tax himself. But if the untaxed article costs as much, for any reason, as the taxed article with the duty upon it, the two articles will sell for the same price, and the consumer must pay the tax; he cannot throw the burden on the producer, because he cannot, by refusing to take the taxed article, get the untaxed one cheaper.

There is, then, no case where, in a regular and permanent course of trade, the consumer throws the tax on the producer; or, what is the same thing, in which, if the tax were repealed, the price would not fall.

The idea, then, that the southern planter, and he alone, bears the tax on the imports purchased by his produce, that he alone cannot throw the burden on the consumer; or, the contrary, that on him alone the consumer throws the burden, is as unfounded as it is paradoxical. The sixty millions of foreign articles introduced for consumption are purchased by sixty millions worth of the produce of the labor of the consumers. This consumption is scattered most diffusively over the country. If it take place to a greater extent in one section than another, that section was not the southern States. Now it is said, of all the producers of the articles given in exchange for these sixty millions, the southern planters, who furnish about half, cannot throw the tax on the consumer; and why not? But, to support this proposition, no substantial reason appears to be given. Every other branch of industry struggles with the like competition as cotton planting. The gentleman says that the Carolina cotton planter comes in competition with the Brazilian, in a market where the Carolinian pays a tax on the goods he receives in return of forty-five per cent., and the Brazilian of only fifteen. In other words, the Carolinian, selling at the same nominal price as the Brazilian, takes pay in coin containing forty-five per cent. alloy, and the Brazilian in coin containing only fifteen per cent. alloy. Such a state of things is wholly impossible, under the known laws of trade; but, supposing it possible, it would prove that the American cotton planter could, and did defy all competition.

There is no process, by which the northern consumer throws off the tax, which is not open to the southern planter. It is said that the northern consumer can change his pursuit, can emigrate, but that the southern planter must live and die on his plantation. Is this so? Certainly not. There is no form in which a large capital can exist, in which more of it will be easily transferable, than an investment in a cotton plantation. The whole Southwest is open to the cotton planter. The part of it which is settled, has been mostly settled by him. He has found a new soil and cheap lands, and ready access to market. Unquestionably the cause why the staple is cheaper, is, that for these and other reasons it can be produced cheaper; not (as is maintained) because the difference of price comes out of the planter's pocket.

But the cotton, rice, and tobacco planters have another resource from the burdens of the tariff, created by the tariff itself; a resource, I am well persuaded, thus far so effectual, that it has been more beneficial to the planting States, than all the other provisions of the laws have to the manufacturing States. It is my deliberate opinion, that hitherto the States most benefited by the laws for protection of manufactures, lie south of the Potomac. The southern States have a monopoly of a species of property, increasing in numbers, and which would, under other circumstances, decrease in value: I mean their slaves. Their numbers are supposed to amount to two millions, and their average value at present, I am told, may be safely taken at two hundred dollars each; forming a money capital of four hundred millions. Now, in the nature of things, and in the present state of the cotton, rice, and tobacco market, the value of the slaves to their masters would be constantly declining. The sugar culture, which has grown up in Louisiana, under the tariff laws, has created a new demand for labor, which is met principally from the old Atlantic States. I know that this trade is regarded as discreditable to the South; that the last thing the planter will part with, is his servants. But in the division of estates, in the execution of judgments, in the punishment of misconduct, cases arise, under the laws of the country, in which these sales take place, and by them the demand for Louisiana is supplied. I am told that the effect of this demand on the value of slaves is equal to one hundred per cent.; that the whole mass of this property is enhanced or kept from falling to that extent; in other words, that the labor of the South, now amounting to a moneyed capital of four hundred millions, would not, but for this circumstance, be worth more than two hundred millions at this moment—and that rapidly declining. Here, then, is one operation of the tariff, creating to the southern planter a capital of two hundred millions of dollars, or twelve millions annually.

Can any man point out any such benefit, accruing from the same source, to the manufacturing States? The culture of sugar has already reached an average crop, probably, of seventy thousand hogheads. The last season was a bad one, but the two preceding seasons averaged that amount. This, with the molasses, is worth about eight millions of dollars. Of these eight millions, the West, for food and machinery, gets perhaps a million and a half. A single iron-master, on the Cumberland river, in Tennessee, sold last year to the sugar planters fifty-six thousand dollars of articles fabricated at his furnaces; and twenty-five steam engines, for sugar mills, were furnished by a house on the Ohio river. The North supplies the sugar planter with a million of dollars in clothing, miscellaneous articles, and tonnage. Three millions of dollars go to the planting States for slaves; and I have the opinion in writing of persons as well informed as any in the United States, that the effect of this demand is what I have stated it to be.

I shall be told, perhaps, that this state of things is temporary. I answer, it exists now; and while it exists, and as long as it exists, the most active benefits of the tariff are south of the Potomac. How long this state of things will last, I do not know; no man knows. I believe it will be a distant day, before the supply overtakes the demand, and before Louisiana will cease to depend for her labor on other States. And before that day arrives, who shall foresee what explosion may take place in the tropics, (the volcanic region of the political as of the physical world,) which will make Louisiana a much more important region in the sugar market than it is now? Thirty years ago, the West Indies were to the cotton market what they now are to the sugar market. Thirty years ago, and our northern cotton mills, then just erected, and on a small scale, went to the West Indies for their cotton. A member of Congress, from South Carolina, expressed the opinion, that, if a good seed could be procured, cotton would, with proper protection, grow in Carolina; and, accordingly, a duty of three cents a pound was laid on the cotton consumed by our infant manufacturing establishments, to enable our southern brethren to go and study the botany of the tropics, and find a species of the cotton plant which would thrive in Carolina. Our northern manufacturers complained that a duty should be laid on the raw material required for their fabrics, not to protect, not to encourage a branch of southern industry, but for what seemed the chimerical speculation of creating a new kind of culture. General Hamilton said the duty ought to be repealed; but it was kept on. It was then a protecting duty. It protected southern agriculture, at the expense of northern manufactures. I believe our southern brethren then did not deem it either unconstitutional or oppressive. It was not the only duty of the same character in the first tariff, that of 1789, for indigo, hemp, and manufactured tobacco were burdened with duties, for the same reason. But such was the state of the cotton market thirty years ago. Within the same period, the finest of the sugar islands has, in a manner, been blotted from the map of the world. In 1788, the value of the sugar produced in St. Domingo was twenty millions of dollars; in 1822, the last year for which I have official information, it was but one hundred and thirty thousand dollars. Do gentlemen think the process is to stop here? I am no prophet, sir; I pretend not to calculate the malignant aspect of the stars for other regions. But I see nothing in the fated islands of the West Indian archipelago, that looks like stability. Thus far the planting interest of the South has been more benefited by the tariff, in the way I have described, than any other interest; and taking history and experience for the guide, he is a bold man, who will undertake to fix the time when this state of things will cease to exist.

It is, I suppose, this view of the subject, which has lately occasioned the adoption of the following resolutions by the Legislature of Louisiana, unanimously, I believe, in the Senate of that State, and with a very small dissenting minority in the House of Representatives.

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Louisiana, in General Assembly convened, That the General Assembly of this State do not concur in the views and sentiments expressed by the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, relative to the tariff of 1828; and that the Legislature of this State does not perceive any unconstitutionality in adopting such measures.

"Resolved, &c. That we highly approve of the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Vermont, by which they have declared the law of 1828, on the tariff, to be constitutional, expedient, and harmless to the southern States, or any other of our sister States.

"Resolved, &c. That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to accede to and support such measures as those that are contemplated by the law of 1828 on the tariff."

It will be recollected that this is the expression of the opinion of a State, by no means exclusively a sugar-planting State; of a State of which cotton is still the great staple. I pretend not to assign the motives of the gentleman from South Carolina, in leaving untouched the duty on foreign sugars, while he proposes to remove almost every duty which protects the industry of the middle and northern States. I do not blame him for retaining a duty, which is of vital importance to the southern country. But, on the same principle on which he is willing to retain the duty on sugar, he must allow me to vote against the repeal of those parts of the law which he desires to abrogate, but which are important to my constituents. Shall he except from a sweeping repeal of the laws, the single feature of it, which is so signally beneficial to the planting interest, that it has attached one entire planting State to the protecting system? and shall not I oppose the indiscriminate repeal of that whole system, involving the ruin of all the interests which have grown up under it?

And here I may observe, in reply to a remark made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG] on the subject of voting for protecting duties from motives of personal interest, that no such motive operates on me. I reside, it is true, in a manufacturing country, but have no interest in manufacturing establishments, nor any which is beneficially affected by them; nor, if every factory were burned down to-morrow, would it concern me in any other way than such a waste of property would concern every other citizen in the community. But to return to the argument.

The Tariff.

[H. of R.]

I have endeavored thus far, in reply to the gentleman from South Carolina, to re-establish the doctrine that the tax falls on the consumer. I shall now offer a consideration to prove that this tax is not so oppressive as has been represented. The tax falls not on the immediate, but on the ultimate consumer: that is, on the individual by whom, in its last form, it is unproductively consumed, either as a necessary of life, or as an article to which habit and custom have given the character of a necessary of life. The tax on such articles, in a country like this, where there is a perfect equality of rights, a great similarity of condition, unusual facility in change of situation and pursuit, and a boundless region of new land, is, in reality, levied on the entire consumption, or, what is the same thing, the entire income of the country. The moment any one pursuit is taxed above the average of the other, capital is driven from it, till the equilibrium is brought about. The burden laid on imported articles is, therefore, equally diffused over the entire income of the country. What is that income?

The gentleman from South Carolina has estimated it at three hundred and fifty millions per annum—I am inclined to think this much too small. I would rate it at not less than one thousand millions. Let us consider a few items that must enter into the estimate. The population is at least twelve millions; the federal numbers have ever been estimated to amount to twelve millions.

The food of 12,000,000 of persons, at 40 cents per week, which is but 5.7 cents per day, or $20.75 per annum, would amount to

Clothing for 12,000,000, at $17 per annum, -

The food of all the animals, estimated as equivalent to three millions of horses, at $25 each per annum, -

This is the amount of the estimated cost of the food and clothing of the population, and the food of the domestic animals. I do not think it extravagant to assume that, over and above the necessary annual consumption for food and clothing, the entire annual expenditure for houses, ships, and every other kind of building; for roads, canals, and every other kind of public and private improvement; for public institutions of all kinds, together with the amount of income annually saved and added, in these or any other forms, to the accumulating wealth of the country, ought to be taken at an amount at least equal. I therefore set down the whole annual income of the country at one thousand millions of dollars.

On this annual income there is charged, say twenty-four millions of dollars. This is a tax of two and four-tenths per cent., which cannot be called a very heavy burden. But it must be remembered that a part only of the tax on the articles imported is to be set down to the protecting system. A very considerable part of the duties would, at all events, be assessed for revenue. If I should admit, however, (what is very far above the truth,) that eight millions out of the twenty-four are a protecting tax, and that to this extent the manufacturing system is a tax on the income of the country, it would amount to one-eighth part of one per cent. on this income! And now, sir, I will not cavil at a few hundred millions in estimating the annual income of the people of the United States. I mean, seriously, that if any gentleman thinks I take it too high at one thousand millions, I will let him reduce it one-half, to five hundred millions. A protecting tax of eight millions is, at that rate, one and three-fifths per cent. upon the income of the country. This is the burden which is laid by the protecting system on our industry.

In reply to the suggestion that the southern planter had the option to take specie in return for his exports, it was argued by the gentleman from South Carolina, that England, having no mines, had no specie to give; and that if she had, we had no use for it, as it is not an article to be consumed. It was justly urged by my colleague, [Mr. GORHAM] that though England had no mines, she was nevertheless the great specie market of the world. In reply to the second objection of the gentleman, that we could not take specie to advantage, because we do not wish to consume it, I observe, that, though not consumable itself, it is the representative of all consumable things. If the manufactured articles to be imported, are, as the gentleman says, taxed forty-five per cent., he cannot suppose that, in the great emporium of the world, the English market, there is no article of commerce, and no course of trade in which the southern planter could not make a more advantageous return investment.

But if the exporter paid the tax, as the gentleman says, when he takes goods thus burdened, it would be not merely his interest to take specie—the Liverpool trader would compel him to take it. On the supposition that the producer of the staples consents to receive in pay goods really worth to him forty-five per cent. less than their nominal value, and less than their cost to the manufacturer in England, the English manufacturer would choose to pay him in specie. For one hundred pounds worth of cotton he would offer him a cash price a little in advance of the fifty-five pounds, which is all (on this supposition) that the planter is to get in goods. The goods, as a consequence, would not be exported to this country. The demand for them would increase, and with it the price which they would command. Specie, meantime, would rise in England, and in the result, as the want of the goods was felt in America, the planter would be enabled to throw the tax on the consumer: it would, of course, cease to be his interest to take payment in specie instead of goods; and trade would return to its natural channel. This is the process which constantly goes on; and specie is the chief vehicle by which those transfers of capital are effected, which prevent burdens from accumulating upon any one branch.

I will but mention one other consequence which would flow from the new doctrine, and then leave that part of the subject to the candid judgment of the House. The produce of the staple pays the duty on the imported article, says the new theory. This duty, in the average, is said by the gentleman to be forty-five per cent. I believe it to be much less; but the amount, at present, is immaterial. Whatever the aggregate be, the separate duties vary in amount. Cottons are said, by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, to range from twenty-seven to one hundred and twenty-five per cent.; woollens from forty-five to one hundred and sixty-eight; and iron from one hundred and twenty-five to one hundred and eighty. All these articles, with all their duties, are imported in exchange for southern staples, and the southern planter pays the duty, says the theory. Of course, the first planter who gets to market, will take the article least burdened. The next comer will take the next most favorable article; while the unfortunate individual who comes last, and who has (by the supposed iniquitous operation of these laws) to furnish to the consumer, out of his one hundred pounds worth of cotton, one hundred pounds worth of iron, will have, in addition to all his cotton, to pay out of his pocket eighty pounds sterling. And the new theory supposes that this kind of trade has been carried on for years between the United States and Great Britain.

The gentleman from South Carolina made a remark or two upon the English corn laws, denying that they furnished any just ground for the protecting system in America, or that the American manufacturers wished their repeal. It certainly, however, is an opinion resting on unsuspicious authority, that the existence of the British laws restricting the importation of foreign grain were an efficient cause of the adoption of the system of protecting duties in this country. On this subject, Mr. Addington, the British charge d'affaires at Washington, (whose correspondence with his Government shows him to have been a very attentive observer of the passage of the law of 1824, through Congress,) thus writes to Mr. Canning, in a letter bearing date 30th May, 1824: "I have only to add that, had no restrictions on the importation of foreign grain existed in Europe generally, and especially in Great Britain, I have little doubt that the tariff would never have passed through either House of Congress, since the great agricultural States, and Pennsylvania especially, the main mover of the question, would have been indifferent, if not opposed to its enactment."

It is said that, if the British duties on foreign corn were repealed, we could not export it—that we should be undersold by the corn of the North of Europe. But, in point of fact, whenever the British ports have been opened, we have exported it to that country, and we do constantly export it to markets where the corn of the North of Europe meets ours. When the canal is completed from the Ohio river to Lake Erie, and other channels of communication now in progress are open, so that corn from the interior shall come to be transported, by a canal or a railroad, to the seaboard, I cannot be induced to believe that corn, which can be and is raised for twelve and a half cents the bushel, will be undersold by any thing which grows in Poland or the Crimea, in any market in Europe.

The gentleman from South Carolina says that the manufacturers would deprecate the repeal of the corn laws, because, by enabling the British manufacturer to work cheaper, and export his fabrics cheaper, our establishments would be undermined and ruined. If this be so, we certainly ought to deprecate the repeal. If the grain-growing States, as Mr. Addington says, have caused the passage of laws, under which a great amount of property has been invested in the manufacturing States, it would be very strange if these last States (which are not grain-growing) did not deprecate the repeal of the corn laws, which was to ruin their manufactures, without affording them any equivalent.

It is not my province to comment on the British corn laws; but as it is frequently stated that Great Britain has set the example of repealing her protecting system, I think it proper to observe that she has repealed those parts of it which protected nothing, and she retains those parts that exclude foreign articles, and, above all, the corn laws. And this is described to be more burdensome than all the other taxes of the kingdom—equal to the whole burden of the national debt. The gentleman from South Carolina estimates the annual burden of the corn laws at twenty-four millions of pounds sterling. A popular writer on political economy, (Mr. McCulloh) in one aspect of the subject, is disposed to estimate it at thirty-six millions of pounds sterling. It is plain that no ministry could break down a system that involved a capital of thirty-six or twenty-four millions sterling. Mr. Canning introduced, and passed through the House of Commons, a bill, admitting foreign corn on a graduated duty, which was abandoned, on the adoption in the House of Lords of an amendment proposed by the Duke of Wellington; and the law was left where it stood in 1822, a prohibition till the price rose to seventy shillings sterling the quarter

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] reminds me that, by a subsequent law, it is now admitted. But the abstract of that law, given in the annual report from the Treasury Department, shows that the duty is still so high as to leave the prohibition in fact unaffected; and it was declared by Mr. Huskisson "to be the object of the bill to give protection up to a certain point, and to exclude the introduction of foreign corn as much as possible."

A moment's reflection will show us that no administration of that Government could break down the system of the corn laws, if its extent is at all what it is described to be. Twenty-four millions sterling is the interest, at three per cent., of a capital of four thousand millions of dollars. To repeal the corn laws would be to make that capital change hands; enough of itself to cause a revolution. The burden of the corn laws is said to equal that of the national debt. To pay the national debt, (that is, to reproduce the capital which has been consumed, of which the debt is the representative,) would no doubt be a great public benefit. But to sponge it out, by an act of bankruptcy, would be assessing it on the creditors of the Government, instead of the whole people, and would convulse society. Similar effects would attend the abolition of the corn laws, if their effect is what it is described to be.

But if this repeal could take place, and every thing else go on in England as before, it is very doubtful whether it would operate to the ruin of our manufacturers, as the gentleman from South Carolina supposes. The sum of twenty-four millions a year probably does not amount to eight per cent. on the annual product of the industry of Great Britain. If the whole of the relief produced by the repeal were applied to the reduction of the price of all the products of labor, it would amount to a reduction of only eight per cent.—an injurious reduction, no doubt, to our manufacturers, but not a third as formidable as the frauds daily practised under the revenue laws, against which it is the object of the bill before us to guard.

The gentleman from South Carolina, having endeavored to show that the revenue of the country is unequally collected, attempted to establish the fact that it was unequally distributed; that, being mostly collected in the South, it was mostly disbursed in the North; and, in this connexion, he enlarged on a topic, which he thought had not been duly considered in national politics—the effect of a Government expenditure on the industry of a country. I am inclined to think this effect greatly overrated, at least in a country like ours, where annual expenditure must be met by annual taxation. Any State in the Union, said the gentleman, would be willing to tax its citizens one million, for the sake of having the Government expend two millions within its limits. The State that should do this, would, in my opinion, act very unwisely. Government expenditure is not Government donation; for the two millions expended within the State, two millions of its property are consumed or carried away, and, if you please, advantageously; but it is only the profit on two millions that is gained by the State or its citizens; and the State that would tax its citizens one million of dollars, to enable its citizens to receive the ordinary commercial profit on two, would act a very unwise part.

As to the alleged inequality of the distribution, I believe a careful examination would show it to be much smaller than the gentleman represents it. I admit that there is an inequality in the distribution of the payment, on account of the public debt: a larger proportion of this payment is made north of the Potomac, than south of it. But this is because more was lent to the Government north of the Potomac, than south of it. A part of the national debt was created by this assumption of the revolutionary State debts, and this assumption was the result of a compromise, of which the condition was, that the seat of the General Government should be moved as far south as the banks of the Potomac, (5th Marshall's Washington, p. 260.) Our southern brethren will retain their part of the benefits of the compromise; our part is rapidly wearing away; and the national debt will now so soon be paid off, that the inequality in the distribution of the payment of it, ought not to enter into a general estimate of the distribution of the permanent expenditure of the Government. Of the naval expenditure, I will admit that, under some heads—those of navy yards and construction—perhaps three-fourths of the expenditures are north of the Potomac. But of the six navy yards, one is at Norfolk, and one at this place; and of the northern stations, one, at least, is not the seat of great expenditure. The item of pay afloat, which is perhaps one-fourth of the whole, I presume, is mostly expended abroad. Of the remaining three-fourths, it is possible that two-thirds are expended north of the Potomac; making but one-half of the whole.

The residue of the expenditure of the Government is either equally diffused, or takes place in greater proportion to the South. The salaries of the Government officers, of all classes, are geographically distributed. The diplomatic expenditure takes place abroad, and the South receives her full share of its benefits. The heavy charge of fortifications preponderates at the South: here, too, the greater part of the expense of the army accrues. The enormous and growing expenditure of our Indian relations is mostly at the South. Our whole military establishment had its origin in the Indian relations of the country. I know the military defence of the country against any foe, savage or civilized, is an institution for the general good, wherever the expenditure is made; but the same may be said of the navy, and of the public debt. In short, this subject, I think, is much misunderstood. I believe if one were to go through the appropriation bills, and trace to their ulterior destinations the entire expenditures of the Government, he would find them distributed with great approach to equality throughout the Union.

But the comparison between a Government expenditure in this country, and that of the British Government during their long war, which the gentleman rated quite within bounds at one hundred millions of dollars annually, entirely fails. In Great Britain, in consequence of the credit enjoyed by the Government, a hundred millions of dollars were annually raised by loans, and thrown into circulation; and as even the annual interest of the former loans was defrayed by new loans, there was no immediate charge upon the people, and the whole operation was an addition for the time of so much to the national wealth. But in this country, and in any country where the supplies of the year are raised by taxation within the year, a Government expenditure is but taking from one pocket to put into another. Every dollar expended among the people must first be taken from the people by taxation. There could therefore neither be advantage on the one side, nor hardship on the other, until the gentleman could make out his case of unequal collection and unequal distribution; in the attempt to do which, in my judgment, he has wholly failed.

The gentleman from South Carolina painted, in very strong colors, the distress of the planting States. I listened to his remarks on this topic with great interest. I am not at all disposed to underrate their force; and, did I agree in the correctness of the views of the gentleman on this subject, I could not take the course I do. But I must think some of his facts mistaken, and this opinion of the cause of the depression of the planting interests not less so. Listening with great attention to collect the facts by which he illustrated the extent of the distress of the planting States, I could distinguish but these three: first, that cotton now sells for but ten cents per pound, whereas it formerly sold for thirty; secondly, that the labor of the slave is worth but twelve and a half cents per day, whereas that of the free laborer of the manufacturing States is worth at least fifty cents per day; and lastly, that there is a general and melancholy dilapidation of estates, and impoverishment of families, indicative of a rapid decline. A word or two on each topic.

When cotton was thirty cents per pound, land, labor, supplies, and every thing else, must have been proportionably high. There is, therefore, not such a reduction in the real price as there would seem to be. Or, if cotton did sell for thirty cents, while it cost but eight to raise it, this was a price so extravagant and unnatural, that it must inevitably lead to speculation, over-production, and disastrous reaction. It could not last two seasons, and would carry in itself the germ of wide-spread ruin.

There has no doubt been a decline of the real price, but it is exceedingly doubtful if the tariff has had any agency in producing it. The gentleman from South Carolina did not ascribe the depression exclusively to the tariff, but argued only that it added to the pre-existing distress. The great evil has been the uniformity of pursuit in the planting States, and the too rapid extension of this culture, caused by the opening of the new lands. The general effect of the state of the world has contributed to the same end. The depression is universal. Labor has become less valuable by a change from war to peace, as was well stated by my colleague, [MR. DAVIS] and still more, perhaps, by the multiplication of labor-saving machinery.

The labor of the slave, said the gentleman, is worth twelve and a half cents a day, and that of the free laborer fifty cents. Twelve and a half cents a day, leaving out Sundays and thirteen holidays, is thirty-six dollars a year. This, I am advised, is less than the annual hire of the slave. In other words, the labor of a slave is worth, beyond the expense of keeping him, more than thirty-six dollars per year. This slave will cost his master not more than three hundred dollars. So that, what the gentleman calls very poor property, yields twelve per cent. Of this kind of property there is much more in the South, than there is manufacturing property in the North; and there is very little manufacturing stock, which yields, in any quantity, more than half the interest specified. But I know no such contrast exists, to the advantage of the South, as these facts would seem to show. The productive labor there is charged with the support of a great deal of unproductive labor. But the free citizen of the North, out of his fifty cents a day, has also to support his children, who are too young, and his parents, who are too old to work; and the colder climate, higher standard of living among the laboring classes, and the necessity of bearing a part of the burdens of society, as free citizens, are all charges upon the wages paid to the northern laborer.

The gentleman spoke, in strong and beautiful language, of the decay of fine estates, and the desolation of the hospitable mansions of the last generation. These are statements, not to be listened to with any other feelings than those of sincere and respectful sympathy. The fame of the hospitality of the South is as wide-spread as our Union, and as old as our history. I would be the last to wish that any of its honest and honorable sources should be dried up. But it is not the tariff which has caused its decline. I might even suggest that the fact itself is perhaps overstated. Where a conspicuous family mansion passes into other hands, and a great estate vanishes, the melancholy fact strikes our notice, and produces a strong impression upon the community. But the successive rise of new fortunes is far less calculated to be observed. I can scarcely suppose that none of those hospitable establishments, which have dropped into decay, have been succeeded by others, which have risen into opulence.

But grant the decline to be more general than I am apt to think, it is not the tariff law which has occasioned it.

H. of R.]

The Tariff.

[MAY 8, 1830.]

It is the statute of distributions, of which gentlemen must complain, if they wish estates to be kept together. Ever since I have heard any thing of the South, I have heard this complaint; and considerably before the tariff law of 1816, that, whereas the nature of their property required estates to exist in a pretty ample extent, they were constantly broken up by partition, to the ruin of ancient families; and with these causes it was supposed that the climate, and a certain generous profusion, springing from very amiable feelings, but not reconcilable with thrift, might have co-operated. But, be the cause what it will, the effect is older than any tariff law, except that of 1789; and, for the truth of this proposition, I appeal to every gentleman who hears me.

But the evil is not confined to the South. It exists notoriously in every other part of the country. The same decay of families is conspicuous in New England. In our large cities, it is almost proverbial that the splendid mansion of one generation is a boarding-house in the next. I do not remember a family rich by inherited wealth for three generations. It is, as the gentleman describes it, sad to contemplate, in the individual instance—sad that the children should so seldom die beneath the roof of their fathers; that names endeared by liberality and benefactions to one generation, should be forgotten, or remembered only as objects of commiseration in the next. But we consider the whole operation as the healthiest in the political system, effecting a constant infusion of new, untainted blood. It is an operation by which merit, thrift, and industry get their share in the great prizes of life, which are no longer distributed by the lottery of birth. It is a republican distribution of estates, not effected by cut-throat agrarian laws, such as have been alluded to in this debate, but by the gentle hand of nature, under the dictates of the kindest affections, sanctioned by a wise legislation.

The gentleman from South Carolina spoke in the harshest terms which the language affords of the "monopolists" of the manufacturing States. I cannot persuade myself that the gentleman would deliberately repeat himself half of what he uttered on this topic; in the order of the debate; but if I wished him to give a description of those engaged in manufactures, which would most effectually bring discredit on his argument, rather than reproach on their cause, I would desire him to represent as monopolists men who are breaking down with competition.

We are told by southern gentlemen of the generous South. One gentleman from South Carolina had it the "too generous South." This was not the language of the mover of this amendment; [Mr. McDUFFIE] but even he, in reference to the vote on the Maysville road, somewhat significantly compared the liberality of the South with the economy (to which he paid a compliment, and I have no doubt a sincere one) of the North. Sir, the South is generous; but as her generosity has permitted her, on this topic, to be very jealous of her own interests, I trust she will carry it so far as to forgive us for doing the same. The South is generous, liberal, high-minded. I acknowledge it; I have seen it; I may be permitted to say, I have experienced it. What New England is, I shall not say. I am a son of New England. My fathers for two centuries have tilled her sacred soil, where they now rest; and all that I have or hope, I owe to her noble institutions. Her praise is "fit theme for any tongue but mine."

But the gentleman must not think we are generous only with other people's money, as he appeared to intimate in his allusion to the subject of internal improvement. We pay our own money. We have paid it from the settlement of the country; and if we are prompt to practise this lesson abroad, we learned it at home.

Another gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. BARNWELL] commending the wisdom of the people of Massachusetts, said that they had such a dislike for taxation, that they could not be got to subscribe for a railroad, nor even to pay their State debts. But the difficulty about the railroad is, that the public mind is not yet generally satisfied of its feasibility, and it was thought expedient to delay so large an expenditure till it could be voted by pretty general consent. As to paying the debts, the question was, whether there did not exist adequate funds without the tax. I do not mean that the people of Massachusetts have a passion to be taxed for the mere love of taxation; but, to the extent of paying their debts, my friend may believe me, that they will tax themselves, when it is necessary, with great readiness. And as for the railroad, if the General Government will pay us the debt she owes us for the services of our militia in the war—services as patriotic, as prompt, as efficient as those of the militia of any State in the Union—I will agree, for one, to subscribe it to any railroad that shall be projected with a safe prospect of success. Not tax ourselves for roads! Why, we do it in every town in the State, and every year; and so we do for schools. The single town of Boston pays annually little short of two hundred thousand dollars for its schools, nearly half of it by a public tax for its free schools; nor is the rest of the State proportionably behind the capital. This is our economy in expenditures for public institutions.

But the gentleman [Mr. McDUFFIE] tells us, we ought to protect our manufactures ourselves by State bounties. He forgets that this is impossible. How could we prevent the introduction of foreign fabrics into our State? So long as we had the power, it was exercised. It was very liberally exercised, as early as 1645, by the infant colony; and it was one of the last acts of the independent State of Massachusetts under the confederation. The gentleman, perhaps, has not contemplated the colonial history of the industry of the country; a chapter to the full as instructive as the colonial history of its politics. When he tells us that the southern States now stand in the same relation to the manufacturing States that the whole colonies did to Great Britain—that they have changed masters, but gained nothing by the change—that the existing laws are a hundred times more oppressive to the South than the colonial system was to America, I must think that he recollects only that the staple products of the South were indeed liberally encouraged by the mother country, and bounties awarded for their culture; while the iron mace of prohibition lay on the industry of the North; our navigation shut out from the world, beyond the Capes, and from the North of Europe, and just permitted to range between the West Indies and Cape Finisterre; and our manufactures subjected to restraints the most odious and tyrannical, making it highly penal to carry a dozen hats from one colony to another, and denying us the right to make a hobnail. As soon as we were independent, we did turn to the industrious arts. Massachusetts immediately enacted her navigation law; but it availed her nothing; and her tariff, but it bound nobody but herself, and merely threw her markets open to her neighbors. When we are tauntingly asked why we do not pursue this policy ourselves, it is not amiss to state that Massachusetts had, before the adoption of the federal constitution, her own tariff, in which some articles, and that of cotton fabrics among the rest, paid higher duties than any levied by the United States, till the law of 1816. When the federal constitution was adopted, the States lost the power of protecting their own manufactures; and Mr. Madison, in the earliest debates, gives this as a reason why the duties, under the Federal Government, should be laid so as to promote that end.

The gentleman from South Carolina made some remarks on capital, which I could not but think rather invidious, and at war with the general liberality of his views. Moderate, and even large private accumulations of capital perform a very valuable office in the community. They fulfil many of the beneficial ends of banking, without the evils attending banks, and in a variety of cases to which banks cannot reach. Capital cannot benefit its owner till it has first benefited the community around him; and in this country capitalist is only another name for a clerk employed by the active community to transact their money business, for small wages and no thanks.

But, be this as it may, the gentleman from South Carolina utterly misconceives our population, in the effect which he ascribes to capital over elections. If he will come and visit us, I will show him a people which the wealth of Attalus could not tempt—which the gold of the Indus could not carry to an election. The gentleman has spoken of his district—he must allow me to speak of mine. I have the honor to represent the district containing very large manufacturing places, Waltham and Lowell, where more property is probably invested in manufactures than at any other place in the Union. The town of Lowell, especially, has, within ten years, grown up from a few farm-houses to a population of six thousand seven hundred souls, provided with all the establishments and institutions, the schools and churches, of an advanced community; a population as moral, as intelligent, as substantial as any in the Union. It has grown up exclusively under the manufacturing influence. Here, if anywhere, there has been a forcing process; and in such a district, if anywhere, the corrupting influence of capital must be seen. And now I aver, if, by any arts of misrepresentation, the suspicion could be infused into the minds of the people of that district, that their representative was under the influence of the moneyed capital invested in it, it would cost him his seat. That is no very strong expression. But there does not live the man in New England—no, not even he of whom she is fondest and proudest, who could stand a day under such a suspicion reasonably entertained.

I do not speak of bribery, neither did the gentleman from South Carolina; but of the indirect, if you please, the honest influence of capital. The truth is, the fact is the other way. Our people are jealous and watchful of this influence. They read for themselves, think for themselves, vote for themselves. Ours is not the part of the country, where the slavish discipline of party, the fruit of all corrupt influences, exists. Hence our groundless internal feuds; hence our ridiculous subdivisions of which the "generous South" ought not to complain, for she has always known how, and never better than at this moment, to turn them to very good account, in monopolizing the Government of the country.

The gentleman from South Carolina spoke with no little bitterness on the subject of majorities and minorities; of the oppression, the despotism, the tyranny implied in adopting and pursuing a course of policy prejudicial to the interests of a minority of the people. It is true the gentleman is in a minority on this question, and perhaps this alone, of all the great questions on which parties are now divided. I cannot but hope that he has spoken with causeless severity, in reference to the present case; but we of New England, towards whom his remarks were in part directed, can well believe his sincerity, in deploring the hardships to which a minority must submit. If there is bitterness in that cup, we have drank it to the dregs. We have been in a minority on this and every other question; and I will show the gentleman, from a very high authority, that our brethren of the South have not only made a substantial benefit out of our position, but have "Used us for their mirth, yea, for their laughter,

When we were wretched."

In 1798, a letter was written by Colonel Taylor, of Caroline, to Mr. Jefferson, on the subject of a secession, on the part of Virginia and North Carolina, from the Union. Mr. Jefferson opposes the project, and, among other reasons, makes use of the following:

"If we reduce our Union to Virginia and North Carolina, immediately the conflict will be established between the representatives of these two States, and they will end by breaking into their simple units. Seeing, therefore, that an association of men who will not quarrel with one another, is a thing which never yet existed, from the greatest confederacy of nations down to a town meeting or a vestry; seeing that we must have somebody to quarrel with, I had rather keep our New England associates for that purpose, than to see our bickerings transferred to others. They are circumscribed within such narrow limits, and their population so full, that their numbers will ever be the minority; and they are marked, like the Jews, with such perversity of character, as to constitute, from that circumstance, the natural division of our parties."

I make this reference with no unfriendly feeling to the memory of Mr. Jefferson; I would tread lightly over his ashes. The expressions I have quoted were uttered in high party times; but they are a correct indication of the policy of which the North has been, and is, the victim.

The gentleman compared the relation of the planting to the manufacturing States with that of the colonies of Great Britain before the revolution; and went so far as to say that the former had now a hundred times more to complain of than the latter had then. What was the complaint of the colonies? That they were subject to the control of a Government in which they were not represented, and whose laws consequently were not calculated for their benefit. But is not the South represented in the Government of the United States? Represented, did I say? Has she not contrived, as soon as a political revolution could possibly be brought about, always to be in a majority? Was it not that triumphant southern majority which called this manufacturing system into existence? The chairman of the Committee on Commerce, in his late report, states the fact in the plainest terms, that the restrictive system, which commenced in 1807, and of which the war was the last measure, laid the foundation of the manufacturing policy. What says Mr. Jefferson again? (letter to Mr. Leiper, 21st January 1809:) "I have lately inculcated the encouragement of manufactures to the extent of our own consumption, at least in all articles of which we raise the raw materials. On this the federal papers and meetings have sounded the alarm of Chinese policy, destruction of commerce, &c., that is to say, the iron, which we make, must not be wrought here into ploughs, axes, hoes, &c., in order that the ship owner may have the profit of carrying it to Europe, and bringing it back in a manufactured form; as if, after manufacturing our own raw materials for our own use, there would not be a surplus produce sufficient to employ a due proportion of navigation in carrying it to market, and exchanging it for those articles of which we have not the raw material; yet this absurd hue and cry has done much to federalize New England. Their doctrine goes to the sacrificing agriculture and manufactures to commerce; to the calling all our people, from the interior country to the sea shore, to turn merchants; and to convert this great agricultural country into a city of Amsterdam. But I trust the good sense of our country will see that its greatest prosperity depends on a due balance between agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, and not in this protuberant navigation, which has kept us in hot water from the commencement of our Government, and is now engaging us in war."

I beg leave to say, sir, that these are Mr. Jefferson's views on these subjects, not mine. I quote them to show the gentleman in what councils, and under whose auspices, the manufacturing system had its origin. New England did remonstrate, murmur, protest against it. While writhing under burdens almost too grievous to be borne, she did utter her complaints, in a tone, patriotic as now echoed by the South, but treasonable in her; a tone, that never has been and never will be forgiven her, and which has given her brethren a pretext to set their foot upon her neck, and press her beaming forehead to the dust. And now, what is the consequence? Because she will not sit still, and see those establishments prostrated, into which her capital was driven; because she is not willing that the laws passed against her will, beneath which her manufactures have grown up, should be swept abruptly away, she is avaricious, inconsistent, a hungry, grasping monopolist; and the vocabulary of the language is tasked for terms of opprobrium to heap on her. If the colonial system, which led to the declaration of independence, had been adopted by a parliament, in which the colonies were represented and had a majority; if the stamp act had been the measure of a cabinet, in which Patrick Henry had been Prime Minister, John Adams, Lord Chancellor, Dr. Franklin, First Lord of the Treasury, Mr. Jefferson, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and Samuel Adams, King, (as Dr. Johnson thought Speaker Cushing wanted to be,) had this measure been forced on Old England by a triumphant colonial majority, and then these colonies, on a change of affairs, finding or fancying it injurious to themselves, had clamored for its repeal, at the sacrifice of a vast capital in England, which had been invested under it, then the relation of the colonies to the mother country would have resembled that of our southern brethren to the manufacturing States, and would have failed to engage the sympathies of the world.

Sir, I cannot approve the tone in which this amendment has been urged on us. If any good is to be done, it is by conciliation; and in that work I will begin as soon and go as far as any man. I will join in any bona fide attempt to remove the burdens of the revenue laws, not inconsistent with interests to which the faith of the Government is pledged. I am willing to begin by my colleague's [Mr. GOSHAM] proposition, to grant a drawback of the whole duty on cotton bagging, on every yard of that article, whether foreign or domestic, wrapped round the bale of cotton, on exportation; thereby relieving the southern planter from a burden which he regards as peculiarly onerous, and yet preserving to the western manufacturer the benefit of the duty. And I believe, if, instead of this tone of fierce denunciation, a conciliating language were used, that every thing might be effected, which the real interests of the country require. But the gentleman himself would be the last to respect men who could be wrought upon by such invective, against those whom they represent. And while he tells us that the repeal of these laws would reduce our manufactures to ruin, it seems hardly necessary to say that he cannot expect us to sit still, and vote for his amendment.

Mr. MALLARY followed with a few remarks; after which,

Mr. DRAYTON said, it was not his purpose to sustain the observations which he should offer to the committee, by a long series of statistical calculations, or by elaborate deductions from the principles of political economy. Being under the impression that the public mind was undergoing a change, that many of those who had been undoubting proselytes of the "American system," began to perceive its errors, and to feel its evils, it would be his object to exhibit to them its delusions in a plain and practical manner. In the prosecution of this design, he should confine himself exclusively to endeavoring to establish the following propositions:

First. That our manufactures flourished so long as those who were engaged in them were left to the free exercise of their own exertions; and that they have invariably declined under a restricted system, excepting when their prosperity was owing to the public calamity.

Secondly. That the arguments relied upon by the advocates of restricted industry, are fallacious, and their assertions contradicted by facts.

1st. That our manufactures flourished, so long, &c. &c. It is a trite remark, [said Mr. D.] that, in our investigations, we often overlook what is immediately before us, and speculate upon that which is remote. It is thus that the restrictionists, in their reasonings upon the effects of a prohibitory policy, recur to the examples of European nations, instead of adverting to those of their own country, which would be more appropriate and illustrative. To support my position, I shall appeal to our own history, as it has been represented to us, not by the enemies, but by the friends of the American system. General Hamilton, in his celebrated report, in January, 1791, says: "Manufactures of cotton goods, not long since established in Beverly, in Massachusetts, and at Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, and conducted with a perseverance corresponding with the patriotic motives which began them, seem to have overcome the first obstacles of success, producing corduroys, velvets, fustians, jeans, and other similar articles, of a quality which will bear a comparison with the like articles brought from Manchester. The one at Providence has the merit of being the first in introducing into the United States the celebrated cotton mill, which not only furnishes materials for that manufactory itself, but for the supply of private families for household manufacture. Other manufactures of the same material, as regular businesses, have also been begun in different places in Connecticut, but all upon smaller scales than those above mentioned. Some essays are also making in the printing and staining of cotton goods. There are several establishments of this kind already on foot."

Mr. Tench Coxe, in his letter to Mr. Gallatin, when Secretary of the Treasury, says: "The neighboring States of Massachusetts and Connecticut quickly followed Rhode Island; and the tables which are annexed, imperfect as they unavoidably are, manifest the universality and magnitude of the cotton manufactures in 1790. If a very sober prudence shall estimate the value of the water-spun and steam-spun cotton yarn at the price at which they can be imported, without profit, from Europe, there will remain an opportunity for much lucrative business in extensive works."

General Hamilton, in another part of his report, states that it is certain that several important branches of manufactures have grown up and flourished with a rapidity which surprises, offering an encouraging assurance of success in future attempts; of these, it may not be improper to enumerate the most considerable. He then specifies those of "leather, skins, iron, steel, wood and cabinet wares, flax, hemp, ardent spirits and malt liquors, bricks, tiles, and pottery, writing and other kinds of paper, hats, shoes, refined sugar, soap, candles, copper and brass wares, tin wares, great quantities of coarse cloths, coatings, serges, flannels, &c. &c."

A friend has this moment put into my hands the following extract, which he made from a Connecticut newspaper:—Hartford, third of October, 1791.—Woollen manufactures—The quality of the cloths, more especially the coarser, is acknowledged, on all hands, to be superior to that of the English of the same fineness. They can be afforded as low as English cloths of the same fineness."

Mr. Coxe, in a supplementary letter, thus speaks of our manufactures shortly anterior to the non-intercourse and embargo laws. "The States of Rhode Island and Massachusetts have expelled all doubts about the practicability of the cotton operations. With the smallest territory in the United States, Rhode Island has already attained and introduced into her vicinity a cotton branch of our manufactures, as valuable as the cotton branch of any country in Europe was at the time of the formation of our present constitution. Heavy cotton goods cannot be imported without a loss. It is a fact of great importance, that none of the productions of the earth, whether of natural growth, or the fruits of cultivation, in the middle, northern, and eastern States, which can be considered as raw materials, are now exported, in an unmanufactured condition, to foreign markets. The manufacturers may be said to purchase and employ a quantity equal to the whole; for if small parcels of raw materials have been lately exported, much greater quantities of similar foreign articles have been introduced from abroad. The landed interest have no actual foreign purchasers for its wool, flax, hemp, hides, and skins of domestic animals, and various metals. The momentous fact is therefore satisfactorily established, that the American manufacturers' demand has greatly surpassed the abilities of the planters, farmers, landholders, &c. to supply these five descriptions of materials. There is, at this time, no other redundant material than cotton." Such was the situation of our manufactures, until the embargo and non-intercourse laws. After their enactment, Mr. Coxe informs us, in the year 1814, that "it is found that our cotton wool has every where forced itself into manufacturing uses; and there is no reason to doubt that the value of our manufactures, though much extended since 1810, very greatly exceeded, in that year, the highest value of the raw material heretofore exported in any annual period. This prosperity of the cotton manufactures was without the aid of the double duties, and with but little assistance from the labor-saving machinery. But when the vast importance of mechanism, since introduced in lieu of laboring hands, is considered, in connexion with our power to produce cotton, the diffusion and extent which the cotton manufactures must obtain, particularly in a State of war and blockade, cannot be estimated."

The foregoing is a representation of our manufactures, up to the period and after the commencement of the late war. Their condition, during the war, is thus described by Mr. Niles, in his Register for January, 1814: "There are now running in the neighborhood of Providence, Rhode Island, no less than one hundred and twenty thousand spindles; these spindles make one hundred and ten thousand pounds of yarn each week, and consume about six millions of pounds of cotton (or twenty thousand bags) per annum. The value of the cloth made from this yarn is estimated at eight million one hundred and forty thousand dollars a year." Mr. Niles adds: "We cannot fear that our manufactures of cotton, wool, &c. will be affected, should peace take place to-morrow. The present great profits may be reduced, but there is room enough for their fall, whilst they yet may be as lucrative as man should desire."

From the extracts which I have made, it appears that our manufactures, in 1790, comprehended a variety of articles—that "several important branches had grown up with a rapidity which was surprising;" among others, "great quantities of coarse cloths, coatings, serges, flannels, &c." According to Mr. Coxe, the tables which he annexed to his letter, "manifested the magnitude of the cotton manufacture in 1790." This was the condition of our manufactures shortly after the adoption of the federal constitution, when our moneyed capital was small—when our white population scarcely exceeded three millions of persons—when our national debt amounted to fifty-four million one hundred and twenty-four thousand four hundred and sixty-four dollars, and when the duties upon imports were low, those upon hemp being fifty-four cents the hundred and twelve pounds; upon unmanufactured iron seven and a half per cent. ad valorem; and upon cotton and woollen goods five per cent. ad valorem; raw wool and a variety of other articles being exempt from any duties. Let it also be recollected that, at this time, the raw material of cotton was imported, and that the British exclusive commercial code prevailed with unmitigated rigor. If, under these circumstances, our manufactures were flourishing and increasing, to what other causes could their prosperity be attributed, than to moderate imposts, to free competition, and to the liberty which our citizens enjoyed of prosecuting those branches of industry which were suited to their capitals, their skill, and the demands of the country, untrammelled by the interference of legislators, who never did, and never can understand and direct the interests of individuals as well as they can themselves.

until the non-intercourse and embargo laws; that the demand of the manufacturers "had greatly surpassed the abilities of the planters, farmers, landholders, &c. to supply them with wool, flax, hemp, hides, and skins of domestic animals." Although the duties had then been increased, they were still moderate, and exclusively imposed for revenue. Here, it seems to me, terminated the solid prosperity of manufactures. The non-intercourse, the embargo laws, and the war, gave to them unnatural stimulants. From these adventitious causes, their progress was so rapid, that Mr. Niles exultingly exclaimed, in 1814, that they could not be affected by an immediate peace; that "there was room enough for their fall, while they yet might be as lucrative as man should desire." Notwithstanding this confident prediction, as soon as peace was concluded, Mr. Niles, in his Register, in 1815, held the following language: "The free and unrestricted admission, at present allowed, into the United States, of cotton fabrics of foreign production, not only extinguishes the hope of a reasonable profit, in future, from the manufacture of similar goods at home, but threatens the speedy destruction of the establishments already created for that purpose, and the loss of the immense capital invested in them." It would be inferred from these expressions, that, upon the return of peace, the duties were instantly reduced. The fact is, that the war, or double duties, continued until 1816. In that year protective duties were granted, which were increased in 1818, in 1824, and, again, in 1828. The complaints of the manufacturers became louder after every augmentation of the duties; and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT] who represents one of the greatest manufacturing districts in the Union, tells us, that but few of the manufacturers in it have escaped ruin; and that those who have been less unfortunate, are struggling with difficulties and embarrassments.

It will be found, upon examination, that the distresses of the manufacturers commenced with the era of protection in 1816. We never heard of their distresses before; we have never ceased to hear of them since. The causes of these distresses are evident. High duties induce capitalists, without any knowledge of the subject, to invest their funds in manufactures, as a lucrative speculation. Companies are thus formed, consisting of presidents, secretaries, directors, &c. The expenses incidental to these companies are so considerable, that even protection duties will not enable them to sell their fabrics to a profit; and yet the quantity they produce gluts the market, and injures not only themselves, but the regular, practical manufacturers, who, with competent skill and personal attention and economy, might otherwise obtain a fair remuneration for their labor.

Whilst we were fettering our trade with onerous duties, not only upon fabrics, but upon raw materials, Great Britain, perceiving the evils of her ancient commercial code, resolved to introduce a more enlarged and liberal policy. In spite of an opposition supported by numbers, and wealth, and influence, and prejudice, and cupidity, she repealed upwards of two hundred of her navigation laws, entered into equal commercial duties with most of the European nations, and admitted various raw materials upon the payment of low duties. In 1825, she allowed the importation of one hundred and thirty-one articles, subject to duties from fifteen to thirty per cent., the greater part of which had, previously, either been prohibited, or encumbered with imposts almost tantamount to prohibition. Mr. Huskisson declared, in the House of Commons, in 1827, "that he had had the good fortune to persuade the House, within a few years, to repeal fifteen hundred restrictive and prohibitory statutes." Instead of taxation being increased by these commercial relaxations, between the year 1815 and the present time, Great Britain has abolished taxes to an amount exceeding thirty millions of pounds sterling. She has, by these means, imparted a new spring to the industry and enterprise of her subjects. They are enabled, upon more advantageous terms, to enter into competition with all parts of the world. Their imports and exports have enormously augmented. They send their cottons to India, and their silks are smuggled into France, though they are under the necessity of importing from abroad the raw materials for both of these manufactures.
